PREFACE.

ALMOST a generation has passed away since the "History of the Reformation" was first published.

When the idea of writing it occurred to the author, he was young, and he felt strongly impelled to give a narrative of the wonderful works that God had wrought for Christendom in the Sixteenth Century. Aware of his own incapacity to accomplish the task, and fearing that, in undertaking it, he might be acting rashly, he at first only published a small edition. His fears were not realized; and the work met with success, such as he had never for a moment anticipated. He must thankfully ascribe the praise to the Lord, who, he humbly believes, has helped him.

The History was not, however, written without much labour, and much prayer. The author earnestly desired that it should conduce to the glory of God; and it appeared to him that it might prove useful to shew forth, even in a feeble degree, the living Christianity of the Reformers, the sanctifying doctrine by which the Church was raised, through their instrumentality, from her state of prostration, and transformed into a life-giving Church. He felt that the Holy Spirit, which then worked in so many hearts, might again manifest His power, and bring to God some souls as yet unacquainted with His saving strength.

The author had no idea, however, of writing a book of devotion; his intention was to write a History. He wished to represent faithfully the men and the events of the Sixteenth Century. With this object he studied the writings of the Reformers, and the chronicles of their contemporaries. He made researches in the public and in the private libraries in different countries. He deciphered many manuscripts of the Sixteenth Century, several of which were unknown till he made use of them. But he felt that, in order to accomplish his object, it was not enough simply to give a chronicle of facts. That which constituted the great wonder of the Reformation, was the setting forth of God's truth in the midst of human error—the breath of heaven, that blew upon the Church, and quickened into life so many of the Lord's servants. To shut oneself into a study and pore over manuscripts, was not enough to enable him to write this History; it was necessary to know the true springs of the work, of which the Reformers were the instruments.

The author was called, by the circumstances in which he was placed in Germany and in his own country, to take part in struggles similar to theirs, and to share in some experiences like theirs. He therefore felt himself in active and hearty sympathy with their work. The fields of labour on which he was engaged were, it is true, not extensive; the battles he had to fight were, in comparison to theirs, to use a celebrated expression of Voltaire, "but as a tempest in a tumbler,"—"une tempête dans un verre d'eau;" while those of the Reformers were like the ocean storm, which beat and break to pieces the sturdiest ships. The one and the other were, however, for the defence of the same Word of God—for the glory of the same Gospel; and often did it occur, that the events which happened in his ministerial life gave the author a clue to understand those which had happened three centuries before.

If the "History of the Reformation" met with some success, it is owing to the living power of the doctrines of the Reformation which are there professed. In our day historical writings have been more numerous and important than at any other period. In France, in Germany, in England, in the United States, and elsewhere, works have appeared which have won lasting fame for their authors. The writer of this book has no hesitation in acknowledging, that the "History of the Reformation" is inferior to them. He does not compete with Thierry, with Guizot, with Thiers, Mignet, Macaulay, Prescott, Motley, and other historians; and yet his History has had immense circulation, and has penetrated into the most distant countries. He is tempted to ask: Why is this? Is it not because the truth of God is openly proclaimed in the work? The doctrine of justification by faith in Christ is presented as being what it really is—the powerful lever which, in the Sixteenth Century, raised up the fallen churches, and brought souls to Christ.

Man is well aware that a new life can only be begun in him when he has true and joyful communion with God. He knows that if he is in any degree to accomplish the Divine will here below, he must first find in God a reconciled Father, who forgives him all his offences. He knows that he can only love God when he is convinced that God first loved him. He knows that it is the love of God towards him which can only bring forth in him true humility, self-denial, hunger and thirst after righteousness. How would it be possible for him to enter, with courage, into the work of personal sanctification, if he were continually troubled by the reproaches of conscience, and kept back by the burden of his sins weighing always upon him? He must, before all, have pardon; he must know that his sins are no longer imputed to him, because the Saviour has given His life as a ransom for his soul—because He bore on the cross the punishment of his guilt. The conscience of a true Christian tells him that, if his reconciliation with God by Christ depended in any degree on his sanctification, he could never feel assured of having acquired the necessary amount of holiness, and, consequently, could never have joyful confidence in God; and he would thus be incapable of taking even the first step in the path of sanctification. Faith in the expiation of Christ, and reconciliation through His blood, is the commencement of the union of man with God; the gift of Divine grace gratuitously made, received by faith without any merit on our part, is the beginning of the new creation and of the new creature. That is the faith taught by St. Paul and the apostles—that is the doctrine taught by Luther and the other Reformers, as it had never been taught since the apostolic times. That doctrine may, perhaps, bring a smile to the lips of some great writers, of men of the world; and yet it was that which transformed Christendom three centuries ago, and brought about a new era,—one of light, of liberty, and of faith,—contrasting forcibly with the darkness of the Middle Ages. If this book—inferior in many respects to the works of the great historians we have named—has had some success, it is owing not only to the fact, that it narrates faithfully the exterior structure of the Reformation, but also, we repeat it, because it sets forth the spirit which pervaded it, and shews the heavenly influence by which it renewed the Church.

The “History of the Reformation” has been translated into the greater number of modern languages. In England, the first volumes which became public—before there existed an international law to protect the property of foreign authors—had six different translators, and six different English editors. The work was also translated into German, Dutch, Italian, Swedish, Spanish, and Armenian, as well as into Arabic and Hindostance; but the author is not aware whether these last two translations were printed. There is, perhaps, no place where the work has been so widely circulated as in the United States of America. It would be almost impossible to ascertain the exact number of copies published there; some have estimated it at between two and three hundred thousand. It is said that it has had a larger circulation than any historical work published in America by any author, either foreign or national. One circumstance, however, may have contributed to this great publicity: there is no international law to protect foreign authors in the United States, while there are laws which protect the works of Americans. Messrs. Prescott, Motley, and others, have, therefore, found the reward of their labour, while the author of the “History of the Reformation” has been deprived of the copyright, and of the benefit accruing therefrom. The saving, thus produced to his detriment, enabled the American publishers to give the work at a very low price. Literary labours—which demand the time, the intellectual powers, the best exertions of an author—constitute property, and are as deserving of protection as the material result of a workman, or of an artisan, who only gives the labour of his arms. If, however, the author has not grown rich through his works, he has had the greater satisfaction of knowing they have done some good. “It is with us a household work,” said an American to him; to which another added: “We have gone through the forests and lonely prairies of our country, and we hardly entered into a log-house in the far West, in which the Bible and the ‘History of the Reformation’ were not to be found.”

Letters received from different parts of Europe, from the United States, from India, and Australia, have shewn that it is a work on which the Lord has deigned to pour a blessing.

There are some principles which the author applied himself to carry out, and which contributed to imprint a special character upon his work; he endeavoured to shew forth God in History—Christ in the Church—life in the record of past events.

History must live by that principle of life which is proper to it,—and that life is God. He must be acknowledged and proclaimed in history; and the course of events must be displayed as the annals of the government of a Supreme Head.

I have, says the author in beginning his work, descended into the lists to which the recitals of our historians attracted me. I have there seen the actions of men and of nations developing themselves with power, and encountering in hostile array; I have heard a strange din of arms; but nowhere has my attention been directed to the majestic aspect of the arbiter who presides over the struggle. And yet there is a principle of movement emanating from God himself. In all the changes amongst nations, God looks upon that wide stage on which the generations of men successively meet and strive. He is there, it is true, an invisible God; but if the profane multitude pass without noticing Him, because "He is a God that hideth himself," thoughtful men, and such as feel their need of the Principle of their life, seek Him with the more earnestness, and are not satisfied until they find Him and throw themselves prostrate at His feet. And their search is richly rewarded; for—from the heights to which they are obliged to meet their God—the world's history, instead of offering, as to the ignorant crowd, a confused chaos, appears a majestic temple, which the invisible hand of God erects, and which rises to His glory above the rock of humanity.

Shall we not acknowledge the hand of God in those great men, or in those mighty nations which arise, as it were, from the dust of the earth, and give a new impulse, a new form, or a new destiny to human affairs? Shall we not acknowledge His hand in those heroes who spring up among men at appointed times; who display activity and energy beyond the ordinary limits of human strength, and around whom individuals and nations gather, as if to a superior and mysterious power? Who launched them into the expanse of ages, like comets of vast extent and flaming trains, appearing at long intervals, to scatter among the superstitious tribes of men anticipations of plenty and joy, or of calamity and terror? Who but God himself? Alexander would seek his own origin in the abodes of the Divinity. And in the most irreligious age there is no eminent glory but such as is seen seeking to connect itself with the idea of Divine interposition.

If God is supreme in history, Christ is supreme in the Church. Evangelical faith appeals to the understanding, to the heart, and to the will of every Christian, only to impose on him the duty of submitting to the Divine authority of Christ; of listening, believing, loving, comprehending, and acting as God requires.

Evangelical faith does not place on the throne of the Church the civil power, or the secular magistrate; but it sets thereon Jesus Christ, who has said, I am a King; who imparts to His subjects the principle of life; who establishes His kingdom here on earth, and develops it until the time come when He shall exercise, in person, His Divine authority.

Evangelical faith does not place on the throne of the Church priests, councils, doctors, or that vice-God, (veri Dei vicem gerit in terris, as the Romish Church has it,) that infallible pontiff, who, reviving the errors of the pagans, ascribes salvation to forms of worship, and to meritorious works of men. It sets thereon Jesus Christ, the great high priest of His people—the God-man, who, by an act of His free love, bore in our stead, in His atoning sacrifice, the penalty of sin;—who has taken away the curse from our heads, and thus becomes the creator of a new race.

While the thoughts of great numbers are led astray in the midst of ceremonies, priests, human lucubrations, pontifical fables, philosophic reveries, and are driven to and fro in the desert of this world, evangelical faith rises even to heaven, and falls prostrate before Him who sitteth on the throne.

The Reformation is Jesus Christ.

Lord, to whom shall we go, if not unto Thee? Let others follow the devices of their imaginations, or prostrate themselves before traditional superstitions, or kiss the feet of a sinful man. O King of glory! we desire but Thee alone.

The final characteristic which the author wished to imprint upon his History, was life in the recital of past events. The historian must do more than exhume from the sepulchre, in which they are sleeping, the relics of men and things of times past, that he may exhibit them in the light of day. We value highly such a work, and those who perform it, for it is a necessary one; and yet we do not think it sufficient. Dry bones do not faithfully represent the men of other days. They did not live as skeletons, but as beings full of life and activity. The historian is not simply a resurrectionist; he needs—strange but necessary ambition—a power that can restore the dead to life.

The author firmly believes that, if a history should have truth, it should also have life. The events of past times did not resemble, in the days when they occurred, those grand museums of Rome, Naples, Paris, and London, in whose galleries we behold long rows of marble statues, mummies, and tombs. There were then living beings who thought, felt, spoke, acted, and struggled. The picture, whatever history may be able to do, will always have less of life than the reality. The history which exhibits men thinking, feeling, and acting, as they did in their lifetime, is more truthful than compositions in which the actors are deprived of speech, and even of life.

The Text of the present Edition, undertaken by one of the English Publishers, is the same in every respect as that first presented to the British Public, with this important addition, that the principal actors in the great drama, and the chief scenes rendered famous by the events of the period, have been brought more vividly under the eye of the reader by the skill of the artist and engraver. Labouchere's well-known and beautiful representations of the leading events in the life of Luther, will form an appropriate and interesting accompaniment to the narrative, of which so large a portion is taken up with the great Reformer. The importance and value of pictorial illustrations, especially in historical writings, is sure to render this Edition both interesting and attractive to all classes of readers.

May the Lord, who, thirty years ago, blessed the "History of this Reformation," be pleased now to pour a new blessing on the work! In our days it is important that the principles of the Reformation should be embraced and appreciated by believers, and that they should be professed openly and courageously in the world. It is necessary that all Christians should unite around the Head of the Church, look unto Jesus, and abide in Him.

The author found pleasure in telling the story of the acts of the Reformers; but he must say with one of them, John Calvin: "Let us ascribe honour to those men who have excelled in the fear of God; but on condition that God should remain above all, and that Christ should triumph."

HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION

IN THE

SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

BOOK I.

STATE OF MATTERS BEFORE THE REFORMATION.

CHAPTER I.

Christianity—Two distinguishing Principles—Formation of the Papacy—First Encroachments—Influence of Rome—Co-operation of Bishops and Factions—External Unity of the Church—Internal Unity of the Church—Primacy of St. Peter—Patriarchates—Co-operation of Princes—Influence of the Barbarians—Rome invokes the Franks—Secular Power—Pope and Charlemagne—The Deserts—Disorders of Rome—The Emperor the Pope's Liege Lord—Hildebrand—His Character—Celibacy—Struggle with the Emperor—Emancipation of the Pope—Hildebrand's Successors—The Crusades—The Church—Corruption of Doctrine.

THE enfeebled world was rocking on its base when Christianity appeared. National religions which had sufficed for the fathers, could no longer satisfy the children. The new generation could not be moulded in the ancient forms. The gods of all nations, transported to Rome, had there lost their oracles, as the nations had there lost their liberty. Brought face to face in the Capitol, they had mutually destroyed each other, and their divinity had disappeared. A great void had been made in the religion of the world.

A kind of Deism, destitute of spirit and life, kept floating, for some time, over the abyss in which the vigorous superstitions of the ancients were engulfed. But, like all negative beliefs, it was unable to build. Narrow national distinctions fell with the gods, and the nations melted down into one another. In Europe, Asia, and Africa, there was now only one empire, and the human race began to feel its universality and its unity.

Then the Word was made flesh.

God appeared among men, and as a man, "to save that which was lost." In Jesus of Nazareth "dwelt all the fulness of the Godhead bodily."

This is the greatest event in the annals of the world. Ancient times had prepared it.—new times flow from it. It is their centre, their bond, and their unity.

Thenceforth all the popular superstitions were without meaning; and the slender remains which they had saved from the great shipwreck of infidelity sank before the Majestic Sun of eternal truth.

The Son of Man lived thirty-three years here below, curing the sick, instructing sinners, having no place where to lay His head, yet displaying, in the depth of this humiliation, a grandeur, a holiness, a power, and divinity, which the world had never known. He suffered, died, rose again, and ascended to heaven. His disciples, beginning at Jerusalem, traversed the empire and the world, everywhere proclaiming their Master "the Author of eternal salvation." From the heart of a nation which stood aloof from all nations, came forth a mercy which invited and embraced all. A great number of Asiatics, Greeks, and Romans, till then led by priests to the feet of dumb idols, believed the Word which suddenly illumined the earth "like a sunbeam," as Eusebius expresses it. A breath of life began to move over this vast field of death. A new people, a holy nation, was formed among men; and the astonished world beheld, in the disciples of the Galilean, a purity, a self-denial, a charity, a heroism, of which it had lost even the idea.

Two principles, in particular, distinguished the new religion from all the human systems which it drove before it. The one related to the ministers of worship, the other to doctrine.

The ministers of Paganism were in a manner the gods whom those human religions worshipped. The priests of Egypt, Gaul, Scythia, Germany, Britain, and Hindostan, led the people so long, at least, as the eyes of the people were unopened. Jesus Christ, no doubt, established a ministry, but He did not found a particular priesthood. He dethroned the living idols of the nations, destroyed a proud hierarchy, took from man what man had taken from God, and brought the soul again into immediate contact with the Divine source of truth, proclaiming himself sole Master and sole Mediator.—"One is your Master, even Christ," said He; "and all ye are brethren," (Matt xxiii. 8.)

In regard to doctrine, human religions had taught that salvation was of man. The religions of the earth had framed an earthly religion. They had told man that heaven would be given him as a hire—they had fixed its price; and what a price! The religion of God taught that salvation came from God, was a gift from heaven, the result of an amnesty, of an act of grace by the Sovereign. "God," it is said, "has given eternal life."

It is true, Christianity cannot be summed up under these two heads, but they seem to rule the subject, especially where history is concerned; and as we cannot possibly trace the opposition between truth and error in all points, we must select those of them which are most prominent.

Such, then, were two of the constituent principles of the religion which at that time took possession of the empire, and of the world. With them we are within the true landmarks of Christianity—out of them Christianity disappears. On the preservation or the loss of them depended its greatness or its fall. They are intimately connected; for it is impossible to exalt the priests of the Church, or the works of believers, without lowering Jesus Christ in His double capacity of Mediator and Redeemer. The one of these principles should rule the history of religion, the other should rule its doctrine. Originally, both were paramount; let us see how they were lost. We begin with the destinies of the former.

The Church was at first a society of brethren, under the guidance of brethren. They were all taught of God, and each was entitled to come to the Divine fountain of light, and draw for himself, (John vi. 45.) The Epistles, which then decided great questions of doctrine, were not inscribed with the pompous name of a single man—a head. The Holy Scriptures inform us that the words were simply these, "The apostles, elders, and brethren, to our brethren," (Acts xv. 23.)

But even the writings of the apostles intimate, that from the midst of these brethren a power would rise and subvert this simple and primitive order, (2 Thess. ii. 2.)

Let us contemplate the formation, and follow the development of this power—a power foreign to the Church.

Paul of Tarsus, one of the greatest apostles of the new religion, had arrived at Rome, the capital of the empire and of the world, preaching the salvation which comes from God. A church was formed beside the throne of the Cæsars. Founded by this apostle, it consisted at first of some converted Jews, some Greeks, and some citizens of Rome. For a long time it shone like a pure light on a mountain top. Its faith was everywhere spoken of; but at length it fell away from its primitive condition. It was by small beginnings that the two Romes paved their way to the usurped dominion of the world.

The first pastors or bishops of Rome early engaged in the conversion of the villages and towns around the city. The necessity which the bishops and pastors of the Campagna di Roma felt of recurring, in cases of difficulty, to an enlightened guide, and the gratitude which they owed to the Church of the metropolis, led them to remain in close union with it. What has always been seen in analogous circumstances was seen here; this natural union soon degenerated into dependence. The superiority which the neighbouring churches had freely yielded, the bishops of Rome regarded as a right. The encroachments of power form one large part of history, while the resistance of those whose rights were invaded forms the other. Ecclesiastical power could not escape the intoxication which prompts all those who are raised to aim at rising still higher. It yielded to this law of humanity and nature.

Nevertheless, the supremacy of the Roman bishop was at this time limited to oversight of the churches within the territory civilly subject to the prefect of Rome. But the rank which this city of the Emperors held in the world, presented to the ambition of its first pastor a larger destiny. The respect paid in the second century to the different bishops of Christendom was proportioned to the rank of the city in which they resided. Now Rome was the greatest, the richest, and the most powerful city in the world. It was the seat of Empire,—the mother of nations; "All the inhabitants of the earth belong to it," says Julian; and Clandian proclaims it "the fountain of law."

If Rome is queen of the cities of the world, why should not its pastor be the king of bishops? Why should not the Roman Church be the mother of Christendom? Why should not the nations be her children, and her authority their sovereign law? It was easy for the ambitious heart of man to reason in this way. Ambitious Rome did so.

Thus Pagan Rome, when she fell, sent the proud titles which her invincible sword had conquered from the nations of the earth to the humble minister of the God of peace seated amidst her ruins.

The bishops in the different quarters of the empire, led away by the charm which Rome had for ages exercised over all nations, followed the example of the Campagna di Roma, and lent a hand to this work of usurpation. They took pleasure in paying to the Bishop of Rome somewhat of the honour which belonged to the Queen city of the world. At first there was no dependence implied in this honour. They treated the Roman pastor as equal does equal; but usurped powers grow like avalanches. What was at first mere brotherly advice, soon became, in the mouth of the Pontiff, obligatory command. In his eyes a first place among equals was a throne.

The Western bishops favoured the designs of the pastors of Rome, either from jealousy of the Eastern bishops, or because they preferred the supremacy of a pope to the domination of a temporal power.

On the other hand, the theological factions which rent the East sought, each in its turn, to gain the favour of Rome, anticipating their triumph from the support of the principal Church of the West.

Rome carefully registered these requests, these mediations, and smiled when she saw the nations throwing themselves into her arms. She let slip no occasion of increasing and extending her power. Praise, flattery, extravagant compliments, consultation by other churches, all became, in her eyes, and in her hands, titles and evidents of her authority. Such is man upon the throne; incense intoxicates him, and his head turns. What he has he regards as a motive to strive for more.

The doctrine of the Church, and of the necessity of her external unity, which began to prevail so early as the third century, favoured the pretensions of Rome. The primary idea of the Church is, that it is the assembly of the saints, (1 Cor. i. 2.) the assembly of the first-born whose names are written in heaven, (Heb.

xii. 23.) Still, however, the Church of the Lord is not merely internal and invisible. It must manifest itself outwardly; and it was with a view to this manifestation that the Lord instituted the Sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist. The Church, considered as external, has characteristics different from those which distinguish her as the Church invisible. The internal Church, which is the body of Christ, is necessarily and perpetually one. The visible Church, doubtless, has part in this unity, but considered in herself, multiplicity is a characteristic attributed to her in the Scriptures of the New Testament. While they speak to us of a Church of God, they mention, in speaking of the Church, as externally manifested, "the Churches of Galatia," "the Churches of Macedonia," "the Churches of Judea," "all the Churches of the Saints." These different Churches, unquestionably, may, to a certain extent, cultivate external union; but though this tie be wanting, they lose none of the essential qualities of the Church of Christ. In primitive times, the great tie which united the members of the Church was the living faith of the heart, by which all held of Christ as their common Head.

Various circumstances early contributed to originate and develop the idea of the necessity of an external unity. Men accustomed to the ties and political forms of an earthly country, transferred some of their views and customs to the spiritual and eternal kingdom of Jesus Christ. Persecution, powerless to destroy, or even to shake this new society, drew its attention more upon itself, and caused it to assume the form of a more compact incorporation. To the error which sprung up in deistical schools, or among sects, was opposed the one universal truth received from the Apostles, and preserved in the Church. This was well, so long as the invisible and spiritual Church was one with the visible and external Church. But a serious divorce soon took place; the form and the life separated from each other. The semblance of an identical and external organization was gradually substituted for the internal and spiritual unity which forms the essence of genuine religion. The precious perfume of faith was left out, and then men prostrated themselves before the empty vase which had contained it. The faith of the heart no longer uniting the members of the Church, another tie was sought, and they were united by means of bishops, archbishops, popes, mitres, ceremonies, and canons. The living Church having gradually retired into the hidden sanctuary of some solitary souls, the external Church was put in its place, and declared to be, with all its forms, of Divine institution. Salvation, no longer welling up from the henceforth hidden Word, it was maintained that it was transmitted by means of the forms which had been devised, and that no man could possess it if he did not receive it through this channel. None, it was said, can by his own faith attain to eternal life. Christ communicated to the Apostles, and the Apostles communicated to the Bishops, the unction of the Holy Spirit; and this Spirit exists nowhere but in that order! Originally, whosoever had the Spirit of Jesus Christ was a member of the Church; but the terms were now reversed, and it was maintained that none but members of the Church received the Spirit of Jesus Christ.¹

In proportion as these ideas gained ground, the distinction between clergy and people became more marked. The salvation of souls no longer depended solely on faith in Christ, but also, and more especially, on union with the Church. The representatives and heads of the Church obtained a part of the confidence due only to Jesus Christ, and in fact became mediators for the flock. The idea of the universal priesthood of Christians accordingly disappeared step by step; the servants of the Church of Christ were likened to the priests under the Old Dispensation; and those who separated from the bishop were put in the same class with Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. From an individual priesthood, such as was then formed in the Church, to a sovereign priesthood, such as Rome now claims, the step was easy.

In fact, as soon as the error as to the necessity of a visible unity of the Church was established, a new error was seen to arise,—viz., that of the necessity of an external representative of this unity.

Although we nowhere find in the Gospel any traces of a pre-eminence in St. Peter over the other Apostles; although the very idea of primacy is opposed to the fraternal relations which united the disciples, and even to the spirit of the Gospel dispensation, which, on the contrary, calls upon all the children of the Father to be servants one to another, recognizing one only teacher, and one only chief; and although Jesus Christ sharply rebuked His disciples, as often as ambitious ideas of pre-eminence arose in their carnal hearts, men invented, and by means of passages of Scripture ill understood, supported a primacy in St. Peter; and then in this apostle, and his pretended successors at Rome, saluted the visible representatives of visible unity—the heads of the Church!

The patriarchal constitution also contributed to the rise of the Roman Papacy. So early as the three first centuries, the churches of metropolitan towns had enjoyed particular respect. The Council of Nice, in its Sixth Canon, singled out three cities, whose churches had, according to it, an ancient authority over those of the surrounding provinces; these were, Alexandria, Rome, and Antioch. The political origin of this distinction is betrayed by the very name which was at first given to the bishop of these cities. He was called Exarch, in the same way as the civil governor. At a later period, the more ecclesiastical name of Patriarch was given to him. This name occurs for the first time in the Council of Constantinople, but in a different sense from that which it received at a later period; for it was only a short time before the Council of Chalcedon, that it was applied exclusively to the great metropolitans. The second œcumenical Council created a new patriarchate, that of Constantinople itself, the new Rome, the second capital of the empire. The Church of Byzantium, so long in obscurity, enjoyed the same privileges, and was put by the Council of Chalcedon in the same rank as the Church of Rome. Rome then shared the patriarchate with these three churches; but when the invasion of Mohammed annihilated the sees of Alexandria and Antioch—when the see of Constantinople decayed, and later, even separated from the west, Rome remained alone, and circumstances rallied all around her see, which from that time remained without a rival.

New accomplices, the most powerful of all accomplices, came also to her aid. Ignorance and superstition seized upon the Church, and gave her up to Rome with a bandage on her eyes, and chains on her hands. Still this slavery was not completed without opposition. Often did the voice of the churches protest their independence: this bold voice was heard especially in proconsular Africa and the East.¹

But Rome found new allies to stifle the cry of the churches. Princes, whom tempestuous times often caused to totter on the throne, offered her their support if she would in return support them. They offered her spiritual authority, provided she would reinstate them in secular power. They gave her a cheap bargain of souls, in the hope that she would help them to a cheap bargain of their enemies. The hierarchical power, which was rising, and the imperial power, which was declining, thus supported each other, and, by this alliance, hastened their double destiny.

Here Rome could not be a loser. An edict of Theodosius II., and of Valentinian III., proclaimed the Bishop of Rome "Rector of the whole Church." Justinian issued a similar edict. These decrees did not contain all that the popes pretended to see in them; but in those times of ignorance it was easy for them to give prevalence to the interpretation which was most in their favour. The power of the emperors in Italy becoming always more precarious, the Bishops of Rome failed not to avail themselves of the circumstance to shake off their dependence.

But energetic promoters of the Papal power had by this time emerged from the forests of the North. The barbarians, who had invaded the West, and there fixed their abode, after intoxicating themselves with blood and rapine, behoved to lower their fierce sword before the intellectual power which they encountered. Altogether new to Christianity, ignorant of the spiritual nature of the Church, and requiring in religion a certain external show, they prostrated themselves, half savages, and half Pagans, before the High Priest of Rome. With them the West was at his feet. First, the Vandals, then the Ostrogoths, a little later the Burgundians, afterwards the Visigoths, lastly, the Lombards and Anglo-Saxons, came to do obeisance to the Roman Pontiff. It was the robust shoulders of the sons of the idolatrous North which finished the work of placing a pastor of the banks of the Tiber on the supreme throne of Christendom.

These things took place in the West at the beginning of the seventh century, precisely at the same period when the power of Mohammed, ready also to seize on a portion of the globe, was rising in the East.

From that time the evil ceases not to grow. In the eighth century we see the Bishops of Rome with one hand repulsing the Greek Emperors, their lawful sovereigns, and seeking to chase them from Italy; while, with the other, they caress the Mayors of France, and ask this new power, which is beginning to rise in the West, for a share in the wrecks of the empire. Between the East, which she repels, and the West, which she invites, Rome establishes her usurped authority. She rears her throne between two revolts. Frightened at the cry of the Arabs, who, become masters of Spain, vaunt that they will soon arrive in Italy by the passes of the Pyrenees and the Alps, and proclaim the name of Mohammed on the seven hills—amazed at the audacious Astolphus, who, at the head of his Lombards, sends forth his lion-roar, and brandishes his sword before the gates of the eternal city, threatening massacre to every Roman.—Rome, on the brink of ruin, looks around in terror, and throws herself into the arms of the Franks. The usurper Pepin asks a pretended sanction to his new royalty; the Papacy gives it to him, and gets him in return to declare himself the defender of the "Republic of God." Pepin wrests from the Lombards what they had wrested from the emperor; but, instead of restoring it to him, he deposits the keys of the towns which he has conquered on the altar of St. Peter, and, swearing with uplifted hand, declares that it was not for a man he took up arms, but to obtain the forgiveness of his sins from God, and do homage to St. Peter for his conquests.

Charlemagne appears. The first time, he goes up to the Cathedral of St. Peter devoutly kissing the steps. When he presents himself a second time, it is as master of all the kingdoms which formed the empire of the West, and of Rome herself.

Leo III. deems it his duty to give the title to him who already has the power; and, in the year 800, at the feast of Noel, places on the head of the son of Pepin the crown of the Emperor of Rome. From that time the pope belongs to the empire of the Franks, and his relations with the East are ended. He detaches himself from a rotten tree, which is about to fall, in order to engraft himself on a vigorous wild stock. Among the Germanic races, to which he devotes himself, a destiny awaits him to which he had never ventured to aspire.

Charlemagne bequeathed to his feeble successors only the wrecks of his empire. In the ninth century, civil power being everywhere weakened by disunion, Rome perceived that now was the moment for her to lift her head. When could the Church better make herself independent of the State than at this period of decline, when the crown which Charles wore was broken, and its fragments lay scattered on the soil of his ancient empire?

At this time the spurious Decretals of Isidore appeared. In this collection of pretended decrees of the popes, the most ancient bishops, the contemporaries of Tacitus and Quintilian, spoke the barbarous Latin of the ninth century. The customs and constitutions of the Franks were gravely attributed to the Romans of the time of the emperors; popes quoted the Bible in the Latin translation of St. Jerome, who lived one, two, or three centuries after them; and Victor, Bishop of Rome, in the year 192, wrote to Theophilus, who was Archbishop of Alexandria, in 395. The impostor, who had forged this collection, strove to make out that all the bishops derived their authority from the Bishop of Rome, who derived his immediately from Jesus Christ. Not only did he record all the successive conquests of the pontiffs, but he, moreover, carried them back to the remotest periods. The popes were not ashamed to avail themselves of this despicable invention. As early as 865, Nicholas I. selected it as his armour to combat princes and bishops. This shameless forgery was for ages the arsenal of Rome.

Nevertheless, the vices and crimes of the pontiffs were for some time to suspend the effects of the Decretals. The Papacy celebrates its admission to the table of kings by shameful libations; it proceeds to intoxicate itself, and its head turns amidst the debauch. It is about this time that tradition places upon the Papal throne a damsel named Joan, who had fled to Rome with her lover; and, being taken in labour, betrayed her sex in the middle of a solemn procession. But let us not unnecessarily aggravate the disgrace of the Court of the Roman Pontiffs. Abandoned females did reign in Rome at this period. A throne, which pretended to exalt itself above the majesty of kings, grovelled in the mire of vice. Theodora and Marozia, at will, installed and deposed the pretended Masters of the Church of Christ, and placed upon the throne of Peter their paramours, their sons, and their grandsons. These scandalous proceedings, which are but too true, perhaps, gave rise to the tradition of Popess Joan.

Rome becomes a vast theatre of disorder, on which the most powerful families in Italy contend for ascendancy—the Counts of Tuscany usually proving victorious. In 1033, this house dares to place upon the pontifical throne, under the name of Benedict the Ninth, a young boy brought up in debauchery. This child of twelve, when pope, continues his ineffable turpitude. A faction elects Sylvester in his stead, and at length Pope Benedict, with a conscience loaded with adultery, and a hand dyed with the blood of murders,¹ sells the popedom to an ecclesiastic of Rome.

The Emperors of Germany, indignant at so many disorders, cleansed Rome with the sword. The empire, exercising its rights of superiority, drew the triple crown out of the mire into which it had fallen, and saved the degraded popedom by giving it decent men for heads. Henry III., in 1046, deposed three popes; and his finger, adorned with the ring of the Roman Patricians, pointed out the bishop to whom the keys of the confession of St. Peter were to be remitted. Four popes, all Germans, and nominated by the emperor, succeeded each other. When the pontiff of Rome died, deputies from that Church appeared at the imperial court, like the envoys from other dioceses, to request a new bishop. The emperor was even glad to see the pope reforming abuses, strengthening the Church, holding councils, inducting and deposing prelates, in spite of foreign monarchs; the Papacy, by these pretensions, only exalted the power of the emperor, its liege lord. But there was great danger in allowing such games to be played. The strength which the popes were thus resuming, by degrees, might be turned, all at once, against the emperor himself. When the viper recovered, it might sting the bosom which warmed it. This was what actually happened.

Here a new epoch in the Papacy begins. It starts up from its humiliation, and soon has the princes of the earth at its feet. To exalt it is to exalt the Church, is to aggrandize religion, is to secure to the mind its victory over the flesh, and to God His triumph over the world. These are its maxims, and in these ambition finds its profit, fanaticism its excuse.

The whole of this new tendency is personified in one man.—Hildebrand.

Hildebrand, by turns unduly extolled or unjustly stigmatized, is the personification of the Roman pontificate in its power and glory. He is one of those master spirits of history which contain in them an entire order of new things, similar to those presented in other spheres by Charlemagne, Luther, and Napoleon.

Leo IX. took up this monk in passing through Clugny, and carried him to Rome. From that time Hildebrand was the soul of the popedom, until he became the popedom itself. He governed the Church in the name of several pontiffs before his own reign under that of Gregory VII. One great idea took possession of this great genius. He wishes to found a visible theocracy, of which the pope, as vicar of Jesus Christ, will be head. The remembrance of the ancient universal dominion of Pagan Rome haunts his imagination, and animates his zeal. He wishes to restore to Papal Rome all that the Rome of the Emperors had lost. "What Marius and Cæsar," said his flatterers, "could not do by torrents of blood, thou performest by a word."

Gregory VII. was not led by the Spirit of the Lord. To this Spirit of truth, humility, and meekness, he was a stranger. He sacrificed what he knew to be true when he judged it necessary to his designs. In particular, he did so in the affair of Berenger. But a spirit far superior to that of the common run of pontiffs, a deep conviction of the justice of his cause, undoubtedly did animate him. Bold, ambitious, and inflexible in his designs, he was, at the same time, dexterous and supple in the employment of means to ensure their success.

His first labour was to embody the militia of the Church, for he behoved to make himself strong before he attacked the empire. A Council held at Rome cut off pastors from their families, and obliged them to belong entirely to the hierarchy. The law of celibacy, conceived and executed under popes who were themselves monks, changed the clergy into a kind of monastic order. Gregory VII. pretended to have over all the bishops and priests of Christendom the same power which an abbot of Clugny had over the order over which he presided. The legates of Hildebrand, comparing themselves to the proconsuls of ancient Rome, traversed the provinces to deprive pastors of their lawful wives; and if need were, the pope himself stirred up the populace against married ministers.¹

But Gregory's main purpose was to shake Rome free of the empire. This bold design he never would have ventured to conceive, had not the dissensions which troubled the minority of Henry IV., and the revolt of the German princes, favoured its execution. The pope was then like one of the grandees of the empire. Making common cause with the other great vassals, he forms a party in the aristocratic interest, and then forbids all ecclesiastics, under pain of excommunication, to receive investiture to their benefices from the Emperor. He breaks the ancient ties which unite churches and their pastors to the authority of the prince; but it is to yoke all of them to the pontifical throne. His aim is by a powerful hand to enchain priests, kings, and people, and make the pope a universal monarch. It is Rome alone that every priest must fear, in Rome alone that he must hope. The kingdoms and principdoms of the earth are his domain; and all kings must tremble before the thunder of the Jupiter of modern Rome. Woe to him who resists! Subjects are loosed from their oath of allegiance, the whole country is smitten with interdict, all worship ceases, the churches are shut, and their bells are mute; the sacraments are no longer administered, and the word of malediction reaches even to the dead, to whom the earth, at the bidding of a haughty pontiff, refuses the peace of the tomb.

The pope, who had been subject from the earliest days of his existence, first to the Roman Emperors, then to the Frank Emperors, and, lastly, to the German Emperors, was now emancipated, and walked, for the first time, their equal, if not, indeed, their master. Gregory VII. was, however, humbled in his turn; Rome was taken, and Hildebrand obliged to flee. He died at Salerno, saying, "I have loved righteousness and hated iniquity, therefore die I in exile." Words thus uttered at the portals of the grave who will presume to charge with hypocrisy!

The successors of Gregory, like soldiers who arrive after a great victory, threw themselves, as conquerors, on the subjugated churches. Spain, rescued from Islamism, Prussia, delivered from idols, fell into the hands of the crowned priest. The crusades, which were undertaken at his bidding, everywhere widened and increased his authority. Those pious pilgrims, who had thought they saw saints and angels guiding their armies, and who, after humbly entering the walls of Jerusalem barefoot, burned the Jews in their synagogues, and with the blood of thousands of Saracens, deluged the spots to which they had come, seeking the sacred footsteps of the Prince of Peace, carried the name of pope into the East, where it had ceased to be known from the time when he abandoned the supremacy of the Greeks for that of the Franks.

On the other hand, what the armies of the Roman republic and of the empire had not been able to do, the power of the Church accomplished. The Germans brought to the feet of a bishop the tribute which their ancestors had refused to the most powerful generals.

Their princes, on becoming emperors, thought they had received a crown from the popes; but the popes had given them a yoke. The kingdoms of Christendom, previously subjected to the spiritual power of Rome, now became its tributaries and serfs.

Thus every thing in the Church is changed. At first it was a community of brethren, and now an absolute monarchy is established in its bosom. All Christians were priests of the living God, (1 Peter ii. 9.) with humble pastors for their guides; but a proud head has risen up in the midst of these pastors, a mysterious mouth utters language full of haughtiness, a hand of iron constrains all men, both small and great, rich and poor, bond and slave, to take the stamp of its power. The holy and primitive equality of souls before God is lost; and Christendom, at the bidding of a man, is divided into two unequal camps,—in the one, a caste of priests who dare to usurp the name of Church, and pretend to be invested in the eyes of the Lord with high privileges,—in the other, servile herds reduced to blind and passive submission, a people gagged and swaddled, and given over to a proud caste. Every tribe, language, and nation of Christendom, fall under the domination of this spiritual king, who has received power to conquer.

Grace—Dead Faith—Works—Unity and Duality—Pelagianism—Salvation at the hands of Priests—Penance—Flagellations—Indulgences—Works of Supererogation—Purgatory—Taxation—Jubilee—The Papacy and Christianity—State of Christendom.

BUT, along with the principle which should rule the history of Christianity, was one which should rule its doctrine. The grand idea of Christianity was the idea of grace, pardon, amnesty, and the gift of eternal life. This idea supposed in man an estrangement from God, and an impossibility on his part to re-enter into communion with a Being of infinite holiness. The opposition between true and false doctrine cannot, it is true, be entirely summed up in the question of salvation by faith, and salvation by works. Still it is its most prominent feature, or rather, salvation considered as coming from man is the creating principle of all error and all abuse. The excesses produced by this fundamental error led to the Reformation, and the profession of a contrary principle achieved it. This feature must stand prominently out in an introduction to the history of the Reformation. Salvation by grace, then, is the second characteristic which essentially distinguished the religion of God from all human religions. What had become of it? Had the Church kept this great and primordial idea as a precious deposit? Let us follow its history.

The inhabitants of Jerusalem, Asia, Greece, and Rome, in the days of the first emperors, heard the glad tidings, "By grace are ye saved through faith—it is the gift of God," (Ephes. ii. 8.) At this voice of peace—at this gospel—at this powerful word—many guilty souls believing were brought near to Him who is the source of peace, and numerous Christian churches were formed in the midst of the corrupt generation then existing.

But a great misapprehension soon arose as to the nature of saving faith. Faith, according to St. Paul, is the means by which the whole being of the believer—his intellect, his heart, and his will—enter into possession of the salvation which the incarnation of the Son of God has purchased for him. Jesus Christ is apprehended by faith, and thenceforth becomes every thing for man, and in man. He imparts a divine life to human nature; and man, thus renewed, disengaged from the power of selfishness and sin, has new affections, and does new works. Faith (says Theology, in order to express these ideas) is the subjective appropriation of the objective work of Christ. If faith is not an appropriation of salvation, it is nothing; the whole Christian economy is disturbed, the sources of new life are sealed up, and Christianity is overturned at its base.

Such was the actual result. The practical view being gradually forgotten, faith soon became nothing more than what it still is to many,—an act of the understanding—a simple submission to superior authority.

This first error necessarily led to a second. Faith being stripped of its practical character, could not possibly be said to save alone. Works no longer coming after it, behoved to be placed beside it; and the doctrine that man is justified by faith and by works gained a footing in the Church. To the Christian union, which includes, under the same principle, justification and works, grace and law, doctrine and duty, succeeded the sad duality, which makes religion and morality to be quite distinct,—a fatal error, which separates things that cannot live unless united, and which, putting the soul on one side, and the body on the other, causes death. The words of the Apostle, echoing through all ages, are,—“Having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?” (Gal. iii. 3.)

Another great error arose to disturb the doctrine of grace. This was Pelagianism. Pelagius maintained that human nature is not fallen—that there is no hereditary corruption—and that man, having received the power of doing good, has only to will it in order to perform it.¹ If goodness consists in certain external actions, Pelagius is right. But if we look to the motives from which those external actions proceed, we find in every part of man selfishness, forgetfulness of God, pollution, and powerlessness. The Pelagian doctrine, driven back from the Church by Augustine, when it advanced with open front, soon presented a side view in the shape of semi-Pelagianism, and under the mask of Augustinian formulae. This heresy spread over Christendom with astonishing rapidity. The danger of the system appeared, above all, in this—by placing goodness, not within, but without, it caused a great value to be set on external works, on legal observances, and acts of penance. The more of these men did, the holier they were; they won heaven by them; and individuals were soon seen (a very astonishing circumstance, certainly) who went farther in holiness than was required. Pelagianism, at the same time that it corrupted doctrine, strengthened the hierarchy; with the same hand with which it lowered grace it elevated the Church; for grace is of God, and the Church is of man.

The deeper our conviction that the whole world is guilty before God, the more will we cleave to Jesus Christ as the only source of grace. With such a view, how can we place the Church on a level with Him, since she is nothing but the whole body of persons subject to the same natural misery? But so soon as we attribute to man a holiness of his own, all is changed, and ecclesiastics and monks become the most natural medium of receiving the grace of God. This was what happened after Pelagius. Salvation, taken out of the hands of God, fell into the hands of priests, who put themselves in the Lord's place. Souls thirsting for pardon behoved no longer to look towards heaven, but towards the Church, and, above all, towards its pretended head. To blinded minds the Pontiff of Rome was instead of God. Hence the greatness of the popes and indescribable abuses. The evil went farther still. Pelagianism, in maintaining that man may attain perfect sanctification, pretended, likewise, that the merits of saints and martyrs might be applied to the Church. A particular virtue was even ascribed to their intercession. They were addressed in prayer, their aid was invoked in all the trials of life, and a real idolatry supplanted the adoration of the true and living God.

Pelagianism, at the same time, multiplied rites and ceremonies. Man, imagining that he could, and that he ought, by good works, to render himself worthy of grace, saw nothing better fitted to merit it than outward worship. The law of ceremonies becoming endlessly complicated, was soon held equal at least to the moral law; and thus the conscience of Christians was burdened anew with a yoke which had been declared intolerable in the times of the apostles. (Acts xv. 10.)

But what most of all deformed Christianity, was the system of penance which rose out of Pelagianism. Penance at first consisted in certain public signs of repentance, which the Church required of those whom she had excluded for scandal, and who were desirous of being again received into her bosom.

By degrees, penance was extended to all sins, even the most secret, and was considered as a kind of chastisement to which it was necessary to submit, in order to acquire the pardon of God through the absolution of priests.

Ecclesiastical penance was thus confounded with Christian repentance, without which there cannot be either justification or sanctification.

Instead of expecting pardon from Christ only by faith, it was expected chiefly from the Church by works of penance.

Great importance was attached to the outward marks of repentance—tears, fastings, and macerations; while the internal renewal of the heart, which alone constitutes true conversion, was forgotten.

As confession and works of penance are easier than the extirpation of sin, and the abandonment of vice, many ceased to struggle against the lusts of the flesh, deeming it better to supply their place by means of certain macerations.

Works of penance, substituted in lieu of the salvation of God, kept multiplying in the Church from the days of Tertullian, in the third century. The thing now deemed necessary was to fast, go barefoot, and wear no linen, &c., or to quit house and home for distant lands; or, better still, to renounce the world and embrace the monastic state!

To all this were added, in the eleventh century, voluntary flagellations. These, at a later period, became a real mania in Italy, which at that time was violently agitated. Nobles and peasants, young and old, even children of five, go two-and-two by hundreds, thousands, and tens of thousands, through villages, towns, and cities, with an apron tied round their waist, (their only clothing,) and visit the churches in procession in the dead of winter. Armed with a whip, they flagellate themselves without mercy, and the streets resound with cries and groans, such as to force tears from those who hear them.

Still, long before the evil had reached this height, men felt the oppression of the priests, and sighed for deliverance. The priests themselves had perceived, that if they did not apply a remedy, their usurped power would be lost; and, therefore, they invented the system of barter, so well known under the name of Indulgences. What they said was this: "You penitents are not able to fulfil the tasks which are enjoined upon you? Well, then, we—priests of God, and your pastors—will take the heavy burden on ourselves." "For a fast of seven weeks," says Regino, Abbot of Prüm, "there will be paid by a rich man twentypence, by one less so twopenny, by the poor threepence, and so on in like proportion for other things." Bold voices were raised against this traffic, but in vain.

The pope soon discovered the advantages which he might draw from these indulgences. In the thirteenth century, Alexander Hales, the irrefragable doctor, invented a doctrine well fitted to secure this vast resource to the Papacy, and a bull of Clement VII. declared it an article of faith. Jesus Christ, it was said, did far more than was necessary to reconcile God to men,—for that a single drop of His blood would have sufficed; but He shed much blood, in order to found a treasury for His Church,—a treasury which even eternity should not be able to exhaust. The supererogatory merits of the saints—i. e., the value of the works which they did beyond their obligation—served also to augment this treasury, the custody and administration of which have been entrusted to Christ's vicar upon earth, who applies to each sinner, for the faults committed after baptism, these merits of Jesus Christ and the saints, according to the measure and quantity which his sins render necessary. Who will venture to attack a practice whose origin is so holy?

This inconceivable traffic soon extends, and becomes more complex. The philosophers of Alexandria speak of a fire in which souls are to be made pure. This philosophical opinion, which several ancient doctors had adopted, Rome declared to be a doctrine of the Church. The pope, by a bull, annexed purgatory to his domain. He decreed that man should there expiate what he might not be able to expiate here below, but that indulgences could deliver souls from that intermediate state in which their sins must otherwise detain them. This dogma is expounded by Thomas Aquinas in his famous theological Summa. Nothing was spared to fill the mind with terror. The torments which the purifying fire inflicts on those who become its victims were painted in dreadful colours. Even at the present day, in many Catholic countries, we see pictures exhibited in churches, or in the public streets, in which poor souls in the midst of burning flames are calling in agony for relief. Who could refuse the redemption-money which, on falling into the treasury of Rome, was to ransom the soul from such sufferings?

In order to give regularity to this traffic, there was shortly after drawn up (probably by John XXII.) the famous and scandalous taxation of indulgences, of which there have been more than forty editions.

Ears the least delicate would be offended were we to repeat all the horrible things contained in it.

Incest will cost, if it is not known, five groschen; if known, six. So much will be paid for murder, so much for infanticide, adultery, perjury, house-breaking, &c. "Shame upon Rome!" exclaims Claudius Espense, a Roman theologian; and we add, Shame upon human nature!—for we cannot reproach Rome with anything which does not recoil upon man himself. Rome is humanity magnified in some of its evil propensities. We say this for the sake of truth, and we also say it for the sake of justice.

Boniface VIII., the boldest and most ambitious of the popes after Gregory VII., outstripped all his predecessors.

In the year 1300 he published a bull, by which he announced to the Church, that every hundred years all persons repairing to Rome would there obtain a plenary indulgence. Crowds flocked from Italy, Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, France, Spain, Germany, Hungary, and all quarters. Old men of sixty and seventy set out; and there was counted at Rome in one month to the number of two hundred thousand pilgrims. All these strangers bringing rich offerings, the pope and the Romans saw their treasury filled.

Roman avarice soon fixed each jubilee at fifty years, next at thirty-three, and at last at twenty-five. Then, for the greater convenience of buyers, and the greater profit of sellers, the jubilee and its indulgences were transported from Rome to all parts of Christendom. There was no occasion to leave home. What others had gone to seek beyond the Alps, each might purchase at his own door.

The evil could not go further.

Then the Reformer arose.

We formerly saw what became of the principle which should rule the history of Christianity, and we have now seen what became of that which should rule its doctrine—both were lost.

To establish a mediating caste between man and God, and insist that the salvation which God gives shall be purchased by works, penances, and money, is the Papacy.

To give to all by Jesus Christ without a human mediator, and without that power, which is called the Church, free access to the great gift of eternal life, which God bestows on man, is Christianity and the Reformation.

The Papacy is an immense wall raised between man and God by the labour of ages. Whosoever would pass it must lay his account with paying or suffering. And yet will it not be passed?

The Reformation is the power which threw down this wall, restored Christ to man, and levelled the path by which he may come to his Creator.

The Papacy interposes the Church between God and man. Christianity and the Reformation make them meet face to face. The Papacy separates—the Gospel unites them.

Having thus traced the history of the decay and extinction of the two great principles which distinguish the religion of God from all the religions of man, let us attend to some of the results of this vast alteration.

First, however, let us pay some tribute of respect to this Church of the middle ages which succeeded that of the Apostles and Fathers, and preceded that of the Reformers. The Church, although decayed, and always more and more enslaved, still was the Church,—that is to say, still remained the most powerful friend that man possessed. Her hands, though tied, could still bless. During those ages, great servants of Jesus Christ—men who, in essential doctrines, were true Protestants—shed a benign light; and in the most humble convent, or the most obscure parish, were found poor monks and poor priests to solace deep griefs. The Catholic Church was not the Papacy. The latter acted the part of oppressor—the former, that of the oppressed. The Reformation, which declared war on the one, came to deliver the other. And yet, truth to tell, the Papacy itself was sometimes, in the hands of God, who brings good out of evil, a necessary counterpoise to the power and ambition of princes.

Religion—Relics—Easter Mementos—Manners—Corruption—Disorderly Lives of Priests, Bishops, and Popes—A Priest's Family—Education—Ignorance—Cleronians.

LET US NOW attend to the state of the Church before the Reformation.

The people of Christendom no longer expecting the gratuitous gift of eternal life from the true and living God, it was necessary, in order to obtain it, to have recourse to all the methods which a superstitious, timid, and frightened conscience could invent. Heaven is full of saints and mediators who can solicit the favour. Earth is full of pious works, sacrifices, observances, and ceremonies, which can merit it. Such is the picture of the religion of this period, as drawn by one who was long a monk, and afterwards a fellow-worker with Luther.

Myconius says,—“The sufferings and merits of Christ were as a vain tale, or as the Fables of Homer. Not a word was said of the faith by which the righteousness of the Saviour, and the inheritance of eternal life, are secured. Christ was a severe judge, ready to condemn all who did not recur to the intercession of saints, or the indulgences of popes. Instead of Him, there figured as intercessors, first the Virgin Mary, like the Diana of Paganism; and after her saints, of whom the popes were continually enlarging the catalogue. These mediators gave the benefit of their prayers only to those who had deserved well of the orders founded by them. For this it was necessary to do not what God commands in His Word, but a great number of works which monks and priests had devised, and which brought in large sums of money. These were, Ave-Marias, prayers of St. Ursula and St. Bridget. It was necessary to chant and cry night and day. There were as many places of pilgrimage as there were mountains, forests, or valleys. But these toils might be bought off with money. Money, therefore, and everything that had any value,—chickens, geese, ducks, eggs, wax, straw, butter, and cheese,—were brought to the convents and to the priests. Then chants resounded, and bells were rung, perfumes filled the sanctuary, and sacrifices were offered; kitchens were stuffed, glasses rattled, and masses winding up threw a cover over all these pious works. The bishops did not preach, but they consecrated priests, bells, monks, churches, chapels, images, books, cemeteries,—all these things yielding large returns. Bones, arms, and feet, were presented in gold and silver boxes. They were given out to be kissed during mass; and this, too, yielded a large profit.”

“All these folks maintained, that the pope being in the place of God, (2 Thess. ii. 4.) could not be deceived; and they would not hear of anything to the contrary.”

In the church of All Saints, at Wittenberg, were shown a piece of Noah's Ark—a small portion of soot from the furnace of the Three Young Men—a bit of the manger in which our Saviour was laid—hair from the beard of the great Christopher; and nineteen thousand other relics of greater or less value. At Schaffhausen was shown the breath of St. Joseph, which Nicodemus had received into his glove. In Wurtemberg, a vender of indulgences was seen selling his wares, and having his head adorned with a large feather, plucked from the wing of the archangel Michael. But there was no occasion to go to a distance in quest of these precious treasures. Persons with hired relics travelled the country, and hawked them about, as has since been done with the Holy Scriptures. The faithful, having them thus brought to their houses, were spared the trouble and expense of pilgrimage. Relics were exhibited with great ceremony in the churches, while those travelling hawkers paid a fixed sum to the owners, and also gave them so much per centage on their returns. The kingdom of heaven had thus disappeared, and men, to supply its place on the earth, had opened a disgraceful traffic.

In this way a profane spirit had invaded religion, and the most sacred seasons of the Church—those which, most forcibly and powerfully, invited the faithful to self-examination and love—were dishonoured by buffoonery and mere heathen blasphemies. The “Easter Drolleries” held an important place in the acts of the Church. As the festival of the resurrection required to be celebrated with joy, every thing that could excite the laughter of the hearers was sought out, and thrust into sermons. One preacher imitated the note of the cuckoo, while another hissed like a goose. One dragged forward to the altar a layman in a cassock,—a second told the most indecent stories,—a third related the adventures of the Apostle Peter; among others, how, in a tavern, he cheated the host by not paying his score. The inferior clergy took advantage of the occasion to turn their superiors into ridicule. The churches were thus turned into stages, and the priests into mountebanks.

If such was the state of religion, what must that of morals have been? It is true—and equity requires we should not forget—that, at this time, corruption was not universal. Even when the Reformation took place, much piety, righteousness, and religious vigour, were brought to light. Of this, the mere sovereignty of God was the cause; but still, how can it be denied, that He had previously deposited the germs of this new life in the bosom of the Church? In our own day, were all the immoralities and abominations which are committed in a single country brought together, the mass of corruption would, undoubtedly, fill us with alarm. Still it is true, that, at this period, evil presented itself in a form, and with a universality, which it has never had since. In particular, the abomination of desolation was seen standing in the holy place, to an extent which has not been permitted since the period of the Reformation.

With faith morality had decayed. The glad tidings of eternal life is the power of God for the regeneration of man. But take away the salvation which God gives, and you take away purity of heart and life. This was proved by the event.

The doctrine and the sale of indulgences operated on an ignorant people as a powerful stimulus to evil. It is no doubt true, that (according to the doctrine of the Church) indulgences were of use only to those who promised to amend, and actually kept their promise. But what was to be expected of a doctrine which had been invented with a view to the profit which it might be made to yield? The vendors of indulgences, the better to dispose of their wares, were naturally disposed to present them in the most winning and seductive form. Even the learned were not too well informed on the subject; while the only thing seen by the multitude was, that indulgences gave them permission to sin. The merchants were in no haste to disabuse them of an error so greatly in favour of the trade.

In those ages of darkness, what disorders and crimes must have prevailed when impunity could be purchased with money! What ground could there be for fear, when a trifling contribution to build a church procured exemption from punishment in the world to come? What hope of renovation, when all direct communication between men and their God had ceased.—when, estranged from Him, their spirit and life, they moved to and fro, among frivolous ceremonies and crude observances, in an atmosphere of death?

The priests were the first to yield to the corrupting influence. In wishing to raise, they had lowered themselves. They had tried to steal from God a ray of His glory, that they might place it in their own bosom; but, instead of this, had only placed in it some of the leaven of corruption, stolen from the Evil One. The annals of the period teem with scandalous stories. In many places people were pleased to see their priest keeping a mistress, in the hope that it might secure their wives from seduction. How humbling the scene which the house of such a priest must have presented! The unhappy man maintained the woman, and the children she might have borne him, out of tithes and alms. His conscience upbraided him: he blushed before his people, his servants, and his God. The woman, fearing that, in the event of the priest's death, she might become destitute, sometimes made provision beforehand, and played the thief in her own house. Her honour was gone; and her children were a living accusation against her. Objects of universal contempt, both parties rushed into quarrelling and dissipation. Such was the home of a priest! . . . In these fearful scenes, the people read a lesson of which they were not slow to avail themselves.

The rural districts became the theatre of numerous excesses. The places where priests resided were often the abodes of dissoluteness. Corneille Adrian at Bruges, and Abbot Trinker at Cappel, imitated the manners of the East, and had their harems. Priests, associating with low company, frequented taverns and played at dice; crowning their orgies with quarrels and blasphemy. The Council of Schaffhausen issued an order forbidding priests to dance in public, except at marriages; or to carry more than one kind of weapon. They, moreover, ordered that such priests as were found in houses of bad fame should be strip of their cassocks. In the archbishopric of Mayence they leapt the walls at night, and then shouted and revelled in all sorts of debauchery within taverns and inns. Doors and locks were not secure from their attacks. In several places each priest was liable to the bishop in a certain tax for the female he kept, and for every child she bore him. One day, a German bishop, who was attending a great festival, openly declared, that in a single year, the number of priests who had been brought before him for this purpose, amounted to eleven thousand. This account is given by Erasmus.

Among the higher orders of the priesthood the corruption was equally great. The dignitaries of the Church preferred the turmoil of camps to chanting at the altar; and to take linen in hand, and reduce those around them to obedience, was one of the first qualities of a bishop. Baldwin of Tours, who was constantly warring with his vassals and neighbours, razed their castles, built others of his own, and thought of nothing but enlarging his territory. It is told of a certain bishop of Eichstadt, that when he sat in his court, he had a coat-of-mail under his gown, and a large sword in his hand. One of his sayings was, that in fair fight he was not afraid of five Bavarians. The bishops and the inhabitants of the towns where they resided were perpetually at war. The burghers demanded freedom, while the priests insisted on absolute obedience. When the latter proved victorious, they punished revolt, and satiated their vengeance with numbers of victims; but the flame of insurrection burst forth at the very moment when they imagined they had suppressed it. And what a spectacle was presented by the pontifical throne at the period immediately preceding the Reformation! To say the truth, even Rome was not often witness to such infamy.

Roderigo Borgia, after he had lived with a lady of Rome, continued the same illegitimate intercourse with her daughter, Rosa Vanozza, and had five children by her. This man, a cardinal and an archbishop, was living at Rome with Vanozza, and other females besides, frequenting churches and hospitals, when the pontifical chair became vacant by the death of Innocent VIII. Borgia secured it by buying each cardinal for a regular price. Four mules loaded with gold publicly entered the palace of Cardinal Sforza, the most influential among them. Borgia became pope under the name of Alexander VI., and was delighted at having thus reached the pinnacle of pleasure.

On his coronation-day, he appointed his son Caesar, a youth of ferocious temper and dissolute habits, Archbishop of Valencia and Bishop of Pampeluna. Then, when his daughter Lucretia was married, he celebrated the occasion in the Vatican, with fêtes which were attended by his mistress, Julia Bella, and enlivened by comedies and obscene songs. "All the ecclesiastics," says a historian, "had mistresses, and all the convents of the capital were houses of bad fame." Caesar Borgia espoused the faction of the Guelphs, and when, by their assistance, he had destroyed the Ghibelins, he turned round upon the Guelphs, and, in like manner, destroyed them. But he was unwilling that any should share the spoil with him, and, therefore, after Alexander had, in 1497, made his eldest son Duke of Benevento, the duke disappeared. George Schiavoni, a dealer in wood on the banks of the Tiber, one night saw a dead body thrown into the river, but said nothing; such occurrences were common. The dead body proved to be that of the duke, who had been murdered by his brother Caesar.¹ Nor was this enough. Having taken offence at his brother-in-law, he made him be stabbed on the stair of the pontifical palace. The wounded man, covered with blood, was carried to his apartment, where he was constantly watched by his wife and sister, who, dreading Caesar's poison, prepared his food with their own hands. Alexander placed sentinels at his door, but Caesar laughed at their precautions; and as the pope was going to see his son-in-law, Caesar said to him, "What is not done at dinner will be done at supper." In short, he one day forced his way into the room, drove out the wife and sister, and calling in his executioner, Michilotto,—the only person to whom he shewed any confidence,—looked on while his brother-in-law was strangled. Alexander had a favourite, named Peroto. The pope's partiality for him offended the young duke. He pursued him; and Peroto, taking refuge under the pontifical mantle, clasped the pope in his arms. Caesar stabbed him, and the blood of his victim sprang into the pontiff's face. "The pope," adds a contemporary witness to these scenes, "loves his son the duke, and is much afraid of him." Caesar was the handsomest and most powerful man of his age. He fought with six wild bulls, and despatched them with ease. Every morning at Rome persons were found who had been assassinated during the night, while poison carried off those whom the sword could not reach. Men dared not to move or breathe in Rome, every one trembling till his own turn should arrive. Caesar Borgia was the hero of crime. The spot of earth where iniquity attained this dreadful height was the pontifical throne. When once man has given himself over to the powers of darkness, the higher the station he pretends to occupy in the sight of God, the deeper he sinks into the abysses of hell. The dissolute fêtes which were given in the pontifical palace by the pope, his son Caesar, and his daughter Lucretia, cannot be described, or even thought of, without horror. The impure groves of antiquity, perhaps, never saw the like. Historians have accused Alexander and Lucretia of incest, but the proof seems defective. The pope had prepared poison for a rich cardinal, in a small box of comfits which were to be served after a sumptuous repast. The Cardinal being put on his guard, bribed the steward, and the poisoned box was placed before Alexander, who ate of it and died. The whole city ran to see the dead viper, and could not get enough of the sight.

Such was the man who occupied the pontifical see at the beginning of the century in which the Reformation commenced.

The clergy having thus brought religion and themselves into disrepute, a powerful voice might well exclaim, "The ecclesiastical state is opposed to God and to His glory. The people well know this, and but too well do they shew it, by the many songs, proverbs, and jests, against priests, which are current among the lower classes, and by all those caricatures of monks and priests which we see on all the walls, and even on playing cards. Every man feels disgust when he sees or when he hears of an ecclesiastic." These are Luther's words.

The evil had spread through all ranks. A spirit of error had been sent to men, corruption of manners kept pace with corruption of faith, and a mystery of iniquity lay like an incubus on the enslaved Church of Jesus Christ.

There was another consequence which necessarily resulted from the oblivion into which the fundamental doctrine of the Gospel had fallen. Ignorance was the companion of corruption. The priests having taken into their own hands the distribution of a salvation which belongs only to God, deemed this a sufficient title to the respect of the people. What occasion had they to study sacred literature? Their business was not to expound the Scriptures, but to give diplomas of indulgence—a ministry which called not for the laborious acquisition of extensive knowledge.

In the rural districts, says Wimpfeling, the persons selected for preachers were miserable creatures, who had been previously raised from beggary, cast-off cooks, musicians, huntsmen, grooms, and still worse.

The higher clergy were often sunk in deep ignorance. A Bishop of Dunfeld congratulated himself that he had never learned either Greek or Hebrew; while the monks contended that all heresies sprang out of these languages, and especially out of the Greek.

"The New Testament," said one of them, "is a book full of briars and serpents. The Greek," continued he, "is a new language recently invented, and of it we ought specially to beware. As to Hebrew, my dear brethren, it is certain that all who learn it, that very instant become Jews." We quote from Heresbach, a friend of Erasmus, and a respectable writer. Thomas Linacer, a learned and celebrated ecclesiastic, had never read the New Testament. In the last days of his life, (in 1524,) he caused a copy of it to be brought, but immediately dashed it from him with an oath, because, on opening it, he had lighted on these words, "I say unto you. Swear not at all." Now he was a great swearer. "Either this is not the Gospel," said he, "or we are not Christians." Even the Theological Faculty of Paris did not hesitate at this time to say, in presence of the Parliament, "It is all over with religion if the study of Greek and Hebrew is allowed." If, among ecclesiastics, there were a scattered few who had made some attainments, it was not in sacred literature. The Ciceronians of Italy affected great contempt for the Bible because of its style. Men calling themselves priests of the Church of Jesus Christ, translated the writings of holy men inspired by the Spirit of God into the style of Virgil and Horace, in order to adapt them to the ears of good society. Cardinal Bembo, instead of the Holy Spirit, wrote the breath of the heavenly zephyr; instead of to forgoe sins—to bend the knees and the Sovereign God; and instead of Christ the Son of God—Minerva sprung from the forehead of Jupiter. Having one day found the respectable Sadolet engaged in translating the Epistle to the Romans, he said to him, "Leave off this child's play; such trifling ill becomes a man of gravity."

Such are some of the consequences of the system under which Christendom then groaned. Our picture, undoubtedly, proves both the corruption of the Church and the necessity of a Reformation; and it was this we proposed in sketching it. The vital doctrines of Christianity had almost entirely disappeared, and with them the light and life which constitute the essence of genuine religion. The strength of the Church had been wasted; and its body, enfeebled and exhausted, lay stretched, almost without life, over the whole extent which the Roman empire had occupied.

THE evils which then afflicted Christendom, viz., superstition, infidelity, ignorance, vain speculation, and corruption of manners—all natural fruits of the human heart—were not new upon the earth. Often had they figured in the history of States. In the East, especially, various religions which had had their day of glory, but had become enervated, had been attacked by them, and, yielding to the assault, had fallen under it, never again to rise. Is Christianity to experience the same fate? Will she be destroyed like these ancient popular religions? Will the blow which gave them death be strong enough to deprive her of life? Is there nothing that can save her? Will those hostile powers that now oppress her, and which have already overthrown so many other forms of worship, be able to seat themselves without opposition on the ruins of the Church of Jesus Christ?

No! There is in Christianity what there was not in any of those popular religions. It does not, like them, present certain abstract ideas, interwoven with traditions and fables, destined to fall, sooner or later, under the attacks of human reason. It contains pure truth, founded on facts capable of standing the scrutiny of every upright and enlightened mind. Christianity does not aim merely at exciting certain vague religious sentiments, which, when they have once lost their charm, cannot be again revived. Its end is to satisfy; and it, in fact, does satisfy all the religious wants of human nature, whatever the degree of refinement to which it may have attained. It is not the work of man, whose labours fade and are effaced; it is the work of God, who sustains what He creates; and the pledge of its duration is the promise of its divine Head.

It is impossible that human nature can ever rise so high as to look down on Christianity; or if, for a time, human nature do think herself able to dispense with it, it soon appears with renewed youth and life, as alone fit for curing souls. Degenerate nations then return with new ardour to those ancient, simple, and powerful truths, which, in the hour of their infatuation, they had turned from with disdain.

Christianity, in fact, displayed, in the sixteenth century, the same regenerating power which it had exerted in the first. After fifteen centuries the same truths produced the same results. In the days of the Reformation, as in those of Paul and Peter, the Gospel, with invincible force, overthrew the mightiest obstacles. Its sovereign power was manifested from north to south among nations differing most widely from each other in manners, character, and intellectual development. Then, as in the days of Stephen and James, it lighted up the fire of enthusiasm and devotedness in nations which seemed almost extinguished, and exalted them even to the height of martyrdom.

How was this revival of the Church and of the world accomplished?

The observer might then have seen the operation of two laws by which God governs the world at all times.

First, as He has ages to act in, He begins His preparations leisurely, and long before the event which He designs to accomplish.

Then, when the time is come, He produces the greatest results by the smallest means. It is thus He acts in nature and in history. When He wishes an immense tree to grow, He deposits a little grain in the earth; and when He wishes to renew His Church, He employs the humblest instrument to accomplish what emperors and all the learned and eminent in the Church were unable to perform. By-and-by we will search for and we will discover this little seed which a Divine hand deposited in the earth in the days of the Reformation; but, at present, let us endeavour to ascertain the various means by which God prepared this great event.

At the period when the Reformation was ready to burst forth, Rome appeared to be in peace and safety. One would even have said that nothing could disturb her triumph after the great victories which she had gained. General Councils—those Upper and Lower Houses of Catholicity—had been subdued. The Vaudois and the Hussites had been suppressed. No university, with the exception, perhaps, of that of Paris, which sometimes raised its voice when its kings gave the signal, doubted the infallibility of the oracles of Rome. Each seemed to have accepted his allotted share in her power. The higher clergy deemed it better to give a distant chief the tenth part of their revenues, and quietly consume the other nine, than to hazard all for an independence which would cost much and yield little. The lower clergy, deceived by the perspective of rich benefices, which ambition made them fancy and discover in the distance, were willing, by a little slavery, to realize the flattering hopes which they entertained. Besides, they were almost everywhere so oppressed by the chiefs of the hierarchy, that they could scarcely struggle under their powerful grasp, far less rise boldly and hold up their heads. The people knelt before the Roman altar; and kings themselves, though they began in secret to despise the Bishop of Rome, durst not venture to attack his power with a hand which the age would have deemed sacrilegious.

But opposition, if it seemed externally to have slackened, or even ceased, when the Reformation burst forth, had more inward strength. A nearer view of the edifice will disclose to us more than one symptom which presaged its downfall. General Councils, though vanquished, had diffused their principles throughout the Church, and carried division into the enemy's camp. The defenders of the hierarchy were divided into two parties,—viz., those who maintained the system of absolute Papal domination, on the principles of Hildebrand, and those who were desirous of a constitutional Papal government, offering guarantees and giving liberty to the churches.

Nor was this the whole. Faith in the infallibility of the Roman bishop was greatly shaken among all parties; and if no voice was raised in opposition to it, it was because every one rather desired anxiously to retain the little faith in it which he still had. The least shock was dreaded, because it might overturn the edifice. Christendom held in its breath; but it was to prevent a disaster by which its own existence might have been endangered. From the moment when man trembles at the thought of abandoning a long venerated belief, it has lost its influence over him; and even the appearance of respect which he may be desirous to keep up will not be long maintained. The Reformation had been gradually prepared in three different worlds—the political, the ecclesiastical, and the literary. Political bodies, private Christians, and theologians, the literary and the learned, all contributed to the revolution of the sixteenth century. Let us take a survey of this triple opposition, concluding with the literary class; though, at the period immediately preceding the revolution, it was, perhaps, the most powerful of all.

First, among political bodies, Rome had lost much of its ancient credit. Of this the Church herself was the primary cause; for, properly speaking, it was not the errors and superstitions which she had introduced into Christianity that gave the fatal blow. Before Christendom could have been able to condemn her on this account, it must have stood higher than the Church, in respect of intellectual and religious development. But there was a class of things which the laity well understood, and it was by these they judged the Church. She had become of the "earth, earthy." The sacerdotal empire, which tyrannized over the nations, existed solely by the illusions of its subjects; and having a hulo for its crown, had forgotten its nature, and left heaven, with his spheres of light and glory, to plunge into the vulgar interests of burghers and princes. Though representing those who are born of the Spirit, the priests had exchanged the Spirit for the flesh. They had abandoned the treasures of knowledge, and the spiritual power of the Word, for the brute force and tinkling of the age.

The thing happened naturally enough. At first the Church pretended that her object was to defend spiritual order. But in order to protect it from the opposition and assaults of the people, she had resorted to earthly means, to vulgar weapons, which a false prudence had induced her to take up. When the Church had once begun to handle such weapons, her spirituality was at an end. Her arm could not become temporal without rendering her heart temporal also. The appearance presented soon became the reverse of what it had been at the outset. At first, she had thought proper to employ the earth in defending heaven; now she employed heaven to defend the earth. Theocratic forms became in her hands merely a mean of accomplishing worldly interests. The offerings which the people laid at the feet of the sovereign pontiff of Christendom were expended in maintaining the luxury of his court, and the soldiers of his armies. His spiritual power served him as a ladder on which to climb, and then put the kings and nations of the earth under his feet. The charm broke, and the power of the Church was lost as soon as the men of the world could say, "She is become as one of us."

The great were the first to examine the titles of this imaginary power. This examination might, perhaps, have been sufficient to overthrow Rome; but, happily for her, the education of princes was everywhere in the hands of her adepts. These inspired their august pupils with sentiments of veneration for the Roman pontiff. The rulers of the people grew up within the sanctuary, and princes of ordinary capacity could never entirely quit it. Several even had no other ambition than to be found in it at the hour of death. They preferred to die under a cassoock rather than a crown.

Italy, that apple of discord in Europe, perhaps contributed most to open the eyes of kings. Having occasion to communicate with popes on matters which concerned the temporal prince of the States of the Church, and not the Bishop of bishops, they were greatly astonished when they saw them ready to sacrifice rights which appertained to the pontiff, in order to secure certain advantages to the prince. They discovered that these pretended organs of truth had recourse to all the petty wiles of politics, to deceit, dissimulation, and perjury. Then, at length, the bandage which education had tied upon the eyes of princes fell off. Then wily Ferdinand of Arragon tried stratagem against stratagem. Then the impetuous Louis XII. caused a medal to be struck with this inscription, "Perdam Babylonis nomen."¹ And honest Maximilian of Austria, grieved to the heart on learning the treachery of Leo X., declared openly,—"Henceforth this pope, too, is to me nothing better than a villain; now I can say, that throughout my life not one pope has kept faith with me, or been true to his word. If it please God, I hope that this one will be the last."

Kings and states began, moreover, to feel impatient under the heavy burden which the popes imposed on them, and to demand that Rome should free them from contributions and annats, which wasted their resources. Already had France opposed Rome with the pragmatic sanction, and the heads of the empire claimed to share in it. In 1511 the emperor took part in the Council of Pisa, and had even at one time an idea of seizing the popedom for himself. But, among the rulers of the people, none were so useful to the Reformation as the prince in whose states it was to commence.

Of all the Electors of that period, the most powerful was Frederick of Saxony, surnamed the Wise. Having succeeded, in 1487, to the hereditary states of his family, he had received the electoral dignity from the emperor, and in 1493 undertook a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, where he was dubbed "Knight of the Holy Sepulchre." His power and influence, his riches and liberality, raised him above all his equals. God chose him to be the tree under whose shelter the seed of truth might be able to push forth its first blade, without being uprooted by storms from without.²

No man was better fitted for this noble service. Frederick possessed the general esteem, and, in particular, had the entire confidence of the emperor, whom he even represented in his absence. His wisdom consisted not in the dexterous arts of a wily politician, but in an enlightened and foreseeing prudence—the first maxim of which was, never to offer violence, from interested motives, to the laws of honour and religion.

At the same time, he felt in his heart the power of the word of God. One day when Staupitz, the Vicar-General, was with him, the conversation turned upon those who entertained the people with vain declamation. "All discourses," said the Elector, "which are filled only with subtleties and human traditions, are wondrously cold, nerveless, and feeble. It is impossible to advance one subtlety which another subtlety cannot destroy. The Holy Scriptures alone are clothed with such power and majesty, that, destroying all our learned logical contrivances, they press us home, and constrain us to exclaim, 'Never man so spake.'" Staupitz having signified that he was entirely of this opinion, the Elector shook him cordially by the hand, and said, "Promise me that you will always think so."

Frederick was just the prince required at the outset of the Reformation. Too much feebleness on the part of its friends might have allowed it to be strangled; while too much haste might have caused the storm, which at the very first began with hollow murmuring sound to gather against it, to burst too soon. Frederick was moderate, but strong. He had that Christian virtue which God always requires in those who would adore His ways—he waited upon God. He put in practice the wise counsel of Gamaliel—"If this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it." (Acts v. 38, 39.) "Matters," said this prince to Spengler of Nuremberg, one of the most enlightened men of his time,—"matters are come to such a point, that there is nothing more which men can do in them; God alone must act. To His mighty hand, therefore, we commit these great events, which are too difficult for us." Providence made an admirable choice in selecting such a prince to protect His work in its infancy.

THE discoveries made by kings had gradually extended to their subjects. The wise began to habituate themselves to the idea that the Bishop of Rome was only a man, and sometimes even a very bad man. They had a suspicion that he was no holier than the bishops, whose reputation was very equivocal. The licentiousness of the popes roused the indignation of Christendom, and hatred of the Roman name rankled in the heart of the nations.³

Numerous causes concurred in facilitating the deliverance of the different countries of the West. Let us glance at these countries.

The empire was a confederation of different states, with an emperor at their head,—each state having supreme authority within its own territory. The Imperial Diet, composed of all the princes or sovereign states, legislated for the whole Germanic body. It belonged to the emperor to ratify the laws, decrees, or resolutions of the assembly, and to see them applied and carried into execution; while the seven most powerful princes, under the title of Electors, had the disposal of the imperial crown.

The north of Germany, inhabited chiefly by the ancient Saxon race, had acquired the greatest degree of freedom. The emperor, incessantly attacked by the Turks in his hereditary possessions, was obliged to court those princes and bold nations whose aid was then necessary to him. Free towns in the north, west, and south of the empire, had, by their trade, their manufactures, and exertions of every description, risen to a high degree of prosperity, and thereby of independence; but the powerful house of Austria, then invested with the imperial crown, held the greater part of the southern States of Germany under its control, and closely watched their movements. It was preparing to extend its dominion over the whole empire, and even beyond it, when the Reformation interposed a mighty barrier to its encroachments, and saved the independence of Europe.

As Judea, when Christianity arose, was in the centre of the ancient world, so Germany was in the centre of Christendom, looking at once toward the Netherlands, England, France, Switzerland, Italy, Hungary, Bohemia, Poland, Denmark, and all the North. It was in the heart of Europe that the principle of life was to be developed; and the beatings of this heart were to circulate through all the arteries of the body the noble blood which was to give animation to all its members.

The particular constitution which the empire had received conformably to the dispensation of Providence, favoured the propagation of new ideas. Had Germany been a monarchy properly so called, like France or England, the arbitrary will of the monarch might have been able long to arrest the progress of the Gospel. But it was a confederation. Truth attacked in one state might be received with favour in another.

The internal peace which Maximilian had just secured for the empire was not less favourable to the Reformation. For a long time the numerous members of the Germanic body had taken pleasure in tearing each other. Nought had been seen but trouble and discord, war incessantly renewed, neighbour against neighbour, town against town, and noble against noble. Maximilian had given a solid basis to public order, by erecting the Imperial Chamber, with power to decide in all questions between different states. The inhabitants of Germany, after all their troubles and disquietudes, saw the commencement of a new era of security and repose. Nevertheless, when Luther appeared, Germany still presented to the observing eye that kind of motion which agitates the sea after long protracted storms. The calm was uncertain. More than one example of this will be seen as we proceed. By giving an entirely new impulse to the Germanic nations, the Reformation put an end for ever to all the former causes of agitation. Destroying the system of barbarism, which had till then been paramount, it put Europe in possession of a new system.

Christianity had, at the same time, exercised a peculiar influence on Germany. The middle classes had made rapid improvement. Throughout the different quarters of the empire, and more especially in the free towns, were numerous institutions well fitted to improve the great mass of the population. In these arts flourished. The burghers, devoting themselves in security to the calm toils and sweet relations of social life, became more and more accessible to knowledge, and in this way were continually acquiring new influence and authority. The foundation of the Reformation in Germany was not to be laid by magistrates, who must often shape their conduct according to political exigencies, nor by nobles fired with the love of military glory, nor by a greedy and ambitious clergy, working religion for profit, as if it were their exclusive property. The task was reserved for the citizens, the commonalty, the great body of the people.

The national character of the Germans was specially fitted to adapt itself to a religious Reformation. No spurious civilization had enervated it. The precious seed, which the fear of God deposits in the bosom of a people, had not been thrown to the winds. Ancient manners yet existed, displaying themselves in that integrity and fidelity, that love of labour, that perseverance, that serious temper, which is still to be seen, and gives presage of greater success to the Gospel, than the jeering levity or boorish temper of some other European nations.

The people of Germany were indebted to Rome for the great instrument of modern civilization, viz. faith, polish, learning, laws, all, save their courage and their arms, had come from the sacerdotal city, and, in consequence, Germany had ever after been in close alliance with the Papacy. The one was a kind of spiritual conquest by the other, and we all know to what purposes Rome has invariably applied her conquests. Nations which were in possession of faith and civilization before a Roman pontiff existed, always maintained in regard to him a greater measure of independence. Still the more thorough the subjugation of the German, the more powerful will the reaction be when the period of awakening shall arrive. When Germany does open her eyes, she will indignantly break loose from the chains which have so long held her captive. The bondage she has had to endure will make her more sensible of her need of deliverance; and freedom, and bold champions of the truth, will come forth from this house of hard labour and bondage, in which all her people have, for ages, been confined.

There was, at that time, in Germany, what the politicians of our days call a "see-saw system." When the emperor was of a resolute character, his power increased; when, on the contrary, he was of a feeble character, the influence and power of the princes and electors were enlarged. Never had these felt themselves stronger in regard to their chief than in the time of Maximilian, at the period of the Reformation; and as he took part against it, it is easy to understand how favourable the circumstance of his comparative weakness must have been to the propagation of the Gospel.

Moreover, Germany was tired of what the Romans derisively styled "the patience of the Germans." They had indeed shewn much patience from the days of Louis of Bavaria, when the emperors laid down their arms, and the tiara was placed, without opposition, above the crown of the Cæsars.

The contest, however, had done little more than change its place, by descending several steps. The same struggles which the emperors and popes had exhibited to the world were soon renewed, on a smaller scale, in all the towns of Germany, between the bishops and the magistrates. The burghers took up the sword which the emperors had allowed to drop from their hands. As early as 1329, the burghers of Frankfort on the Oder had intrepidly withstood all their ecclesiastical superiors. Excommunicated for having continued faithful to the Margrave Louis, they had been left for twenty-eight years without mass, baptism, marriage, or Christian burial; and, when the monks and priests made their re-entry, they laughed at it as a comedy or farce,—sad symptoms, doubtless, but symptoms of which the clergy were the cause. At the period of the Reformation this opposition between the magistrates and ecclesiastics had increased. The privileges of the former, and the temporal pretensions of the latter, were constantly causing jostling and collision between the two bodies.

But burgomasters, councilors, and secretaries of towns, were not the only persons among whom Rome and the clergy found opponents. Wrath was at the same time fermenting among the people, and broke out as early as 1502, when the peasantry, indignant at the grinding yoke of their ecclesiastical sovereigns, entered into a combination which goes under the name of the Shoe-Alliance.

Thus everywhere, both in the upper and lower regions of society, a grumbling sound was heard,—a precursor of the thunder which was soon to burst. Germany seemed ripe for the work which the sixteenth century had received as its task. Providence, which moves leisurely, had every thing prepared, and the very passions which God condemns were to be overruled by His mighty hand for the accomplishment of His designs.

Let us see how other nations were situated.

Thirteen small republics, placed with their confederates in the centre of Europe among mountains, forming, as it were, its citadel, contained a brave and simple people. Who would have gone to those obscure valleys in quest of persons who, with the sons of Germany, might be the deliverers of the Church? Who would have thought that petty unknown towns, just emerging from barbarism, hid behind inaccessible mountains, at the extremity of nameless lakes, would, in point of Christianity, take precedence of Jerusalem, Antioch, Ephesus, Corinth, and Rome? Nevertheless, it so pleased Him who wills that one spot of earth be watered with dew, and that another spot on which the rain has not descended shall remain parched, (Amos.)

There were other circumstances besides which might have been expected to throw numerous obstacles in the way of the Reformation among the Helvetic Republics. If, in a monarchy, the impediments of power were to be dreaded, the thing to be feared in a democracy was the precipitation of the people.

But Switzerland had also had its preparations. It was a wild but noble tree, which had been preserved in the bosom of the valleys, in order that a valuable fruit might one day be engrafted on it. Providence had diffused among this new people principles of independence and freedom, destined to display their full power whenever the signal for contest with Rome should be given. The pope had given the Swiss the title of Protectors of the Liberty of the Church; but they seem to have taken the honourable appellation in a very different sense from the pontiff. If their soldiers guarded the pope in the vicinity of the ancient Capitol, their citizens, in the bosom of the Alps, carefully guarded their religious liberties against the assaults of the pope and the clergy. Ecclesiastics were forbidden to apply to a foreign jurisdiction. The "Letter of the Priests" (Pfaffenbrief, 1370) was an energetic protestation of Swiss liberty against the abuses and power of the clergy. Amongst these states, Zurich was distinguished for its courageous opposition to the pretensions of Rome. Geneva, at the other extremity of Switzerland, was at war with its bishop. These two towns particularly signalized themselves in the great struggle which we have undertaken to describe.

But if the Swiss towns, accessible to every kind of improvement, were among the first to fall in with the movement of reform, it was otherwise with the inhabitants of the mountains. The light had not yet travelled so far. These cantons, the founders of Swiss freedom, proud of the part which they had performed in the great struggle for independence, were not readily disposed to imitate their younger brethren of the plains. Why change the faith with which they had chased Austria, and which had, by its altars, consecrated all the scenes of their triumph? Their priests were the only enlightened guides to whom they could have recourse. Their worship and their festivals gave a turn to the monotony of their tranquil life, and pleasantly broke the silence of their peaceful retreats. They remained impervious to religious innovation.

On crossing the Alps, we find ourselves in that Italy which was, in the eyes of the majority, the Holy Land of Christendom. Whence should Europe have expected the good of the Church if not from Italy—if not from Rome? Might not the power which by turns raised so many different characters to the pontifical chair, one day place in it a pontiff who would become an instrument of blessing to the heritage of the Lord? Or if pontiffs were to be despaired of, were there not bishops and councils who might reform the Church? Nothing good comes out of Nazereth; but out of Jerusalem—out of Rome! . . . Such might be the thoughts of men, but God thought otherwise. He said, "Let him who is filthy, be filthy still," (Rev. xxii.) and abandoned Italy to her iniquities. This land of ancient glory was alternately a prey to intestine wars and foreign invasion. The wiles of politics, the violence of faction, the turmoil of war, seemed to have sole sway, and to banish far away both the Gospel and its peace.

Besides, Italy, broken, dismembered, and without unity, seemed little fitted to receive a common impulse. Each frontier was a new barrier where truth was arrested.

And if the truth was to come from the North, how could the Italians, with a taste so refined, and a society in their eyes so exquisite, condescend to receive any thing at the hands of barbarous Germans? Were men who admired the cadence of a sonnet more than the majesty and simplicity of the Scriptures, a propitious soil for the seed of the divine word? But be this as it may in regard to Italy, Rome was still to continue Rome. Not only did the temporal power of the popes dispose the different Italian factions to purchase their alliance and favour at any price; but, in addition to this, the universal ascendancy of Rome presented various attractions to the avarice and vanity of the ultramontane states. The moment that the question of emancipating the rest of the world from Rome should be raised, Italy would again become Italy, domestic quarrels would not prevail to the advantage of a foreign system. Attacks on the head of the Peninsular family would at once revive affections and common interests which had long been in abeyance.

The Reformation had, therefore, little chance in that quarter. And yet there did exist, beyond the mountains, individuals who had been prepared to receive the Gospel light, and Italy was not entirely disinherited.

Spain had what Italy had not—a grave, noble, and religiously-disposed people. At all times has it numbered men of piety and learning among its clergy, while it was distant enough from Rome to be able easily to shake off the yoke. There are few nations where one might have more reasonably hoped for a revival of that primitive Christianity which Spain, perhaps, received from St. Paul himself. And yet Spain did not raise her head among the nations. She was destined to fulfil the declaration of Divine Wisdom,—“The first shall be last.” Various circumstances led to this sad result.

Spain, in consequence of its isolated position, and its distance from Germany, must have felt only slight shocks of the great earthquake which so violently heaved the empire. It was, moreover, engrossed with treasures very different from those which the word of God then offered to the nations. The new world eclipsed the eternal world. A land altogether new, and apparently of silver and gold, inflamed all imaginations. An ardent desire for riches left no room in a Spanish heart for nobler thoughts. A powerful clergy, with scaffolds and treasures at its disposal, ruled the Peninsula. The Spaniard willingly yielded a servile obedience to his priests, who, disburdening him of the prior claims of spiritual occupation, left him free to follow his passions, and to run the way of riches, discoveries, and new continents. Victorious over the Moors, Spain had, at the expense of her noblest blood, pulled down the crescent from the walls of Grenada, and many other cities, and, in its place, planted the cross of Jesus Christ. This great zeal for Christianity, which seemed to give bright hopes, turned against the truth. Why should Catholic Spain, which had vanquished infidelity, not oppose heresy? How should those who had chased Mohammed from their lovely country allow Luther to penetrate into it? Their king did even more. They fitted out fleets against the Reformation, and in their eagerness to vanquish it, went to seek it in Holland and England. But these attacks aggrandized the nations against which they were directed, and their power soon crushed Spain. In this way these Catholic regions lost, through the Reformation, even that temporal prosperity which was the primary cause of their rejection of the spiritual liberty of the Gospel. Nevertheless, it was a brave and generous people that dwelt beyond the Pyrenees. Several of their noble sons with the same ardour, but with more light than those who had shed their blood in Moorish dungeons, came to lay their life, as an offering, on the faggot piles of the Inquisition.

It was nearly the same with Portugal as with Spain. Emmanuel the Happy gave it an age of gold, which must have unfitted it for the self-denial which the Gospel demands. The Portuguese, rushing into the recently discovered routes to the East Indies and Brazil, turned their backs on Europe and the Reformation.

Few nations might have been thought more disposed than France to receive the Gospel. Almost all the intellectual and spiritual life of the middle ages centred in her. One would have said that the paths were already beaten for a great manifestation of the truth. Men who were the most opposed to each other, and who had the greatest influence on the French people, felt that they had some affinity with the Reformation. St. Bernard had given an example of that heart-felt faith, that inward piety, which is the finest feature of the Reformation; while Abelard had introduced into the study of theology that reasoning principle, which, incapable of establishing truth, is powerful in destroying falsehood. Numerous heretics, so called, had rekindled the flames of the word of God in the French provinces. The University of Paris had withstood the Church to the face, and not feared to combat her. At the beginning of the fifteenth century, the Clemangis and the Gersons had spoken out boldly. The pragmatic sanction had been a great act of independence, and promised to prove the palladium of the Gallican liberties. The French nobility, so numerous and so jealous of their precedence, and who, at this period, had just seen their privileges gradually suppressed to the extension of the influence of the crown, must have felt favourably disposed towards a religious revolution, the effect of which might be to restore a portion of the independence which they had lost. The people—lively, intelligent, and open to generous emotions—were accessible to the truth in a degree as great, if not greater, than any other people. The Reformation might have promised to be, in this nation, the birth that was to crown the long travail of many ages. But the Church of France, which seemed for so many generations to have been rushing in the same direction, turned suddenly round at the moment of the Reformation, and took quite a contrary direction. Such was the will of Him who guides nations and their rulers. The prince who then sat in the chariot and held the reins, and who, as a lover of letters, might have been thought likely to be the first to second reform, threw his people into another course. The symptoms of several centuries proved fallacious, and the impulse given to France struck and spent itself on the ambition and fanaticism of its kings. The Valois took the place which she ought to have occupied. Perhaps, if she had received the Gospel, she would have become too powerful. God was pleased to take the feeblest nations—nations that as yet were not—to make them the depositaries of His truth. France, after having been almost reformed, ultimately found herself again become Roman Catholic. The sword of princes thrown into the scale, made it incline towards Rome. Alas! another sword, that of the Reformed themselves, completed the ruin of the Reformation. Hands habituated to the sword, unlearned to pray. It is by the blood of its confessors, and not by that of its enemies, that the Gospel triumphs.

At this time the Netherlands was one of the most flourishing countries in Europe. It contained an industrious population, enlightened by the numerous relations which it maintained with the different quarters of the world, full of courage, and zealous to excess for its independence, its privileges, and its freedom. Placed on the threshold of Germany, it must have been one of the first to hear the sound of the Reformation. Two parties, quite distinct from each other, occupied these provinces. The more southern one was surfeited with wealth, and submitted. How could all those manufactures, carried to the highest perfection—how could that boundless traffic by land and sea—how could Bruges, the great entrepôt of the trade of the north—how could Antwerp, that queen of commercial cities, accommodate themselves to a long and sanguinary struggle for points of faith? On the contrary, the northern provinces, defended by their sands, the sea, and their inland waters; and still more, by the simplicity of their manners, and their determination to lose all sooner than the Gospel, not only saved their franchises, their privileges, and their faith, but also conquered their independence, and a glorious national character.

England scarcely seemed to promise what she has since performed. Repulsed from the Continent, where she had so long been obstinately bent on conquering France, she began to throw her eye towards the ocean, as the domain which was to be the true scene of her conquests, and which was reserved for her inheritance. Twice converted to Christianity—once under the ancient Britons, and the second time under the Anglo-Saxons,—she very devoutly paid to Rome the annual tribute of St. Peter. But she was reserved for high destinies. Mistress of the ocean, and present at once in all the different quarters of the globe, she, with the nations that were to spring from her, was one day to be the hand of God in shedding the seeds of life over the remotest islands and the largest continents. Already several circumstances gave a presentiment of her destiny. Bright lights had shone in the British Isles, and some glimmerings still remained. A multitude of foreigners, artists, merchants, and mechanics, arriving from the Netherlands, Germany, and other countries, filled their cities and their sea-ports. The new religious ideas must have been conveyed easily and rapidly. In fine, the reigning monarch was an eccentric prince, who, possessed of some knowledge and great courage, was every moment changing his projects and ideas, and turning from side to side, according to the direction in which his violent passions blew. It was possible that one of the inconsistencies of Henry VIII. might prove favourable to the Reformation.

Scotland was at this time agitated by factions. A king five years old, a queen regent, ambitious nobles, and an influential clergy, kept this bold nation in constant turmoil. It was, nevertheless, one day to hold a first place among those that received the Reformation.

The three kingdoms of the North—Denmark, Sweden, and Norway—were united under a common sceptre. These rude and warlike nations seemed to have little in common with the doctrine of love and peace. And yet, by their very energy, they were, perhaps, more disposed than the people of the South to receive the evangelical doctrine in its power. But, the descendants of warriors and pirates, they brought, it would seem, too warlike a character to the Protestant cause; at a later period, their sword defended it with heroism.

Russia, retired at the extremity of Europe, had few relations with other states, and belonged, moreover, to the Greek communion. The Reformation effected in the Western exerted little or no influence on the Eastern Church.

Poland seemed well prepared for a reform. The vicinity of the Christians of Bohemia and Moravia had disposed it to receive, while the vicinity of Germany must have rapidly communicated, the evangelical impulse. So early as 1500, the nobility of Poland Proper had demanded the cup for the laity, appealing to the usage of the primitive Church. The liberty enjoyed by its towns, and the independence of its nobles, made it a safe asylum for Christians persecuted in their own country, and the truth which they brought thither was received with joy by a great number of its inhabitants. In our days, however, it is one of the countries which has the smallest number of confessors.

The flame of reformation, which had long gleamed in Bohemia, had been almost extinguished in blood. Nevertheless, precious remains, which had escaped the carnage, still survived to see the day of which John Huss had a presentiment.

Hungary had been torn by intestine wars under the government of princes without character and without experience, and who had at last yoked the fate of their people to Austria, by giving this powerful House a place among the heirs of the crown.

Such was the state of Europe at the beginning of the sixteenth century, which was destined to produce so mighty a transformation in Christian society.

HAVING pointed out the state of nations and princes, we now proceed to the preparation for Reform, as existing in Theology and in the Church.

The singular system of Theology which had been established in the Church must have powerfully contributed to open the eyes of the rising generation. Made for an age of darkness, as if such an age had been to exist for ever, it seemed destined to become obsolete and defective in all its parts as soon as the age should have improved. Such was the actual result. The popes had from time to time made various additions to Christian doctrine. They had changed or taken away whatever did not accord with their hierarchy; while anything not contrary to their system was allowed to remain till further orders. This system contained true doctrines, such as redemption, and the influence of the Holy Spirit; and these in able theologian, if any such then existed, might have employed to combat and overthrow all the rest. The pure gold, mingled with the worthless lead in the treasury of the Vatican, made it easy to detect the imposition. It is true, that when any bold opponent called attention to it, the fanner of Rome immediately threw out the pure grain. But these very proceedings only increased the confusion.

This confusion was unbounded, and the pretended unity was only a heap of disunion. At Rome there were doctrines of the Court, and doctrines of the Church. The faith of the metropolis differed from the faith of the provinces; while in the provinces, again, the variation was endless. There was a faith for princes, a faith for the people, and a faith for religious orders. Opinions were classed as belonging to such a convent, such a district, such a doctor, such a monk.

Truth, in order to pass peacefully through the time when Rome would have crushed her with an iron sceptre, had done, like the insect which with its threads forms the chrysalis in which it shuts itself up during the cold season. And strange enough, the instruments which divine truth had employed for the purpose were the so much decried schoolmen. These industrious artificers of thought had employed themselves in unravelling all theological ideas, and out of the numerous threads had made a veil under which the ablest of their contemporaries must have found it difficult to recognize the truth in its original purity. It seems a sad thing, that an insect, full of life, and sometimes glowing with the most brilliant colours, should enclose itself, apparently without life, in its dark cocoon; and yet it is the shroud that saves it. It was the same with truth. Had the selfish and sinister policy of Rome, in the days of her ascendancy, met the truth in naked simplicity, she would have destroyed, or at least tried to destroy it; but disguised as it was, by the theologians of the time, under subtleties and endless distinctions, the popes either saw it not, or thought that, in such a state, it could not do them harm. They accordingly patronized both the workmen and their work. But spring might come, and then forgotten truth might lift her head and throw aside her shroud. In her seeming tomb, having acquired new strength, she might now again prove victorious over Rome and all its errors. This spring arrived. At the moment when the absurd trappings of the schoolmen were falling off under the attack of skilful hands, and amid the jeers of the new generation, truth made her escape, and came forth all young and beautiful.

But not merely did the writings of the schoolmen bear powerful testimony in favour of truth. Christianity had everywhere imparted a portion of her own life to the life of the people. The Church of Christ was like a building which had fallen into ruin; in digging among its foundations, a portion of the solid rock on which it had been originally founded was discovered. Several institutions, which dated from the pure times of the Church, were still existing, and could not fail to suggest to many minds evangelical ideas utterly at variance with the prevailing superstitions. Moreover, the inspired writers and ancient doctors of the Church, whose writings were extant in many libraries, occasionally sent forth a solitary voice; and may we not hope that this voice was listened to in silence by more than one attentive ear? Let us not doubt, (and how sweet the thought!) Christians had many brothers and many sisters in those monasteries, in which we are too ready to see nothing but hypocrisy and dissoluteness.

The Church had fallen in consequence of having lost the grand doctrine of Justification by faith in the Saviour; and hence, before she could rise, it was necessary that this doctrine should be restored. As soon as it was re-established in Christendom, all the errors and observances which had been introduced, all that multitude of saints, pious works, penances, masses, indulgences, &c., beloved to disappear. As soon as the one Mediator and His one sacrifice were recognized, all other mediators and other sacrifices were done away. "This article of justification," says one whom we may regard as divinely illumined on the subject,¹ "is that which creates the Church, nourishes, builds up, preserves, and defends her. No man can teach well in the Church, or successively resist an adversary, unless he hold fast by this truth. This" adds the writer from whom we quote, "is the heel which bruises the Serpent's head."

God, who was preparing His work, raised up during the revolution of ages a long series of witnesses to the truth. But the truth to which those noble men bore testimony, they knew not with sufficient clearness, or at least were unable to expound with sufficient distinctness. Incapable of accomplishing the work, they were just what they should have been in order to prepare it. We must add, however, that if they were not ready for the work, the work was not ready for them. The measure was not yet filled up. Ages had not accomplished their destined course, and the need of a true remedy was not generally felt.

No sooner had Rome usurped power than a powerful opposition was formed against her,—an opposition which extended across the middle ages.

In the ninth century, Archbishop Claude of Turin, and in the twelfth century, Peter of Bruges, his disciple Henry, and Arnold of Brescia, in France and in Italy, endeavour to establish the worship of God in spirit and in truth. Generally, however, in searching for this worship, they confine it too much to the exclusion of images and external observances.

The Mystics, who have existed in almost all ages, seeking in silence for holiness of heart, purity of life, and tranquil communion with God, cast looks of sadness and dismay on the desolation of the Church. Carefully abstaining from the scholastic brawls and useless discussions under which true piety had been buried, they endeavoured to withdraw men from the vain mechanism of external worship, and from the mire and glare of ceremonies, that they might lead them to the internal repose enjoyed by the soul which seeks all its happiness in God. This they could not do without coming at every point into collision with accredited opinions, and without unveiling the sores of the Church. Still they had no clear view of the doctrine of justification by faith.

The Vaudois, far superior to the Mystics in purity of doctrine, form a long chain of witnesses to the truth. Men enjoying more freedom than the rest of the Church, appear to have inhabited the heights of the Alps in Piedmont from ancient times; and their numbers were increased, and their doctrine purified, by the followers of Valdo. From their mountain tops the Vaudois, during a long series of ages, protest against the superstitions of Rome.¹ "They contend for the living hope which they have in God through Christ, for regeneration, and inward renewal by faith, hope, and charity, for the merits of Jesus Christ, and the all-sufficiency of His righteousness and grace."²

Still, however, this primary truth of a sinner's justification, this capital doctrine, which ought to have risen from the midst of their doctrines, like Mont Blanc from the bosom of the Alps, has not due prominence in their system. Its top is not high enough.

In 1170, Peter Vaud, or Valdo, a rich merchant at Lyons, sells all his goods and gives to the poor. He, as well as his friends, seem to have had it in view practically to realize the perfection of primitive Christianity. He, accordingly, begins in like manner with the branches, and not the root. Nevertheless, his word is powerful, because of his appeal to Scripture, and shakes the Roman hierarchy to its very foundations.

In 1360, Wickliffe appears in England, and appeals from the pope to the word of God; but the real internal sore of the Church is, in his eyes, only one of the numerous symptoms of disease.

HUSS BEFORE THE COUNCIL

John Huss lifts his voice in Bohemia a century before Luther lifts his in Saxony. He seems to penetrate farther than his predecessors into the essence of Christian truth. He asks Christ to give him grace to glory only in His cross, and in the inestimable weight of His sufferings; but his attention is directed less against the errors of the Roman Church, than the scandalous lives of its clergy. He was, however, if we may so speak, the John Baptist of the Reformation. The flames of his martyrdom kindled a fire in the Church, which threw immense light on the surrounding darkness, and the rays of which were not to be so easily extinguished.

John Huss did more; prophetic words came forth from the depth of his dungeon. He had a presentiment, that the true Reformation of the Church was at hand. So early as the period when, chased from Prague, he had been forced to wander in the plains of Bohemia, where his steps were followed by an immense crowd of eager hearers, he had exclaimed, "The wicked have begun to lay perfidious nets for the Bohemian goose;"³ but if even the goose, which is only a domestic fowl, a peaceful bird, and which never takes a lofty flight into the air, has, however, broken their toils, other birds of loftier wing will break them with much greater force. Instead of a feeble goose, the truth will send eagles and falcons, with piercing eye." The Reformers fulfilled this prediction.

And after the venerable priest had been summoned before the Council of Constance, after he had been thrown into prison, the chapel of Bethlehem, where he had proclaimed the Gospel and the future triumphs of Jesus Christ, occupied him more than his defence. One night the holy martyr thought he saw, in the depth of his dungeon, the features of Jesus Christ, which he had cause to be painted on the walls of his study, effaced by the pope and the bishops. The dream distresses him; but next day he sees several painters employed in restoring the pictures in greater number and splendour. Their task finished, the painters, surrounded by a great multitude, exclaim, "Now, let popes and bishops come, they never shall efface them more." John Huss adds, "Many people in Bethlehem rejoiced, and I among them." "Think of your defence, rather than of dreams," said his faithful friend, Chevalier de Chlum, to whom he had communicated the dream. "I am not a dreamer," replied Huss; "but this I hold for certain—the image of Christ will never be effaced. They wished to destroy it, but it will be painted anew in men's hearts by far abler preachers than I. The nation which loves Jesus Christ will rejoice; and I, awaking among the dead, and, so to speak, rising again from the tomb, will thrill with joy."

A century elapsed, and the torch of the Gospel, rekindled by the Reformers, did, in fact, illumine several nations which rejoiced in its light.

But in those ages a word of life is heard not only among those whom Rome regards as its adversaries; Catholicity itself—let us say it for our comfort—contains in its bosom numerous witnesses to the truth. The primitive edifice has been consumed; but a noble fire is slumbering under its ashes, and we see it from time to time throwing out brilliant sparks.

It is an error to suppose that, up to the Reformation, Christianity existed only under the Roman Catholic form; and that, at that period only, a part of that church assumed the form of Protestantism.

Among the doctors who preceded the sixteenth century, a great number, doubtless, inclined to the system which the Council of Trent proclaimed in 1562; but several also inclined to the doctrines professed at Augsburg, in 1530, by the Protestants—the majority, perhaps, vibrated between the two.

Anselm of Canterbury lays down the doctrines of the incarnation and expiation as of the essence of Christianity. And in a treatise, in which he teaches how to die, he says to the dying person, "Look only to the merits of Jesus Christ." St. Bernard, with powerful voice, proclaims the mystery of redemption. "If my fault comes from another," says he, "why should not my righteousness also be derived? Certainly, it is far better for me to have it given me, than to have it innate." Several schoolmen, and after them Chancellor Gerson, forcibly attack the errors and abuses of the Church.

But, above all, let us think of the thousands of obscure individuals unknown to the world, who, however, possessed the true life of Christ.

A monk named Arnaldi, daily in his quiet cell utters this fervent exclamation, "O Jesus Christ, my Lord! I believe that thou alone art my redemption and my righteousness."

Christopher of Utenheim, a pious bishop of Basle, causes his name to be written on a picture painted on glass, and surrounds it with this inscription, that he may have it always under his eye, "The cross of Christ is my hope; I seek grace, and not works."

Friar Martin, a poor Carthusian, wrote a touching confession, in which he says, "O most loving God! I know there is no other way in which I can be saved and satisfy thy justice, than by the merit, the spotless passion, and death of thy well-beloved Son. Kind Jesus! all my salvation is in thy hands. Thou canst not turn the arms of thy love away from me, for they created, shaped, and ransomed me. In great mercy, and in an ineffable manner, thou hast engraved my name with an iron pen on thy side, thy hands, and thy feet," &c. Then the good Carthusian places his confession in a wooden box, and deposits the box in a hole which he had made in the wall of his cell.

The piety of Friar Martin would never have been known had not the box been found (21st December, 1776) in taking down an old tenement which had formed part of the Carthusian Convent at Basle.

But this touching faith these holy men had only for themselves, and knew not how to communicate to others. Living in retreat, they might more or less say, as in the writing which Friar Martin put into his box, "Et si hæc prædicta confiteri non possim lingua, confiteor tamen corde et scripto."—"And these things aforesaid, if I cannot confess with the tongue, I, however, confess with the heart and in writing." The word of truth was in the sanctuary of some pious souls; but, to use a Scripture expression, it had not "free course" in the world. Still, if the doctrine of salvation was not always confessed aloud, there were some in the very bosom of the Church of Rome who, at least, feared not to declare openly against the abuses which dishonoured it.

Scarcely had the Councils of Constance and Basle, which condemned Huss and his followers, been held, than the noble series of witnesses against Rome, to which we have been pointing, again appears with greater lustre. Men of a noble spirit, revolting at the abominations of the Papacy, rise up like the prophets under the Old Testament, like them sending forth a voice of thunder, and with a similar fate. Their blood reddens the scaffold, and their ashes are thrown to the wind.

Thomas Conecte, a Carmelite, appears in Flanders, and declares, "that abominations are done at Rome; that the Church has need of reformation; and that, in the service of God, one must not fear the excommunications of the pope." Flanders listens with enthusiasm, but Rome burns him in 1432, and his contemporaries exclaim that God has exalted him to heaven.

André, Archbishop of Crayn, and a Cardinal, being at Rome as the ambassador of the emperor, is amazed when he sees that the holiness of the pope, in which he had devoutly believed, is only a fable; and in his simplicity he addresses evangelical representations to Sixtus IV. He is answered with mockery and persecution. Then (1482) he wishes a new Council to be assembled at Basle. "The whole Church," exclaims he, "is shaken by divisions, heresies, sins, vices, iniquities, errors, and innumerable evils; so much so, that it is on the eve of being swallowed up by the devouring abyss of condemnation. This is my only reason for proposing a General Council for the Reformation of the Catholic faith, and the amendment of manners." The Archbishop of Basle was thrown into the prison of that town, and there died. Henry Institoris, the inquisitor, who first moved against him, used these remarkable words: "The whole world is crying out and demanding a Council; but no human power can reform the Church by means of a Council. The Almighty will find another method, which is now unknown to us, though it is at the door; and by this method the Church will be brought back to its primitive condition." This remarkable prophecy, pronounced by an inquisitor at the very period of Luther's birth, is the finest apology for the Reformation.

The Dominican, Jerome Savonarola, shortly after he had entered the order at Bologna, in 1473, devotes himself to constant prayer, fasting, and macerations, and exclaims, "O thou who art good, in thy goodness teach me thy righteousness." Translated to Florence in 1489, he preaches with effect; his voice is thrilling, his features animated, his action beautifully attractive. "The Church," exclaims he, "must be renewed." And he professes the grand principle which alone can restore life to it. "God," says he, "forgives man his sin, and justifies him in the way of mercy. For every justified person existing on the earth, there has been an act of compassion in heaven; for no man is saved by his works. None can glory in themselves; and if, in the presence of God, the question were put to all the righteous, 'Have you been saved by your own strength?' they would all with one voice exclaim, 'Not unto us, O Lord, but unto thy name be the glory.' Wherefore, O God, I seek thy mercy, and I bring thee not my own righteousness; the moment thou justifiest me by grace, thy righteousness belongs to me; for grace is the righteousness of God. So long, O man, as thou believest not, thou art, because of sin, deprived of grace. O God! save me by thy righteousness, that is, by thy Son, who alone was found righteous among men." Thus the great and holy doctrine of justification by faith gladdens the heart of Savonarola. In vain do the prelates of the Church oppose him; he knew that the oracles of God are superior to the visible Church, and that he must preach them with her, without her, or in spite of her.—"Fly far from Babylon," exclaims he. It is Rome he thus designates. Rome soon answers him in her own way. In 1497 the infamous Alexander launches a brief at him, and in 1498 torture and faggot do their work on the Reformer.

A Franciscan, named John Vitraire, of Tournay, whose monastic spirit seems not of a very elevated description, nevertheless declaims forebly against the corruption of the Church. "It were better for a man," says he, "to cut his child's throat than put it into a religion not reformed. If your curate, or any other priest, keep women in his house, you ought to go and drag the women by force, or in any other way, pell-mell, out of the house. There are some persons who say prayers to the Virgin Mary, in order that, at the hour of death, they may see the Virgin Mary. Thou shalt see the devil, and not the Virgin Mary." The monk was ordered to retract, and he did so in 1498.

John Laillier, a Doctor of Sorbonne, declares, in 1484, against the tyrannical domination of the hierarchy. "All ecclesiastics," says he, "have received equal power from Christ. The Roman Church is not the head of other churches. You ought to keep the commandments of God and the Apostles; and in regard to the command of all the bishops and other lords of the Church, care no more for it than you would for a straw; they have destroyed the Church by their tricks. The priests of the Eastern Church sin not in marrying; and, believe me, neither shall we in the Western Church, if we marry. Since St. Sylvester the Church of Rome has been, not a church of Christ, but a church of State and money. We are no more bound to believe the legends of the saints than the Chronicles of France."

John of Wessalia, a doctor of theology at Erfurt, a man of great spirit and intellect, attacks the errors on which the hierarchy rests, and proclaims the holy Scriptures to be the only source of faith. "It is not religion [that is, the monastic state] that saves us," says he to some monks, "but the grace of God. God has from all eternity kept a book in which He has entered all His elect. Whosoever is not entered there, will not through eternity; and whosoever is, will never see his name erased. It is solely by the grace of God that the elect are saved. He whom God is pleased to save, by giving him grace, will be saved, though all the priests in the world were to condemn and excommunicate him. And he whom God sees meet to condemn, though these should all wish to save him, will be made to feel his condemnation. How audacious in the successors of the apostles to order, not what Christ has prescribed in His holy books, but what they themselves devised, when carried away, as they now are, by a thirst for money, or a rage for power. I despise the pope, the Church, and the Councils, and I extol Jesus Christ." Wessalia, who had gradually arrived at those convictions, boldly announces them from the pulpit, and enters into communication with deputies from the Hussites. Feeble, bent with age, and wasted by disease, the courageous old man, with tottering step, appears before the Inquisition, and, in 1482, dies in its dungeons.

About the same time John de Goch, prior at Malines, extolled Christian liberty as the soul of all the virtues. He charged the received doctrine with Pelagianism, and surnamed Thomas Aquinas the "Prince of Error." "Canonical Scripture alone," said he, "deserves full faith, and has an irrefragable authority. The writings of the ancient Fathers are of authority only in so far as they are conformable to canonical truth. There is truth in the common byword, 'What a monk dares undertake, Satan would blush to think.'"

But the most remarkable of the forerunners of the Reformation was undoubtedly John Wessel, surnamed "The Light of the World," a man full of courage and love for the truth, who taught theology successively at Cologne, Louvain, Paris, Heidelberg, and Gröningen. Luther said of him, "Had I read his works sooner, it might have been said, Luther has drawn everything from Wessel; so much do his spirit and mine accord." "St. Paul and St. James," says Wessel, "say different, but not contrary things. Both hold that the just live by faith, but a faith which works by love. He who, understanding the Gospel, believes, desires, hopes, confides in the good news, and loves Him who justifies and blesses him, gives himself entirely to Him whom he loves, and attributes nothing to himself, knowing that in himself he has nothing. The sheep should distinguish between the things on which they feed, and avoid a hurtful food, though it should be offered by the shepherd. The people ought to follow their shepherds to the pastures; but when they lead them to what is not pasture, they are no more shepherds; and because they are not in their duty, the flock is no longer bound to obey them. Nothing is more effectual in destroying the Church than a corrupt clergy. All Christians, even the meekest and simplest, are bound to resist those who destroy the Church. The commands of prelates and doctors ought to be performed only in the manner prescribed by St. Paul, (1 Thess. v. 21,) namely, in so far as, sitting in the chair of Moses, they speak according to Moses. We are the servants of God, and not of the pope, according as it is said, 'Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve.' The Holy Spirit has reserved to himself to foster, quicken, preserve, and enlarge the unity of the Church, and not abandoned it to the Roman Pontiff, who often gives himself no concern about the matter. Even sex does not hinder a woman, if she is faithful and prudent, and has love shed abroad in her heart, from feeling, judging, approving, and concluding, by a judgment which God ratifies."

Thus, as the Reformation approaches, the voices which proclaim the truth are multiplied. One would say the Church is bent on demonstrating that the Reformation had an existence before Luther. Protestantism was born into the Church the very day that the germ of the Papacy appeared in it, just as in the political world conservative principles began to exist the very moment that the despotism of the great or the disorders of the factions shewed open front. Protestantism was even sometimes stronger than the Papacy in the ages preceding the Reformation. What had Rome to oppose to all these witnesses for the truth at the moment when their voice was heard through all the earth?

But this was not all. The Reformation existed not in the teachers only; it existed also among the people. The doctrines of Wickliffe, proceeding from Oxford, had spread over Christendom, and had preserved adherents in Bavaria, Swabia, Franconia, and Prussia. In Bohemia, from the bosom of discord and war, ultimately came forth a peaceful Christian community, which resembled the primitive Church, and bore lively testimony to the great principle of Evangelical opposition, viz., "That Christ himself, not Peter and his successor, is the rock on which the Church is built." Belonging equally to the German and Slavonian races, these simple Christians had missionaries among the different nations who spoke their tongues, that they might without noise gain adherents to their opinions. At Rostoch, which had been twice visited by them, Nicolas Kuss began, in 1511, to preach publicly against the pope.

It is important to attend to this state of things. When wisdom from above will with loud voice deliver her instructions, there will everywhere be intellects and hearts to receive it. When the sower, who has never ceased to walk over the Church, will come forth for a new and extensive sowing, the earth will be ready to receive the grain. When the trumpet, which the Angel of the covenant has never ceased to blow, will cause it to sound louder and louder, many will make ready for battle.

The Church already feels that the hour of battle is approaching. If, during the last century, more than one philosopher gave intimation of the revolution with which it was to close, can we be astonished that, at the end of the fifteenth century, several doctors foresaw the impending Reformation which was to renovate the Church?

André Prolés, provincial of the Augustines, who, for more than half a century, presided over this body, and, with unshaken courage, maintained the doctrines of Augustine within his order, when assembled with his friars in the Convent of Himmelsforste, near Wernigerode, often stopped during the reading of the word of God, and addressing the listening monks, said to them, "Brethren, you hear the testimony of holy Scripture. It declares, that by grace we are what we are—that by it alone we have all that we have. Whence, then, so much darkness, and so many horrible superstitions?

. . . Oh! brethren, Christianity has need of a great and bold reformation, and I already see its approach." Then the monks exclaimed, "Why don't you yourself begin this reformation, and oppose all their errors?" "You see, my brethren," replied the old provincial, "that I am weighed down with years, and feeble in body, and possess not the knowledge, talent, and eloquence, which so important a matter requires. But God will raise up a hero, who, by his age, his strength, his talents, his knowledge, his genius, and eloquence, will occupy the first rank. He will begin the reformation, he will oppose error, and God will give him such courage that he will dare to resist the great." An old monk of Himmelsforste, who had often heard these words, related them to Flacius. In the very order of which Prolés was provincial, the Christian hero thus announced by him was to appear.

In the Franciscan Convent at Isenach, in Thuringia, was a monk named John Hilten. He was a careful student of the Prophet Daniel, and the Apocalypse of St. John; he even wrote a Commentary on these Books, and censured the most crying abuses of monastic life. The enraged monks threw him into prison. His advanced age, and the filthiness of his dungeon, bringing on a dangerous illness, he asked for the friar superintendent, who had no sooner arrived, than, without listening to the prisoner, he began to give vent to his rage, and to rebuke him harshly for his doctrine, which (adds the chronicle) was at variance with the monk's kitchen. The Franciscan, forgetting his illness, and fetching a deep sigh, exclaims, "I calmly submit to your injustice for the love of Christ; for I have done nothing to shake the monastic state, and have only censured its most notorious abuses. But," continued he, (this is the account given by Melancthon in his Apology for the Confession of Augsburg), "another will come in the year of the Lord, one thousand five hundred and sixteen; he will destroy you, and you will not be able to resist him." John Hilten, who had announced the end of the world in the year 1651, was not so much mistaken in the year in which the future Reformer was to appear. He was born not long after at a short distance from Hilten's dungeon, commenced his studies in the same town where the monk was prisoner, and publicly engaged in the Reformation only a year later than the Franciscan had mentioned.

Titus princes and people, the living members of the Church, and the theologians, laboured, each in their sphere, to prepare the work which the sixteenth century was about to carry into effect. But there was another auxiliary which was to lend its aid to the Reformation—I mean Literature.

The human mind was expanding—a circumstance which must of itself have led to its emancipation. If a small seed fall close to an old wall, as it grows into a tree it will push down the wall.

The Pontiff of Rome had become tutor to the nations, and his superior intelligence had made the task easy to him. He had long kept them in a state of minority, but resistance now broke forth on all sides. This venerable tutelage, which had been primarily established by the principles of eternal life, and of civilization which Rome had imparted to barbarous nations, could no longer be exercised without opposition. A formidable adversary had met her in the face, and was prepared to control her. The natural tendency of the human mind to expand, to investigate, and acquire knowledge, had given birth to this new power. Man opened his eyes, and at every step questioned the proceedings of that long respected guide under whose direction, while blindfolded, he had moved on without saying a word. In regard to the nations of new Europe, the age of infancy had passed away, and that of manhood had begun. To the childlike simplicity, which believed everything, had succeeded a spirit of curiosity, an intellect not to be satisfied without sifting everything to the utmost. It was asked for what end God had spoken to the world, and whether men had a right to station themselves as mediators between God and their brethren.

There was only one thing which could have saved the Church, and this was to raise herself still higher above the people. To keep on a level with them was not enough. But so far from this, she was even found to be far beneath them, having begun to descend at the same time that they began to rise. At the period when mankind began to ascend to the regions of intellect, the priesthood was grovelling below among earthly pursuits and worldly interests. This phenomenon has repeatedly appeared in history. The wings of the eagle were full fledged, and what hand was high enough to prevent it from taking its flight?

The human mind made its first start in Italy.

Scholasticism and romantic poetry had at no time reigned unopposed. Italy never entirely lost the remembrance of antiquity; and this remembrance having been strongly awakened towards the end of the middle ages, soon gave the mind a new impulse.

Even in the fourteenth century, Dante and Petrarch restored the honour of the ancient Roman poets, at the same time that the former gave the most powerful popes a place in his hell, and the latter boldly protested for the primitive constitution of the Church. At the beginning of the fifteenth century, John of Ravenna taught Latin literature with applause at Padua and Florence; while Chrysoloras, at Florence and Pavia, interpreted the beautiful writers of Greece.

While in Europe light was thus coming forth from the prisons in which it had been confined, the East was sending new beams to the West. The standard of the Osmanlis, planted in 1453 on the walls of Constantinople, had put the learned to flight. They had, in consequence, transported the literature of Greece into Italy, where the torch of the ancients rekindled minds which had lain smothered for so many ages. George of Trebisond, Argyropolos, Bessarion, Lascaris, Chalcondylas, and many others, inspired the West with their love of Greece and its noblest productions. The patriotic feelings of the Italians were thus stimulated, and a great number of learned men appeared in Italy. Of these, the most illustrious were Gasparino, Aretin, Poggio, and Valla, who strove to restore the honour of Roman antiquity, and place it on a footing with that of Greece. In this way a great flood of light had appeared, and Rome could not but suffer by it.

The passion for antiquity which took possession of the Humanists, had a great effect in weakening the attachment to the Church in minds of the highest order; for "no man can serve two masters." At the same time, the studies in which the learned were engaged put them in possession of a new class of instruments, which were unknown to the schoolmen, and by means of which they could test and decide upon the lessons of the Church. Finding that beauties which charmed them in classical authors, existed in profusion in the Bible, and not in the works of theologians, the Humanists were quite prepared to give the Bible precedence before the Doctors. By reforming taste, they prepared a reformation in faith.

The Literati, it is true, loudly protested that their pursuits were not at variance with the belief of the Church; but yet they had assailed the schoolmen long before the Reformers began to do it, and played off their wit on these barbarians—those "Tentons who living, lived not." Some even proclaimed doctrines of the Gospel, and assailed Rome in the objects of her dearest affection. Already Dante, while adhering to many Roman dogmas, had proclaimed the power of faith in terms similar to those which the first Reformers employed. "It is true faith," he said, "that makes us citizens of heaven. Faith, according to the Gospel doctrine, is the principle of life; it is the feeble spark which, spreading always wider and wider, at length becomes a living flame, and shines within us like a star in heaven. Without faith, no good works, no honesty of life, can give us aid. How great soever our sins may be, the arms of divine grace are greater still, and wide enough to embrace whatever turns towards God. The soul is not lost by the anathema of the pontiffs; and eternal love can always reach it, so long as there remains one bloom of hope. From God, from God alone, through faith, our justice comes." And speaking of the Church, Dante exclaims, "O my bark! how ill loaded thou art! O Constantine! what mighty evil was engendered, I will not say by thy conversion, but by that offering which the rich father then received from thee!"

At a later period, Laurentius Valla, applying the study of antiquity to the opinions of the Church, denies the authenticity of the correspondence between Christ and King Abgarus, rejects the tradition as to the origin of the Apostles' Creed, and saps the foundation of the pretended inheritance which the popes held of Constantine.

Still, however, the great light which the study of antiquity threw out in the fifteenth century, was fitted only to destroy, and not to build up. The honour of saving the Church could not be given either to Homer or Virgil. The revival of letters, sciences, and arts, did not found the Reformation. The Paganism of the poets, on reappearing in Italy, rather strengthened the Paganism of the heart. The scepticism of the school of Aristotle, and a contempt of everything not connected with philology, took possession of many of the Literati, and engendered an infidelity which, while it affected submission to the Church, in reality attacked the most important truths of religion. Peter Pomponatus, the most famous representative of this impious tendency, taught at Bologna and Padua, that the immortality of the soul and Providence are only philosophical problems. John Francis Pica, nephew of Pica de la Mirandola, tells of a pope who did not believe in a God; and of another who, having confessed to one of his friends, that he did not believe in the immortality of the soul, appeared one night after his death to the same friend, and said to him, "Ah! the eternal fire that consumes me, makes me but too sensible of the immortality of that soul which, according to the view I held, was to die with the body." This reminds us of the celebrated words which Leo X. is alleged to have said to his Secretary Bembo, "All ages know well enough of what advantage this fable about Christ has been to us and ours."

Frivolous superstitions were attacked, but their place was supplied by infidelity, with its disdainful sneering laugh. To laugh at things, however sacred, was fashionable, and a proof of wit; and if any value was set on religion, it was merely as a mean of governing the people. "I have a fear," exclaimed Erasmus, in 1516, "and it is, that, with the study of ancient literature, ancient Paganism will re-appear."

It is true that then, as after the sarcasms of the age of Augustus, and as in our own times, after those of the last century, a new Platonic philosophy sprang up and attacked that irrational incredulity, seeking, like the philosophy of the present day, to inspire some respect for Christianity, and restore the religious sentiment to the heart. The Medici at Florence favoured these efforts of the Platonics. But no philosophical religion will regenerate the Church and the world. Proud, disdaining the preaching of the Cross, and pretending to see nothing in Christian doctrines but figures and symbols, which the majority of men cannot comprehend, it may bewilder itself in a mystical enthusiasm, but will always prove powerless either to reform or to save.

What, then, must have happened had not true Christianity re-appeared in the world, and had not faith filled the hearts of men anew with its power and its holiness? The Reformation saved religion, and with it society; and, therefore, if the Church of Rome had had the glory of God and the good of the people at heart, it would have welcomed the Reformation with delight. But what were such things as these to Leo X.?

However, a torch could not be lighted in Italy without sending its beams beyond the Alps. The affairs of the Church established a constant intercourse between the Italian Peninsula and the other parts of Christendom; and the barbarians being thus soon made to feel the superiority and pride of the Italians, began to blush for the imperfection of their language and their style. Some young noblemen,—a Dalberg, a Langen, a Spiegelberg,—inflamed with an eager desire of knowledge, passed over into Italy; and on their return to Germany, brought back learning, grammar, and the Classics, now so eagerly sought after, and communicated them to their friends.¹ Shortly after, Rodolph Agricola, a man of distinguished genius, appeared, and was held in as high veneration for his learning and genius as if he had lived in the age of Augustus or Pericles. The ardour of his mind, and the fatigues of the school, wore him out in a few years; but not till noble disciples had been trained, through intimate intercourse with him, to carry their master's fire all over Germany. Often, when assembled around him, they had together deplored the darkness of the Church, and asked why Paul so often repeats that men are justified by faith and not by works.

Around the feet of these new teachers soon gathered rustic youths, who lived by alms and studied without books, and who, divided into sections of priests of Bacchus, arquebusiers, and many more besides, moved in disorderly bands from town to town, and school to school. No matter, these strange bands were the commencement of a literary public. The masterpieces of antiquity began gradually to issue from the presses of Germany, supplanting the schoolmen; and the art of printing, discovered at Mayence in 1440, multiplied the energetic voices which remonstrated against the corruption of the Church, and those voices, not less energetic, which invited the human mind into new paths.

The study of ancient literature had, in Germany, very different effects from those which it had in Italy and France. Her study was combined with faith. In the new literary culture, Germany turned her attention to the advantage which religion might derive from it. What had produced in some a kind of intellectual refinement, of a captious and sterile nature, penetrated the whole life of others, warmed their hearts, and prepared them for a better light. The first restorers of letters in France were characterized by levity, and often even by immorality of conduct. In Germany, their successors, animated by a spirit of gravity, zealously devoted themselves to the investigation of truth. Italy, offering her incense to profane literature and science, saw an infidel opposition arise. Germany, occupied with a profound theology, and turned inwardly upon herself, saw the rise of an opposition based on faith. The one sapped the foundations of the Church, and the other repaired them. Within the empire was formed a remarkable union of free, learned, and noble-minded men, among whom princes were conspicuous, who endeavoured to render science useful to religion. Some brought to their studies the humble faith of children, while others brought an enlightened and penetrating intellect, disposed, perhaps, to exceed the bounds of legitimate freedom and criticism; both, however, contributed to clear the pavement of the temple from the obstructions produced by so many superstitions.

The monkish theologians perceived their danger, and began to clamour against the very studies which they had tolerated in Italy and France, because in those countries they had gone hand-in-hand with levity and dissoluteness. They entered into a conspiracy to oppose the study of language and science, because they had caught a glimpse of faith following in their rear. A monk was putting some one on his guard against the heresies of Erasmus. "In what," it was asked, "do they consist?" He confessed that he had not read the work of which he was speaking, but one thing he knew, viz., that Erasmus had written in too good Latin.

The disciples of literature, and the scholastic theologians, soon came to an open rupture. The latter were in dismay when they saw the movement which was taking place in the domain of intellect, and thought that immobility and darkness were the best safeguards of the Church. Their object in contending against the revival of letters, was to save Rome; but they helped to ruin it. Here Rome had much at stake. Forgetting herself for an instant under the pontificate of Leo X., she abandoned her old friends, and clasped her young adversaries in her arms. The papacy and letters formed an intimacy which seemed destined to break up the ancient alliance between monasticism and the hierarchy. At the first glance the popes perceived not that what they had taken for a whip, was a sword capable of inflicting a mortal wound. In the same way, during the last century, princes were seen receiving at their court political and philosophic systems, which, if carried into full effect, would have overturned their thrones. The alliance was not of long duration. Literature advanced without troubling itself about the injury which it might do to the power of its patron. The monks and schoolmen were aware that to abandon the pope was just to abandon themselves; and the pope, notwithstanding of the passing patronage which he gave to the fine arts, was not the less active when he saw the danger, in adopting measures, how much opposed soever they might be to the spirit of the time.

The universities defended themselves as they best could against the invasion of new light. Cologne expelled Rhagius; Leipsic, Celtes; Rostoch, Herman von dem Busch. Still the new doctors, and with them the ancient Classics, gradually, and often even by the aid of princes, made good their footing in these public schools. Societies of grammarians and poets were soon established in spite of the schoolmen, and every thing, even to the name of the Literati, behaved to be converted into Latin and Greek; for how could the friends of Sophocles and Virgil have such names as Kracheuberger or Schwarzerd? At the same time, a spirit of independence breathed in all the universities. Students were no longer seen, in schoolboy fashion, with their books under their arms, walking sagely and demurely, with downcast eye, behind their masters. The petulance of a Martial and an Ovid had passed into the new disciples of the Muses. It was transport to them to hear the sarcasms which fell in torrents on the dialectical theologians; and the heads of the literary movement were sometimes accused of favouring, and even of exciting, the disorderly proceedings of the students.

Thus a new world, emerging out of antiquity, was formed in the very heart of the world of the middle ages. The two parties could not avoid coming to blows, and the struggle was at hand. It began with the greatest clump of literature, with an old man on the eve of finishing his peaceful career.

To secure the triumph of truth, the first thing necessary was to bring forth the weapons by which she was to conquer, from the arsenals where they had lain buried for ages. These weapons were the holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments. It was necessary to revive in Christendom a love and study of sacred literature, both Greek and Hebrew. John Reuchlin was the individual whom Divine Providence selected for this purpose.

A very fine boy's voice was remarked in the choir of the church of Pforzheim, and attracted the attention of the Margrave of Baden. It was that of John Reuchlin, a young boy of agreeable manners and a lively disposition, son of an honest burgher of the place. The Margrave soon took him entirely under his protection, and in 1473 made choice of him to accompany his son Frederick to the University of Paris.

The son of the bailiff of Pforzheim arrived with the prince, his heart exuberant with joy at being admitted to this school, the most celebrated of all the West. Here he found the Spartan Hermonymos and John Wessel, surnamed "The Light of the World;" and had an opportunity of engaging, under skilful masters, in the study of Greek and Hebrew,—which had not then a single professor in Germany, and of which he was one day to be the restorer in the country of the Reformation. The poor young German made copies of the poems of Homer, and the speeches of Isocrates, for wealthy students, and in this way gained the means of continuing his studies and buying books.

But what he hears from the mouth of Wessel is of a different nature, and makes a deep impression on his mind. "The popes may be mistaken. All human satisfactions are blasphemy against Christ, who has perfectly reconciled and justified the human race. To God alone belongs the power of giving full absolution. There is no necessity for confessing our sins to a priest. There is no purgatory, at least if it be not God himself who is a devouring fire, and purges away every defilement." Reuchlin, when scarcely twenty, teaches Philosophy, Greek, and Latin, at Basle; and a German (a thing then regarded as a wonder) is heard speaking Greek.

The partizans of Rome begin to feel uneasy on seeing noble spirits at work among these ancient treasures. "The Romans," says Reuchlin, "are making mouths and raising an outcry, pretending that all these literary labours are hostile to Roman piety, inasmuch as the Greeks are schismatics. Oh! what toils and sufferings must be endured to bring Germany back to wisdom and knowledge!"

Shortly afterward, Eberhard of Wurtemberg, invited Reuchlin to Tubingen, that he might be the ornament of this rising university, and in 1483 took him with him into Italy. At Florence his companions and friends were Chaldeodylas, Aurispa, and John Pica de Mirandola. At Rome, when Eberhard received a solemn audience of the pope, surrounded by his cardinals, Reuchlin delivered an address in such pure and elegant Latin, that the assembly, who expected nothing of the kind from a barbarous German, were filled with the greatest astonishment, while the pope exclaimed, "Assuredly this man deserves to take his place beside the best orators of France and Italy."

Ten years later Reuchlin was obliged to take refuge in Heidelberg, at the court of the Elector Philip, to escape the vengeance of Eberhard's successor, Philip, in concert with John of Dalberg, Bishop of Worms, his friend and chancellor, exerted himself to spread the light which was beginning to peep forth from all parts of Germany. Dalberg had founded a library, to which all the learned had free access; and Reuchlin, in this new sphere, made great efforts to remove the barbarism of his countrymen.

Having been sent to Rome by the elector in 1498, on an important mission, he availed himself of all the time and all the money he could spare to make new progress in Hebrew, under the learned Israelite, Abdias Sphorne, and purchased all the Greek and Hebrew manuscripts which he could find, with the view of employing them as so many torches to increase the light which was beginning to dawn in his native country.

Argyropolos, a distinguished Greek, was at this time in the metropolis explaining the ancient marvels of the literature of his country to a numerous audience. The learned ambassador repairs with his suite to the hall where the teacher was lecturing, and, after bowing to him, deploras the misery of Greece, expiring under the blows of the Ottomans. The astonished Hellenist asks the German, "Who are you? Do you understand Greek?" Reuchlin replies, "I am a German, and know something of your tongue." At the request of Argyropolos he reads and explains a passage of Thucydides, which the professor had at the moment before him. Then Argyropolos, filled with astonishment and grief, exclaims, "Alas! alas! Greece, oppressed and obliged to flee, has gone and hid herself beyond the Alps!"

Thus the sons of rude Germany, and those of ancient learned Greece, met in the palaces of Rome, and the East and West shook hands in this rendezvous of the world—the one pouring into the lap of the other those intellectual treasures which had with difficulty been saved from the barbarism of the Ottomans. God, when His designs require it, employs some great catastrophe to break down the barrier, and instantly bring together those who seemed to be for ever parted.

Reuchlin, on his return to Germany, was able to go back to Wurtemberg, and proceeded, at this time especially, to execute those works which proved so useful to Luther and the Reformation. This individual, who, as Count Palatine, held an eminent station in the empire, and who, as a philosopher, contributed to humble Aristotle and exalt Plato—made a Latin Dictionary, which supplanted those of the Schoolmen—composed a Greek Grammar, which greatly facilitated owes to him? We will give only one example. His cousin, a young man named Schwarzerd, son of an artisan, who had acquired celebrity as an armourer, came to lodge with his sister, Elizabeth, in order to study under his direction. Reuchlin, delighted at the genius and application of his young pupil, adopted him. Advice, presents of books, examples, nothing, in short, he spared to make his relative useful to the Church and to his country. He rejoiced to see his work prospering under his eye; and, thinking the name Schwarzerd too barbarous, translated it into Greek, and named the young student Melanethon. It was Luther's illustrious friend.

But grammatical studies did not satisfy Reuchlin. Like his masters, the Jewish doctors, he began to study the hidden meaning of the Word: "God," said he, "is a Spirit, the Word is a breath.—man breathes, God is the Word. The names which He has given himself are an echo of eternity." Like the Cabalists, he hoped to "pass from symbol to symbol, from form to form, till he arrived at the last and purest of all forms—that which regulates the power of the Spirit."

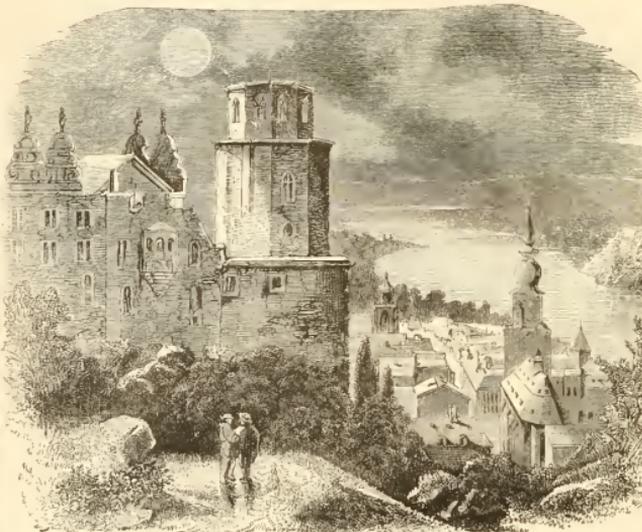

While Reuchlin was bewildering himself in these quiet and abstruse researches, the enmity of the Schoolmen forced him suddenly, and much against his will, into a fierce war, which was one of the preludes of the Reformation.

There was at Cologne a baptized Rabbín, named Pfefferkorn, who was intimately connected with the inquisitor Hoehstraten. This man and the Dominicans solicited and procured from the Emperor, Maximilian, (it may have been with good intentions,) an order, in virtue of which the Jews were to bring all their Hebrew books (the Bible excepted) to the town-house of the place where they resided. There the books were to be burned. The motive alleged was, that they were full of blasphemies against Jesus Christ. It must be confessed that they were, at least, full of absurdities, and that the Jews themselves would not have lost much by the intended execution.

The emperor desired Reuchlin to give his opinion of the books. The learned doctor expressly singled out all the books which were written against Christianity, leaving them to their destined fate, but he tried to save the others. "The best method of converting the Israelites," added he, "would be to establish two Hebrew professors in each university, who might teach theologians to read the Bible in Hebrew, and thus refute the Jewish doctors." The Jews, in consequence of this advice, obtained restitution of their books.

The proselytes and the inquisitors, like hungry ravens which see their prey escape, sent forth cries of the study of that language—translated and expounded the penitential Psalms—corrected the Vulgate, and was the first in Germany (this constitutes his highest merit and glory) who published a Hebrew Grammar and Dictionary. By this work Reuchlin opened the long sealed books of the Old Testament, and reared "a monument," as he himself expresses it, "more durable than brass."

It was not merely by his writings, but also by his life, that Reuchlin sought to advance the reign of truth. Tall in stature, of commanding appearance, and affable address, he instantly gained the confidence of all with whom he had any intercourse. His thirst for knowledge was equalled only by his zeal in communicating it. He spared neither money nor labour to introduce the editions of the Classics into Germany as they issued from the presses of Italy; and in this way the son of a bailiff did more to enlighten his countrymen than rich municipalities or powerful princes. His influence over youth was great; and, in this respect, who can calculate how much the Reformation fury. Picking out different passages from the writings of Reuchlin, and perverting their meaning, they denounced the author as a heretic, accused him of a secret inclination to Judaism, and threatened him with the fetters of the Inquisition. Reuchlin was at first taken by surprise; but these men, always becoming more and more arrogant, and prescribing dishonourable terms, he, in 1513, published a "Defence against his Detractors of Cologne," in which he painted the whole party in vivid colours.

The Dominicans vowed vengeance, and hoped, by an act of authority, to re-establish their tottering power. Hochstraten, at Mayence, drew up a charge against Reuchlin, and the learned works of this learned man were condemned to the flames. The innovators, the masters and disciples of the new school, feeling that they were all attacked in the person of Reuchlin, rose as one man. Times were changed.—Germany and literature were very different from Spain and the Inquisition.

The great literary movement had created a public opinion. Even the dignified clergy were somewhat influenced by it. Reuchlin appeals to Leo X.; and that pope, who had no great liking for ignorant monks and fanatics, remits the whole affair to the Bishop of Spire, who declares Reuchlin innocent, and condemns the monks in the expenses of the process. The Dominicans, those props of the papacy, filled with rage, recur to the infallible decision of Rome; and Leo, not knowing how to act between the two hostile powers, issues a mandate superseding the process.

The union of letters with faith forms one of the characteristic features of the Reformation, and distinguishes it, both from the introduction of Christianity, and the religious revival of the present day. The Christians, who were contemporary with the Apostles, had the refinement of their age against them, and, with some few exceptions, it is the same now; but the majority of literary men were with the Reformers. Even public opinion was favourable to them. The work thereby gained in extent, but perhaps it lost in depth.

Luther, sensible of all that Reuchlin had done, wrote to him shortly after his victory over the Dominicans, "The Lord has acted through you, in order that the light of Holy Scripture may again begin to shine in this Germany, where, for many ages, alas! it was not only smothered, but almost extinguished."

BUT a man had now appeared, who regarded it as the great business of his life to attack the scholasticism of the universities and convents, and was the great writer of the opposition at the commencement of the sixteenth century.

Reuchlin was not twelve years old when this first genius of the age was born. A man of great vivacity and talent, by name Gerard, a native of Gouda, in the Netherlands, loved a physician's daughter, named Marguerite. The principles of Christianity did not regulate his life, or at least passion silenced them. His parents, and nine brothers, would have constrained him to embrace the monastic state. He fled, leaving the object of his affection about to become a mother, and repaired to Rome. Frail Marguerite gave birth to a son. Gerard heard nothing of it; and some time after, having received intimation from his parents that the object of his affection was no more, he, in a paroxysm of grief, turned priest, and consecrated himself for ever to the service of God. On his return to Holland, she was still alive! Marguerite would not marry another, and Gerard, remaining faithful to his sacerdotal vows, their affection became concentrated on their little son. His mother had tended him with the greatest care, and his father, after his return, sent him to school, though he was only four years of age. He was not thirteen, when his teacher, Sinthemius, of Deventer, clasping him rapturously in his arms, exclaimed, "This child will reach the highest pinnacles of science." It was Erasmus of Rotterdam.¹

About this time his mother died; and his father, broken-hearted, was not long in following her to the grave.

Young Erasmus, left alone in the world, shewed the greatest aversion to become a monk,—a state of life which his guardians were compelling him to adopt, but to which, from the circumstances of his birth, he may be said to have been always opposed. Ultimately he was prevailed upon to enter a convent of canons regular; but he had no sooner done it than he felt, as it were, borne down by the weight of his vows. Recovering a little liberty, he is soon seen, first at the Court of the Archbishop of Cambrai, and afterwards at the University of Paris, where he prosecuted his studies in extreme poverty, but with the most indefatigable diligence. As soon as he could procure any money, he employed the first part of it in the purchase of Greek books, and the remainder in the purchase of clothes. Often did the poor Dutchman make fruitless application to his guardians; and to this probably it was owing, that, in after life, one of his greatest pleasures was to give assistance to poor students. Engaged without intermission in the pursuit of truth and knowledge, he gave a reluctant attendance on scholastic disputes, and revolted from the study of theology, afraid that he might discover some errors in it, and he, in consequence, denounced as a heretic.

It was at this time Erasmus began to feel his strength. By the study of the ancients, he acquired a perspicuity and an elegance of style, which placed him far above the most distinguished Literati of Paris. His employment as a teacher procured him powerful friends, while the works which he published attracted general admiration and applause. He well knew how to please the public, and shaking off the last remnants of the school and the cloister, devoted himself entirely to literature, displaying in all his writings those ingenious observations, and that correct, lively, and enlightened spirit, which at once amuse and instruct.

The laborious habits which he acquired at this period he retained through life. Even in his journeys, which were usually made on horseback, he was never idle. He composed while he was rambling across the fields, and, on arriving at his inn, committed his thoughts to writing. It was in this way, while travelling from Italy to England, he composed his "Praise of Folly."¹

Erasmus, early in life, acquired a high reputation among the learned, but the enraged monks owed him a grudge, and vowed vengeance. He was much courted by princes, and was inexhaustible in finding excuses to evade their invitations, liking better to gain his livelihood in correcting books with the printer Frobenius, than to live, surrounded by luxury and honour, at the magnificent courts of Charles V., Henry VIII., and Francis I., or to encircle his head with the Cardinal's hat, which was offered him.

He taught in Oxford from 1509 to 1516, and then left it for Basle, where he fixed his residence in 1521.

What was his influence on the Reformation?

It has been overrated by some and underrated by others. Erasmus never was, and never could have been, a Reformer; but he paved the way for others. Not only did he diffuse among his contemporaries a love of science, and a spirit of research and examination, which led others much farther than he went himself, but he was also able, through the protection of distinguished prelates and mighty princes, to expose the vices of the Church, and lash them with the most cutting satire.

Erasmus, in fact, attacked monks and abuses in two ways. First, there was his popular attack. That little fair-haired man, whose peering blue eyes keenly observed whatever came before him, and on whose lips a somewhat sarcastic smile was always playing, though timid and embarrassed in his step, and apparently so feeble that a breath of air might have thrown him down, was constantly pouring out elegant and biting sarcasms against the theology and superstition of his age. His natural character and the events of his life had made this habitual to him. Even in writings where nothing of the kind was to have been expected, his sarcastic humour is ever breaking out, and, as with needle points, impaling those schoolmen and ignorant monks against whom he had declared war. There are many features of resemblance between Erasmus and Voltaire. Previous authors had given a popular turn to that element of folly which mingles with all the thoughts and all the actions of human life. Erasmus took up the idea, and personifying Folly, introduces her under the name of Moria, daughter of Plutus, born in the Fortunate Islands, nursed on intoxication and impertinence, and swaying the sceptre of a mighty empire. Giving a description of it, she paints, in succession, all the states of the world which belong to her, dwelling, especially, on church folks, who refuse to own her kindness, although she loads them with her favours.

¹ Seven editions of this work were disposed of in a few months.

She directs her jibes and jests against the labyrinth of dialectics, in which the theologians wander bewildered, and the grotesque syllogisms by which they pretend to support the Church. She also unveils the disorders, the ignorance, the impurity, and absurd conduct of the monks.

"They are all mine," says she, "those people who have no greater delight than to relate miracles, or hear monstrous lies, and who employ them to dissipate the enmi of others, and, at the same time, to fill their own purses, (I allude, particularly, to priests and preachers.) Near them are those who have adopted the foolish, yet pleasing persuasion, that if they cast a look at a bit of wood or a picture representing Polyphemus or Christopher, they will, at least, outlive that day."—"Alas! what follies," continues Moria, "follies at which even I myself can scarcely help blushing! Do we not see each country laying claim to its particular saint? Each misery has its saint and its candle. This one relieves you in toothache, that one gives assistance at childbirth, a third restores your stolen goods, a fourth saves you in shipwreck, and a fifth keeps watch over your flocks. Some of these are all-powerful in many things at once. This is particularly the case with the Virgin, the mother of God, to whom the vulgar attribute almost more than to her Son. In the midst of all these follies, if some odious sage arise, and, giving a counternote, exclaim, (as in truth he may,) 'You will not perish miserably if you live as Christians. You will redeem your sins, if to the money which you give you add hatred of the sins themselves, tears, vigils, prayers, fastings, and a thorough change in your mode of life. You saint will befriend you if you imitate his life.'—If some sage, I say, charitably duns such words into their ears, oh! of what felicity does he not deprive their souls, and into what trouble, what despondency, does he not plunge them! The mind of man is so constituted that imposture has a much stronger hold upon it than truth. If there is any saint more fabulous than another,—for instance, a St. George, a St. Christopher, or a St. Barbara,—you will see them adored with much greater devotion than St. Peter, St. Paul, or Christ himself."

Folly, however, does not stop here; she applies her lash to the bishops themselves, "who run more after gold than after souls, and think they have done enough when they make a theatrical display of themselves, as Holy Fathers, to whom adoration is due, and when they bless or anathematize." The daughter of "the Fortunate Isles" has the hardihood even to attack the Court of Rome, and the pope himself, who, spending his time in diversion, leaves Peter and Paul to perform his duty. "Are there," says she, "more formidable enemies of the Church than those impious pontiffs, who, by their silence, allow Jesus Christ to be destroyed, who bind Him by their mercenary laws, falsify Him by their forced interpretations, and strangle Him by their pestilential life!"

Holbein appended to the "Praise of Folly" most grotesque engravings, among which the pope figures with his triple crown. Never, perhaps, was a work so well adapted to the wants of a particular period. It is impossible to describe the impression which it produced throughout Christendom. Twenty-seven editions were published in the lifetime of Erasmus, it was translated into all languages, and served more than any other to confirm the age in its antisacerdotal tendency.

But to this attack by popular sarcasm, Erasmus added the attack of science and erudition. The study of Greek and Latin literature had opened up a new prospect to the modern genius which began to be awakened in Europe. Erasmus entered with all his heart into the idea of the Italians, that the school of the ancients was that in which the sciences ought to be studied; that, abandoning the inadequate and absurd books which had hitherto been used, it was necessary to go to Strabo for geography, to Hippocrates for medicine, to Plato for philosophy, to Ovid for mythology, and to Pliny for natural history. But he took a farther step, the step of a giant, destined to lead to the discovery of a new world, of more importance to humanity than that which Columbus had just added to the old world. Following out his principle, Erasmus insisted that men should no longer study theology in Scotus and Thomas Aquinas, but go and learn it from the Fathers of the Church, and, above all, from the New Testament. He showed that it was not even necessary to keep close to the Vulgate, which swarmed with faults; and he rendered an immense service to truth, by publishing his critical edition of the Greek text of the New Testament,—a text as little known in the West as if it never had existed. This edition appeared at Basle in 1516, the year before the Reformation. Erasmus thus did for the New Testament what Reuchlin had done for the Old. Theologians were thenceforth able to read the word of God in the original tongues, and at a later period to recognize the purity of doctrine taught by the Reformers.

"I wish," said Erasmus, on publishing his New Testament, "to bring to its level that frigid, wordy, disputations thing, termed Theology. Would to God the Christian world may derive advantage from the work, proportioned to the pain and toil which it has cost!" The wish was accomplished. It was in vain for the monks to exclaim, "He is trying to correct the Holy Spirit." The New Testament of Erasmus sent forth a living light. His paraphrases on the Epistles and Gospels of St. Matthew and St. John; his editions of Cyriac and Jerome; his translations of Origen, Athanasius, and Chrysostom; his "True Theology;" his "Preacher;" his Commentaries on several of the Psalms, contributed greatly to spread a taste for the word of God and pure theology. The effect of his labours even went farther than his intentions. Reuchlin and Erasmus restored the Bible to the learned; Luther restored it to the people. We have not yet described all that Erasmus did. When he restored the Bible, he called attention to its contents. "The highest aim of the revival of philosophical studies," said he, "should be to give a knowledge of the pure and simple Christianity of the Bible." An admirable sentiment! Would to God the organs of philosophy, in our day, were as well acquainted with their calling! "I am firmly resolved," continued he, "to die studying the Scriptures; it is my joy and my peace." "The sum of all Christian philosophy," he elsewhere says, "is reduced to this: To place all our hope in God, who, through grace, without our merits, gives us everything by Jesus Christ: to know that we are ransomed by the death of His Son; to die to worldly lusts, and walk conformably to His doctrine and His example, not only doing no injury to any, but, on the contrary, doing good to all: to bear trials patiently, in the hope of future recompense: in fine, to claim no credit to ourselves because of our virtues, but give thanks to God for all our faculties, and all our works. These are the feelings which ought to pervade the whole man, until they have become a second nature."

Then, raising his voice against the great mass of ecclesiastical injunctions, regarding dress, fasts, feast-days, vows, marriage, and confessions, by which the people were oppressed, and the priest was enriched, Erasmus exclaims, "In churches, the interpretation of the Gospel is scarcely thought of. The better part of sermons must meet the wishes of the commissaries of indulgences. The holy doctrine of Christ must be suppressed, or interpreted contrary to its meaning, and for their profit. Cure is now hopeless, unless Christ himself turn the hearts of kings and pontiffs, and awaken them to inquire after true piety."

The works of Erasmus rapidly succeeded each other. He laboured incessantly, and his writings were read just as they came from his pen. That spirit, that native life, that rich, refined, sparkling and bold intellect, which, without restraint, poured out its treasures before his contemporaries, carried away and entranced vast numbers of readers, who eagerly devoured the works of the philosopher of Rotterdam. In this way he soon became the most influential man in Christendom, and saw pensions and crowns raining down upon him from all quarters.

When we contemplate the great revolution, which, at a later period, renewed the Church, it is impossible not to own that Erasmus was used by many as a kind of bridge, over which they passed. Many who would have taken alarm at evangelical truths, if presented in all their force and purity, yielded to the charm of his writings, and ultimately figured among the most zealous promoters of the Reformation.

But the very circumstance of his being good in preparing, prevented him from being good at performing. "Erasmus knows very well how to expose error," says Luther, "but he knows not how to teach the truth." The Gospel was not the fire which warmed and sustained his life, the centre around which his activity radiated. He was, first of all, a learned, and, in the second place, only a Christian man. He was too much under the influence of vanity to have a decided influence on his age. He anxiously calculated the effect which every step he took might have on his reputation, and there was nothing he liked so much to talk of as himself and his fame. "The pope," wrote he to an intimate friend, with meretricious vanity, at the period when he became the declared opponent of Luther, "the pope has sent me a letter full of kindness and expressions of respect. His secretary solemnly vows that the like was never heard of, and that it was written word for word at the pope's own dictation."

Erasmus and Luther are the representatives of two great ideas on the subject of reform, and of two great parties of their own age, and of all ages. The one is composed of men, whose leading characteristic is a prudential timidity; the other of men of courage and resolution. These two parties were, at this period, personified in these two distinguished heads. The men of prudence thought that the cultivation of theological science might lead gradually, and without disruption, to the reformation of the Church. The men of action thought that the diffusion of more correct ideas among the learned would not put a stop to the superstitions of the people, and that the correction of particular abuses was of little avail, unless the whole life of the Church were renewed.

"A disadvantageous peace," said Erasmus, "is far better than the justest war." He thought (and how many Erasmuses have been and still are in the world?) that a Reformation which shook the Church might run a risk of overturning it; and he was therefore terrified when, on looking forward, he saw the passions of men excited, saw evil everywhere mingling itself with any little good that could be accomplished, existing institutions destroyed in the absence of others to supply their place, and the vessel of the Church leaking in every part, and at length engulfed amid the storm. "Those who bring the sea into new lagoons," said he, "are often deceived in the result; the formidable element, once introduced, does not take the direction which they wished to give it, but rushes where it pleases, and causes great devastation. Be this as it may," continued he, "let disturbances be by all means avoided. Better put up with wicked princes than by innovations enthrone evil."

But the courageous among his contemporaries were prepared with their answer. History had clearly enough demonstrated, that a frank exposition of the truth, and a mortal struggle with falsehood, could alone secure the victory. Had temporizing and politic artifices been resorted to, the wiles of the papal court would have extinguished the light in its first glimmerings. Had not all sorts of mild methods been tried for ages? Had not Council been held after Council, with the view of reforming the Church? Yet all had been useless. Why pretend to repeat an experiment that had so often failed?

No doubt a fundamental reform might be effected without disruption. But when did anything great and good make its appearance among men without causing agitation? This fear of seeing evil mingle with good, if legitimate, would arrest the noblest and holiest enterprises. We must not fear the evil which may be heaved up in the course of great agitation, but be strong in combating and destroying it.

Besides, is there not an entire difference between the commotion which human passions produces and that which unites from the Spirit of God? The one shakes society, the other consolidates it. How erroneous to imagine, like Erasmus, that in the state in which Christianity then was, with that mixture of opposite elements, truth and falsehood, life and death, violent shocks still be prevented! As well might you try to shut the crater of Vesuvius, when the angry elements are actually at war in its bosom! The middle ages had seen more than one violent commotion in an atmosphere less loaded with storms than at the period of the Reformation. The thing wanted at such a time is not to arrest and suppress, but to direct and guide.

If the Reformation had not burst forth, who can tell the fearful ruin by which its place might have been supplied? Society, a prey to a thousand elements of destruction, and destitute of regenerating and conservative elements, would have been dreadfully convulsed. Assuredly it would not have been a reform to the taste of Erasmus, or such an one as many moderate but timid men in our day dream of, that would then have overtaken society. The people, devoid of that light and piety which the Reformation carried down into the humblest ranks, giving themselves up to the violence of their passions, and to a restless spirit of revolt, would have burst forth like a wild beast broken loose from its chain, after having been goaded to madness.

The Reformation was nothing but an interposition of the Spirit of God among men—a setting of the world in order by the hand of God. No doubt, it might stir up the fermenting elements which lie hidden in the human heart; but God was there to overrule them. Evangelical doctrine, heavenly truth, penetrating the masses of the population, destroyed what deserved to perish; but, at the same time, gave new strength to all that deserved to remain. The Reformation exerted itself in building up, and it is mere prejudice to allege that it destroyed. "The ploughshare, too," it has been truly said, in speaking of the Reformation, "might think it hurts the earth, because it cuts it asunder, whereas it only makes it productive."

The great principle of Erasmus was, "Give light, and the darkness will disappear of itself." The principle is good, and Luther acted on it. But when the enemies of the light strive to extinguish it, or to force the flambeau out of the hand which carries it, is it necessary, from a love of peace, to let them do so?—ought not the wicked to be resisted?

Erasmus was deficient in courage. Now, courage is indispensable, whether it be to effect a Reformation, or to storm a town. There was much timidity in his character. From a boy the very name of death made him tremble. He was excessively anxious about his health, and would grudge no sacrifice in order to escape from a place where some contagious malady prevailed. His love of the comforts of life was greater even than his vanity, and hence his rejection, on more than one occasion, of the most brilliant offers.

Accordingly, he made no pretensions to the character of a Reformer. "If the corruptions of the Court of Rome demand some great and prompt remedy," said he, "it is no affair of mine, or of those like me." He had not the strong faith which animated Luther.

While the latter was always prepared to yield up his life for the truth, Erasmus candidly declared, "Others may aspire to martyrdom; as for me, I deem not myself worthy of the honour. Were some tumult to arise, I fear I would play the part of Peter."

Erasmus, by his writings and his sayings, had done more than any other man to prepare the Reformation; but when he saw the tempest, which he himself had raised, actually come, he trembled. He would have given anything to bring back the calm of other days, even though accompanied with its dense fogs. It was no longer time. The embankment had burst, and it was impossible to arrest the flood which was destined at once to purify and fertilize the world. Erasmus was powerful as an instrument of God; but when he ceased to be so, he was nothing.

Ultimately, Erasmus knew not for which party to declare. He was not pleased with any, and he had his fears of all. "It is dangerous to speak," said he, "and it is dangerous to be silent." In all great religious movements we meet with those irresolute characters, which, though respectable in some points of view, do injury to the truth, and, in wishing not to displease any, displease all.

What would become of the truth did not God raise up bolder champions to defend it? The following is the advice which Erasmus gave to Viglius Zuichem, (afterwards President of the Supreme Court at Brussels,) as to the manner in which he ought to conduct himself towards the sectaries—(this was the name by which he had already begun to designate the Reformers)—"My friendship for you makes me desirous that you should keep far aloof from the contagion of the sects, and not furnish them with any pretext for saying, 'Zuichem is ours.' If you approve their doctrine, at least disguise it; and, above all, do not enter into discussion with them. A lawyer should finesse with these people as a dying man once did with the devil. The devil asked him, 'What believest thou?' The dying man, afraid that if he made a confession of his faith, he might be surprised into some heresy, replied, 'What the Church believes.' The devil rejoined, 'What does the Church believe?' The man again replied, 'What I believe.' The devil, once more, 'And what dost thou believe?'—'What the Church believes.'" Duke George of Saxony, a mortal enemy of Luther, receiving an equivocal answer from Erasmus to a question which he had put to him, said, "My dear Erasmus, wash the fur for me, and do not merely wet it." Secundus Curio, in one of his works, describes two heavens—the Papistical and the Christian heaven. He does not find Erasmus in either, but discovers him moving constantly between them in endless circles.

Such was Erasmus. He wanted that internal liberty which makes a man truly free. How different he would have been if he had abandoned himself, and sacrificed all for truth! But after trying to effect some reforms with the approbation of the Church, and for Rome deserting the Reformation when he saw the two to be incompatible, he lost himself with all parties. On the one hand, his palinodes could not suppress the rage of the fanatical partisans of the Papacy. They felt the mischief which he had done them, and they buted to the second part. It is a picture in bold characters,—a caricature sometimes coarsely painted, but full of truth and vigour,—a striking likeness in colours of fire. The effect was immense. Monks, who are adversaries of Reuchlin, and the supposed authors of the letters, discourse on the affairs of the time, and on theological subjects, after their own manner, and in their barbarous Latin. They address to their correspondent, Ortwin Gratius, professor at Cologne, and friend of Pfefferkorn, the silliest and most useless questions. They give the most amusing proof of the excessive ignorance and incredulity, their superstition, their low and vulgar spirit, their coarse gluttony in making a god of their belly; and, at the same time, their pride, their fanatical and persecuting zeal. They inform him of several of their droll adventures, their escapes, their dissoluteness, and a variety of scandals in the lives of Hochstraten, Pfefferkorn, and other leaders of their party. The tone of these letters, sometimes hyper-critical and sometimes childish, gives them a very comic effect; and yet the whole is so natural, that the Dominicans and Franciscans of England received the work with high approbation, believing that it really was composed on the principles of their order, and in defence of it. A prior of Brabant, in his credulous simplicity, purchased a great number of copies, and presented them to the most distinguished among the Dominicans. The monks, irritated more and more, applied to the pope for a stringent bull against all who should dare to read these epistles; but Leo X. refused to grant it. They were accordingly obliged to put up with the general laugh, and gulp down their rage. No work gave a stronger blow to these pillars of Popism. But it was not by jesting and satire that the Gospel was to triumph. Had this course been persisted in—had the Reformers, instead of attacking the Reformation with the weapons of God, had recourse to the jeering spirit of the world, the cause had been lost. Luther loudly condemned these satires. A friend having sent him one of them, entitled, "The Tenor of the Supplication of Pasquin," he wrote in answer, "The foolish things you sent me appear to be written by a mind which is under no control. I submitted them to a meeting of friends, and they have all given the same opinion." And speaking of the same work, he writes to another of his correspondents, "This 'Supplication' appears to me to be by the same hand as the 'Letters of Some Obscure Men.' I approve of his wishes, but I approve not of his work, for he does not refrain from injury and insult." This sentence is severe, but it shews what kind of spirit was in Luther, and how superior he was to his contemporaries. It must be added, however, that he was not at all times observant of these wise maxims.

Ulrich having been obliged to renounce the protection of the Archbishop of Mayence, applied for that of Charles V., who had at this time quarrelled with the pope, and accordingly repaired to Brussels, where Charles was holding his court. But so far from obtaining anything, he learned that the pope had required the emperor to send him to Rome bound hand and foot. The inquisitor, Hochstraten, Reuchlin's persecutor, was one of those whom Rome had charged to pursue him. Ulrich, indignant that such a demand should have been made to the emperor, quitted Brabant. When a short way from Brussels, he met Hochstraten on the high road. The inquisitor, frightened out of his wits, falls on his knees, and commends his soul to God and the saints. "No," said the knight, "I will not soil my sword with such blood as yours!" and giving him several strokes with the flat of his sword, allowed him to depart.

Hütten took refuge in the castle of Ebernbourg, where Francis de Seckingen offered an asylum to all who were persecuted by the Ultramontanists. It was here that his ardent zeal for the emancipation of his country dictated the remarkable letters which he addressed to Charles V., Frederick, Elector of Saxony, Albert, Archbishop of Mayence, and the princes and nobles, and which entitle him to a place among the most distinguished authors. Here, too, he composed all those works which, being read and comprehended by the people, inspired Germany with a hatred of Rome and a love of freedom. Devoted to the cause of the Reformers, his object was to induce the nobility to take up arms in favour of the Gospel, and fall with the sword on that Rome which Luther only wished to destroy by the Word, and by the invincible force of truth.

Still, amid all this fondness for war, we are pleased at finding tenderness and delicacy of sentiment in Hütten. On the death of his parents, though he was the eldest son, he gave up all the family property to his brothers, and prayed them not to write him or send him any money, lest, notwithstanding their innocence, they might be brought into trouble by his enemies, and fall into the ditch along with him.

If the truth cannot own Hütten for one of her children, (for her companions are ever holiness of life and purity of heart,) she will, at least, make honourable mention of him as one of the most redoubtable adversaries of error.

A similar testimony may be borne to Francois de Seckingen, his illustrious friend and patron. This noble chevalier, whom several of his contemporaries deemed worthy of the imperial crown, holds a first place among the warriors who were the antagonists of Rome. While delighting in the noise of arms, he had an ardent love of science, and a high veneration for its professors. When at the head of an army which threatened Wurtemberg, he gave orders, in the event of Stuttgart being taken by assault, to spare the property and house of the celebrated scholar, John Reuchlin. He afterwards invited him to his camp, and, embracing him, offered to assist him in his quarrel with the monks of Cologne. For a long time chivalry had gloried in despising literature, but this period presents us with a different spectacle. Under the massy cuirass of the Seckingens and Hüttens, we perceive the intellectual movement which is beginning to be everywhere felt. The first-fruits which the Reformation gives to the world are warriors enamoured with the arts of peace.

Hütten, who, on his return from Brussels, had taken refuge in the castle of Seckingen, invited the valorous knights to study the evangelical doctrine, and make him acquainted with the foundations on which it rests. "And is there any one," exclaimed Seckingen in astonishment, "who dares to overturn such an edifice? Who could do it?"

Several individuals, who afterwards became celebrated as Reformers, found an asylum in this castle; among others, Martin Bucer, Aquila, Schwebel, and Ecolampadius, so that Hütten justly styled Ebernbourg "the hotel of the just." Ecolampadius had to preach daily in the castle; but the warriors there assembled began to weary hearing so much of the meek virtues of Christianity; and the sermons of Ecolampadius, though he laboured to shorten them, seemed too long. They, indeed, repaired to the church almost every day, but, for the most part, only to hear the blessing and offer a short prayer. Hence Ecolampadius exclaimed, "Alas! the Word is here sown on stony ground."

COLOGNE.

Seckingen, longing to serve the cause of truth in his own way, declared war on the Archbishop of Treves, "in order," as he said, "to open a door for the Gospel." In vain did Luther, who had by this time appeared, endeavour to dissuade him; he attacked Treves with five thousand knights and a thousand common soldiers, but the bold archbishop, aided by the Elector Palatine and the Landgrave of Hesse, forced him to retreat. The following spring, the allied princes attacked him in his castle of Landstein. After a bloody assault, Seckingen, having been mortally wounded, was forced to surrender. The three princes, accordingly, make their way into the fortress, and, after searching through it, at last find the indomitable knight on his death-bed, in a subterraneous vault.

He stretches out his hand to the Elector Palatine, without seeming to pay any attention to the other princes, who overwhelm him with questions and reproaches: "Leave me at rest," said he to them; "I am now preparing to answer a mightier than you! . . ." When Luther heard of his death he exclaimed, "The Lord is just, yet wonderful! It is not with the sword that He means to propagate the Gospel!"

BASILICA OF CONSTANTINE. TREVES.

Such was the sad end of a warrior, who, as emperor or elector, might, perhaps, have raised Germany to high renown; but who, confined within a limited circle, wasted the great powers with which he was endowed. It was not in the tumultuous spirit of these warriors that Divine truth, which had come down from heaven, was to take up her abode. Theirs were not the weapons by which she was to conquer; God, in annihilating the mad projects of Seckingen, gave a new illustration of the saying of St. Paul, "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God."

Another chevalier, Harmut of Cronberg, a friend of Hiltten and Seckingen, appears to have had more wisdom and more knowledge of the truth. He wrote with great moderation to Leo X., beseeching him to give up his temporal power to its rightful possessor,—viz., the emperor. Addressing his dependents like a father, he endeavoured to make them comprehend the doctrines of the Gospel; and exhorted them to faith, obedience, and confidence in Jesus Christ, "who," added he, "is the sovereign Lord of all." He resigned a pension of two hundred ducats into the hands of the emperor, "because he was unwilling," as he expressed it, "to continue in the service of one who lent his ear to the enemies of the truth." I have somewhere met with a beautiful saying of his, which seems to place him far above Hiltten and Seckingen. "The Holy Spirit, our heavenly Teacher, is able, when He pleases, to teach us more of the faith of Christ in one hour than we could learn in ten years at the University of Paris."

Those who look for the friends of reformation only on the steps of thrones, or in cathedrals and academies, and maintain that no such friends exist among the people, are under a serious mistake. God, while preparing the heart of the wise and powerful, was also preparing, in retirement, many simple and humble-minded men who were one day to become obedient to the Word. The history of the period gives evidence of the fermentation which was then going on among the humbler classes. The popular literature, previous to the Reformation, had a tendency directly opposed to the spirit which was prevalent in the Church. In the "Eulenspiegel," a celebrated popular poetical collection of the period, the laugh is incessantly kept up at priests, beasts, and gluttons, who keep full-stocked cellars, fine horses, and well-lined pantries. In the "Reynard Reincke," the households of priests, with their little children, play an important part. Another popular writer thunders with all his might against those ministers of Christ who ride splendid horses, but won't fight the infidels; and John Rosenblut, in one of his carnival games, brings the Grand Turk upon the stage, to preach a reasonable sermon to all the states of Christendom.

It was unquestionably in the bowels of the people that the Reformation, which was soon to break out, was fermenting. Not only from this class were youths seen coming forth, who were afterwards to occupy the first stations in the Church, but even individuals, who continued all their lives to labour in the humblest professions, contributed powerfully to the great awakening of Christendom. It may be proper to give some traits in the life of one of them.

TOWN WALLS, NUREMBERG.

On the 5th November, 1494, a tailor of Nuremberg, by name Hans Sachs, had a son born to him. The son, named Hans, (John,) like his father, after having received some schooling, was apprenticed to a shoemaker. Young Hans availed himself of the liberty of thought, which this humble profession afforded, to penetrate into the higher world, in which his soul delighted. Songs, after they ceased in the castles of chivalry, seem to have sought, and to have found, an asylum among the burghers of the joyous cities of Germany. A singing-school was held in the Church of Nuremberg. The performances which took place there, and in which young Hans was accustomed to join, opened his heart to religious impressions, and helped to awaken a taste for poetry and music. The genius of the youth could not long brook confinement within the walls of his workshop. He wished to see with his own eyes that world of which he had read so much, and been told so many stories by his comrades, and which his imagination peopled with wonders. In 1511 he bundles up his effects, and sets out in the direction of the South. The young traveller, falling in with gay comrades—students roaming the country—and many dangerous temptations, soon feels a serious struggle within. The lusts of the world and his pious resolutions war with each other. Trembling for the result, he takes flight, and, in 1513, hides himself in the little town of Wels in Austria, where he lives in retirement, devoting himself to the study of the fine arts. The Emperor Maximilian happens to pass through the town with a brilliant suite, and the young poet is quite fascinated with the splendour of the court. The prince receives him into his hunting train, and Hans once more forgets himself, under the noisy vaults of the palace of Inspriehel. But his conscience again sounds the alarm, and the young huntsman, immediately throwing aside his brilliant uniform, takes his departure, and arrives at Schwatz, near Munich. There, in 1514, at the age of twenty, he composed his first hymn, "In Honour of God," setting it to a remarkable air. It was received with great applause. In the course of his journeys he was witness to many sad proofs of the abuses under which religion groaned.

On his return to Nuremberg, Hans commences business, marries, and becomes the father of a family. When the Reformation breaks out he turns a listening ear. He cordially welcomes the Holy Scripture, which had already endeared itself to him as a poet, and he no longer searches it for images and hymns, but for the light of truth. To this truth he consecrates his lyre. From an humble stall in front of one of the gates of the imperial city of Nuremberg, come forth notes which re-echo over Germany, and everywhere excite a deep interest in the great revolution which is going forward. The spiritual songs of Hans Sachs, and his Bible turned into verse, greatly aided the work. Indeed, it would be difficult to say which of the two did most for it—the elector of Saxony, viceroy of the empire, or the shoemaker of Nuremberg.

Thus, then, there was something in all classes which announced a Reformation. On all sides signs appeared, and events pressed forward, threatening to overthrow the work of ages of darkness, and introduce men to a period in which "all things were to become new." The hierarchical form, which several ages had been employed in stamping upon the world, was on the eve of being effaced. The light which had just been discovered had, with inconceivable rapidity, introduced a number of new ideas into all countries, and all classes of society gave signs of new life. "O age!" exclaims Hütten, "studies flourish, and minds awake: mere life is joy!" . . . The human intellect, which had been slumbering for so many generations, seemed desirous, by its activity, to redeem the time which it had lost. To have left it in idleness, without nourishment, or to have given it no better food than that which had long maintained its languid existence, would have been to mistake the nature of man. The human mind having at length perceived what it was, and what it ought to be, looked boldly at these two states, and scanned the immense abyss which lay between them. Great princes were on the throne, the ancient colossus of Rome was tottering under its own weight, and the old spirit of chivalry was taken leave of the earth to make way for a new spirit, which breathed at once on the sanctuaries of knowledge and on the dwellings of the poor. The printed Word had taken wing, and been carried, as the wind does certain seeds, to the most distant regions. The discovery of the two Indies had enlarged the world. . . . Everything announced that a great revolution was at hand.

But whence will the blow come which is to strike down the ancient edifice, that a new edifice may arise out of its ruins? Nobody could say. Who had more wisdom than Frederick—more science than Reuchlin—more talent than Erasmus—more spirit and versatility than Hütten—more valour than Seckingen—more virtue than Cronberg? And yet, neither Frederick, nor Reuchlin, nor Erasmus, nor Hütten, nor Seckingen, nor Cronberg. . . . Learned men, princes, warriors, the Church herself, had sapped some of the foundations; but there they had stopped. The powerful hand which God had designed to employ was nowhere to be seen.

All, however, felt that it must soon make its appearance, while some even pretended to have seen indications of it in the stars. One class, seeing the miserable state of religion, predicted the near approach of Antichrist. Another class, on the contrary, predicted a speedy Reformation. The world was waiting. . . . Luther appeared.

ALL was ready. God takes ages to prepare His work; but when the hour is come, accomplishes it by the feeblest instruments. To do great things by small means, is the law of God. This law, which appears in every department of nature, is found also in history. God took the Reformers of the Church where He had taken the Apostles. He selected them from that humble class which, without containing the meanness of the people, is scarcely the length of citizenship. Everything must manifest to the world that the work is not of man, but of God. The Reformer Zwingle comes forth from the hut of a shepherd of the Alps, Melancthon, the Theologian of the Reformation, from the workshop of an armourer, and Luther from the cottage of a poor miner.

The first stage in a man's life—that in which he is formed and moulded under the hand of God—is always important, and was so especially in the case of Luther. There, even at that period, the whole Reformation existed. The different phases of that great work succeeded each other in the soul of him who was the instrument of accomplishing it, before it was actually accomplished. The knowledge of the Reformation which took place in Luther's heart is the only key to the Reformation of the Church. We must study the particular work, if we would attain to a knowledge of the general work. Those who neglect the one will never know more than the form and exterior of the other. They may acquire a knowledge of certain events and certain results, but the intrinsic nature of the revival they cannot know, because the living principle which formed the soul of it is hidden from them. Let us, then, study the Reformation in Luther, before studying it in events which changed the face of Christendom.

In the village of Mora, towards the forests of Thuringia, and not far from the spot where Boniface, the Apostle of Germany, began to proclaim the Gospel, there existed, and, undoubtedly, had existed for ages, an ancient and numerous family of the name of Luther. The eldest son, as usual with the peasantry of Thuringia, always succeeded to the house and the paternal plot, while the younger members of the family set out in quest of a livelihood. John Luther having married Margaret Lindenmann, daughter of an inhabitant of Neustadt, in the bishopric of Würzburg, the married couple removed from the plains of Eisenach, and fixed their residence in the little town of Eisleben, in Saxony, in order to gain their bread by the sweat of their brow.

Seckendorff relates, on the testimony of Robhan, superintendent of Eisenach in 1601, that Luther's mother, thinking she was still far from her time, had gone to the fair of Eisleben, and there, unexpectedly gave birth to a son. Notwithstanding of the credit due to such a man as Seckendorff, this account appears not to be correct. In fact, none of the older biographers of Luther make any mention of it. Besides, Mora is more than twenty-four leagues distant from Eisleben; and persons in the circumstances in which Luther's mother then was, seldom are disposed to take such long journeys to go to the fair. In fine, the account seems quite at variance with Luther's own statement.¹

John Luther was an upright, straightforward, hard-working man, with a firmness of character bordering on obstinacy. Of a more cultivated mind than usual with persons of his class, he was a great reader. Books were then rare. But he never let pass any opportunity of procuring them. They were his relaxation in the intervals of repose from hard and long-continued labour. Margaret possessed the virtues which adorn honest and pious women. She was remarked, in particular, for her modesty, her fear of God, and her spirit of prayer. The mothers of the place regarded her as a model whom they ought to imitate.

It is not exactly known how long this couple had been fixed at Eisleben, when, on the 10th November, an hour before midnight, Margaret gave birth to a son. Melancthon often questioned the mother of his friend as to the period of his birth. "I remember the day and the hour very well," would she reply; "but for the year, I am not certain of it." Luther's brother, James, an honest and upright man, has stated that, in the opinion of all the family, Martin was born in the year of Christ 1483, on the 10th November, being St. Martin's eve. The first thought of the pious parents was to take the infant which God had given them, and dedicate it to God in holy baptism. On the following day, which happened to be a Tuesday, the father, with gratitude and joy, carried his son to St. Peter's church, where he received the seal of his dedication to the Lord. He was named Martin, in honour of the day.

Young Martin was not six months old when his parents quitted Eisleben for Mansfeld, which is only five leagues distant. The mines of Mansfeld were then much famed; and John Luther, a labouring man, feeling that he might perhaps be called to rear a numerous family, hoped he might there more easily gain a livelihood. It was in this town that the intellect and powers of young Luther received their first development; here his activity began to be displayed, and his disposition to be manifested by what he said and did. The plains of Mansfeld, the banks of the Wipper, were the scenes of his first sports with his playmates.

The commencement of their residence at Mansfeld was attended with painful privations to honest John and his wife, for they lived some time in great poverty. "My parents," says the Reformer, "were very poor.

MAGDEBOURG.

My father was a poor wood-cutter, and my mother often carried his wood on her back to procure subsistence for us children. The toil they endured for us was severe, even to blood." The example of parents whom he respected, and the habits in which they trained him, early accustomed Luther to exertion and frugality. Often, doubtless, he accompanied his mother to the wood, and made up his little faggot also.

Promises are given to the just man's labour, and John Luther experienced the reality of them. Having become somewhat more easy in his circumstances, he established two smelting furnaces at Mansfeld. Around these furnaces young Martin grew up; and the return which they yielded enabled his father, at a later period, to provide for his studies. "The spiritual founder of Christendom," says worthy Mathesius, "was to come forth from a family of miners, an image of what God purposed, when He employed him to cleanse the sons of Levi, and purify them in His furnaces like gold." Universally respected for his integrity, his blameless life, and good sense, John Luther was made a counsellor of Mansfeld, the capital of the county of that name. Too great wretchedness might have weighed down the spirit of the child, but the easy circumstances of the paternal roof expanded his heart, and elevated his character.

John availed himself of his new situation to cultivate the society which he preferred. He set great value on educated men, and often invited the clergymen and teachers of the place to his table. His house presented an example of one of those societies of simple citizens which did honour to Germany at the commencement of the sixteenth century, and, as a mirror, reflected the numerous images which succeeded each other on the troubled stage of that time. It was not lost on the child. The sight of men to whom so much respect was shewn in his father's house, must, doubtless, on more than one occasion, have awakened, in young Martin's heart, an ambitious desire one day to become a schoolmaster or a man of learning.

As soon as he was of an age to receive some instruction, his parents sought to give him the knowledge and inspire him with the fear of God, and train him in Christian virtues. Their utmost care was devoted to his primary domestic education. This, however, was not the sole object of their tender solicitude.

His father, desirous of seeing him acquire the elements of knowledge, for which he himself had so much esteem, invoked the Divine blessing on his head, and sent him to school. As Martin was still a very little boy, his father or Nicolas Emler, a young man of Mansfeld, often carried him in their arms to the house of George Emilius, and went again to fetch him. Emler afterwards married one of Luther's sisters.

The piety of the parents, their activity and strict virtue, gave a happy impulse to the boy, making him of a grave and attentive spirit. The system of education which then prevailed employed fear and punishment as its leading stimulants. Margaret, though sometimes approving the too strict discipline of her husband, often opened her maternal arms to Martin, to console him in his tears. She herself occasionally carried to excess that precept of Divine Wisdom, which says, "He that spareth the rod hateth his son." The impetuous temper of the child often led to frequent reproof and correction. "My parents," says Luther, in after life, "treated me harshly, and made me very timid. My mother one day chastised me about a silbert till the blood came. They believed with all their heart they were doing right; but they could not discriminate between dispositions, though this is necessary, in order to know when and how punishments should be inflicted."

The poor child's treatment at school was not less severe. His master, one morning, beat him fifteen times in succession. "It is necessary," said Luther, when mentioning the fact, "it is necessary to chastise children; but it is necessary, at the same time, to love them." With such an education, Luther early learned to despise the allurements of a sensual life. "He who is to become great, must begin with little," justly remarks one of his earliest biographers; "and if children are brought up with too much delinquency and tenderness, it does them harm all the rest of their life."

Martin learned something at school. He was taught the heads of the Catechism, the Ten Commandments, the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, hymns, forms of prayer, and the Donat. This last was a Latin grammar, composed in the fourth century by Donatus, St. Jerome's master; and having been improved in the eleventh century by a French monk, named Remigius, was long in high repute as a school-book. He, moreover, compiled the "Cisco-Janus," a very singular almanac, composed in the tenth or eleventh century. In short, he learned all that was taught in the Latin school of Mansfeld.

But the child seems not to have been brought to God. The only religious sentiment which could be discovered in him, was that of fear. Whenever he heard Jesus Christ mentioned he grew pale with terror; for the Saviour had been represented to him as an angry Judge. This servile fear, so foreign to genuine religion, perhaps predisposed him for the glad tidings of the Gospel, and for the joy which he afterwards experienced when he became acquainted with Him who is meek and lowly in heart.

John Luther longed to make his son a learned man. The new light, which began to radiate in all directions, penetrated even the cottage of the miner of Mansfeld, and there awakened ambitious thoughts. The remarkable disposition, and persevering application of his son, inspired John with the most brilliant hopes. Accordingly, in 1197, when Martin had completed his fourteenth year, his father resolved to part with him, and send him to a school of the Franciscans at Magdebourg. Margaret behoved, of course, to consent; and Martin prepared to quit the paternal roof.

Magdebourg was like a new world to Martin. Amid numerous privations (for he had scarcely the means of subsistence) he read and attended lectures; André Proles, provincial of the Augustine Order, was then preaching with great fervour on the necessity of reforming religion and the Church. He, however, was not the person who deposited in the young man's soul the first germ of those ideas which afterwards expanded in it.

This period was a kind of severe apprenticeship to Luther. Launched upon the world at fourteen, without friend or patron, he trembled in presence of his masters, and, during the hours of recreation, painfully begged his food with children as poor as himself. "I and my comrades," says he, "begged a little food for our subsistence. One day, at the season when the Church celebrates the birth of Jesus Christ, we were in a body scouring the neighbouring villages, going from house to house, and, in four parts, singing the ordinary hymns on the Babe of Bethlehem. We stopped before a peasant's cottage, which stood by itself at the extremity of a village. The peasant, hearing us singing our Christmas carols, came out with some provisions which he meant to give us, and asked, in a gruff voice and a harsh tone, 'Where are you, boys?' His tones frightened us, and we took to our heels. We had no cause for fear, for the peasant was sincere in his offer of assistance; but our hearts were, no doubt, made timid by the menaces and tyranny with which masters at this period oppressed their scholars; hence the sudden fright which seized us. At last, however, the peasant still continuing to call us, we stopped, laid aside our fear, and, running up to him, received the food which he intended for us." "In the same way," adds Luther, "are we wont to tremble and flee when our conscience is guilty and alarmed. Then we are afraid even of the assistance which is offered to us, and of those who are friendly to us, and would do us all sorts of kindness."

A year had scarcely passed, when John and Margaret, on being made aware of the difficulties which their son had in living in Magdebourg, sent him to Eisenach, where there was a celebrated school, and they had a number of relations. They had other children; and though their circumstances had improved, they were unable to maintain their son in a strange town. The forges and late hours of John Luther did no more than keep the family at Mansfeld. It was hoped that Martin would find a livelihood more easily at Eisenach; but he was not more successful. His relations in the town did not trouble themselves about him. Perhaps their own poverty made them unable to give him any assistance.

When the scholar felt the gnawings of hunger he had no resource but to do as at Magdebourg,—to join his fellow-students, and sing with them before the houses for a morsel of bread. This custom of the time of Luther has been preserved, even to our day, in several towns of Germany, where the voices of the boys sometimes produce a most harmonious chant. Instead of bread, poor modest Martin often received only hard words. Then, overcome with sadness, he shed many tears in secret, unable to think of the future without trembling.

One day, in particular, he had been repulsed from three houses, and was preparing, without having broken his fast, to return to his lodging, when, on arriving at St. George's Square, he halted, and, absorbed in gloomy thoughts, stood motionless before the house of an honest burgher.

Will it be necessary, from want of bread, to give up study, and go and work with his father in the mines of Mansfeld? Suddenly a door opens, and a female is seen on the threshold,—it was the wife of Conrad Cotta, the daughter of the burgomaster of Ilfeld. Her name was Ursula. The chronicles of Eisenach call her "the pious Shunammite," in allusion to her who so earnestly pressed the prophet Elisha to eat bread with her. Previous to this, the Christian Shunammite had more than once observed young Martin in the assemblies of the faithful, and been touched by the sweetness of his voice, and his devout behaviour. She had just heard the harsh language addressed to the poor scholar, and seeing him in sadness before her door, she came to his assistance, beckoned him to enter, and set food before him to appease his hunger.

Conrad approved of the benevolence of his wife, and was even so much pleased with the society of young Luther, that some days after he took him home to his house. From this moment his studies were secure. He will not be obliged to return to the mines of Mansfeld, and bury the talent with which God has entrusted him. When he no longer knew what was to become of him, God opened to him the heart and the home of a Christian family. This event helped to give him that confidence in God which in after life the strongest tempests could not shake.

In the house of Cotta, Luther was introduced to a mode of life very different from that which he had hitherto known. He there led an easy existence, exempt from want and care. His mind became more serene, his disposition more lively, and his heart more open. His whole being expanded to the mild rays of charity, and began to beat with life, joy, and happiness. His prayers were more ardent, and his thirst for knowledge more intense. He made rapid progress.

To literature and science he added the charms of art. Those who are designed by God to act upon their contemporaries are themselves, in the first instance, seized and carried along by all the tendencies of their age. Luther learned to play on the flute and the lute. The latter instrument he often accompanied with his fine counter voice, thus enlivening his heart in moments of sadness. He took pleasure also in employing his notes to testify his gratitude to his adopted mother, who was very fond of music. His own love of it continued to old age; and both the words and the music of some of the finest anthems which Germany possesses are his composition. Some have even been translated into our language.

Happy time for the young man! Luther always remembered it with emotion. Many years after, a son of Conrad having come to study at Wittenberg, when the poor scholar of Eisenach had become the doctor of his age, he gladly received him at his table, and under his roof. He wished to pay back to the son part of what he had received from the parents. It was while thinking of the Christian woman who gave him food, when all besides repulsed him, that he gave utterance to this fine expression, "Earth has nothing gentler than the female heart in which piety dwells."

Luther was never ashamed of the days when, pressed by hunger, he was under the necessity of begging for his studies and his maintenance. So far from this, he, on the contrary, reflected with gratitude on the great poverty of his youth. He regarded it as one of the means which God had employed to make him what he afterwards became, and he felt thankful for it. The poor youths who were obliged to follow the same course touched his heart: "Do not," said he, "despise the boys who sing before your houses, and ask 'parvulus propter Deum,' (bread for the love of God;) I have done it myself. It is true that, at a later period, my father, with great love and kindness, kept me at the University of Erfurt, maintaining me by the sweat of his brow; still, I once was a poor beggar. And now, by means of my pen, I am come thus far, that I would not change situations with the Grand Turk himself. Nay, more, were all the goods of the world piled up one above another, I would not take them in exchange for what I have. And yet, I should not be where I am, if I had not been at school and learned to write." Thus, in these first humble beginnings this great man traced the origin of his fame. He fears not to remind us that that voice, whose accents made the empire and the world to tremble, had once begged a morsel of bread in the streets of a poor city. The Christian takes pleasure in such recollections, as reminding him that it is in God he must glory.

The strength of his intellect, and the liveliness of his imagination, soon enabled him to outstrip all his fellow-students. His progress was particularly rapid in ancient languages, eloquence, and poetry. He wrote essays and made verses. Lively, complaisant, and what is called good-hearted, he was a great favourite with his masters and his comrades.

Among the professors, he attached himself particularly to John Trebonius, a learned man, of pleasing manners, who shewed youth those attentions which are so well fitted to encourage them. Martin had remarked, that when Trebonius entered the class, he took off his hat, and bowed to the students,—great condescension in those pedantic times! This had pleased the young man, and made him feel that he was not a mere cipher. The respect of the master had made the pupil rise in his own estimation. The colleagues of Trebonius, who had not the same custom of taking off their hats, having one day expressed their astonishment at his extreme condescension, he replied, (and the reply made no less impression on young Luther.) "Among these youths are men whom God will one day make burgomasters, chancellors, doctors, and magistrates; and though you do not yet see them with their badges of office, it is right, however, to shew them respect." No doubt the young student listened with pleasure to these words, and even then, perhaps, saw himself with a doctor's cap on his head.

CHAPTER II.

Scholasticism and the Classics—Luther's Piety—Discovery—The Bible—Sickness—Master of Arts—Classical note—Death of Alexis—Thunderstorm—Prevalence—Adieux—Entrance into a Convent.

LUTHER had attained his eighteenth year. He had tasted the pleasures of literature, and burning with eagerness to learn, he sighed after a university, and longed to repair to one of those fountains of science, at which he might quench his thirst for knowledge. His father wished him to study law, and already saw him filling an honourable station among his fellow-citizens, gaining the favour of princes, and making a figure on the theatre of the world. It was resolved that the young student should repair to Erfurt.

Luther arrived at this university in the year 1501. Jarbecus, surnamed the Doctor of the Eisenach, was then teaching the scholastic philosophy with much success. Melancthon regrets that the only thing then taught at Erfurt should have been a dialectic bristling with difficulties. He thinks that if Luther had found other professors there, if he had been trained in the milder and calmer discipline of true philosophy, it might have moderated and softened the vehemence of his nature. The new scholar began to study the philosophy of the middle ages in the writings of Ocean, Scotus, Bonaventura, and Thomas Aquinas. At a later period he had a thorough disgust for all this scholasticism. The very name of Aristotle, pronounced in his hearing, filled him with indignation; and he even went the length of saying, that if Aristotle was not a man, he would have no hesitation in taking him for the devil. But his mind, in its eagerness for learning, stood in need of better nourishment, and he began to study the noble monuments of antiquity, the writings of Cicero and Virgil, and the other Classics. He was not contented, like the common run of students, with committing the productions of these writers to memory. He endeavoured, above all, to enter into their thoughts; to imbue himself with the spirit which animated them; to appropriate their wisdom; to comprehend the end of their writings; and enrich his understanding with their weighty sentiments and brilliant images. He often put questions to his professors, and soon outstripped his fellow-students. Possessed of a retentive memory and a fertile imagination, whatever he read or heard remained ever after present to his mind, as if he had actually seen it. "So shone Luther in his youth. The whole university," says Melancthon, "admired his genius."

But even at that period this young man of eighteen did not confine his labours to the cultivation of his intellect. He had that serious thought, that uplifted spirit, which God bestows on those whom He destines to be His most faithful servants. Luther felt that he was dependent on God—a simple, yet powerful conviction,—the source at once of profound humility and great achievements. He fervently invoked the Divine blessing on his labours. Each morning he began the day with prayer, then he went to church, and on his return set to study, being not a moment during the course of the day. "To pray well," he was wont to say, "is more than the half of my study."

Every moment which the young student could spare from his academical labours, was spent in the library of the university. Books were still rare, and he felt it a great privilege to be able to avail himself of the treasures amassed in this vast collection. One day (he had then been two years at Erfurt, and was twenty years of age) he opens several books of the library, one after the other, to see who their authors were. One of the volumes which he opened in its turn attracts his attention. He has never before seen one like it. He reads the title, . . . it is a Bible! a rare book, at that time unknown. His interest is strongly excited; he is perfectly astonished to find in this volume anything more than those fragments of gospel and epistles which the Church has selected to be read publicly in the churches every Sabbath day. Hitherto he had believed that these formed the whole Word of God. But here are so many pages, chapters, and books, of which he had no idea! His heart beats as he holds in his hand all this divinely-inspired Scripture, and he turns over all these divine leaves with feelings which cannot be described. The first page on which he fixes his attention tells him the history of Hannah and young Samuel. He reads, and his soul is filled with joy to overflowing. The child whom his parents lead to Jehovah for all the days of his life; the song of Hannah, in which she declares that the Lord lifts up the poor from the dust, and the needy from the dung-hill, that He may set him with princes; young Samuel growing up in the presence of the Lord; the whole of this history, the whole of the volume which he has discovered, make him feel in a way he has never done before. He returns home, his heart full. "Oh!" thinks he, "would it please God one day to give me such a book for my own!" Luther as yet did not know either Greek or Hebrew; for it is not probable that he studied these languages during the first two or three years of his residence at the university. The Bible which had so overjoyed him was in Latin. Soon returning to his treasure in the library, he reads and re-reads, and in his astonishment and joy returns to read again. The first rays of a new truth were then dawning upon him.

In this way God has put him in possession of His Word. He has discovered the book of which he is one day to give his countrymen that admirable translation in which Germany has now for three centuries perused the oracles of God. It was perhaps the first time that any hand had taken down this precious volume from the place which it occupied in the library of Erfurt. This book, lying on the unknown shelves of an obscure chamber, is to become the book of life to a whole people. The Reformation was hid in that Bible.

This happened the same year that Luther obtained his first academical degree, viz., that of Bachelor. The excessive fatigue which he had undergone in preparing for his trials brought on a dangerous illness. Death seemed to be approaching, and solemn thoughts occupied his mind. He believed that his earthly course was about to terminate. There was a general lamentation for the young man. What a pity to see so many hopes so soon extinguished! Several friends came to visit him in his sickness; among others a priest, a venerable old man, who had with interest followed the student of Mansfeld in his labours and academic life. Luther was unable to conceal the thought which agitated him. "Soon," said he, "I will be called away from this world." But the old man kindly replied, "My dear bachelor, take courage; you will not die of this illness. Our God will yet make you a man, who, in his turn, will console many other men. For God lays His cross on him whom He loves, and those who bear it patiently acquire much wisdom." These words made a deep impression on the sick youth. When so near death he hears the lips of a priest reminding him that God, as Samuel's mother had said, lifts up the miserable. The old man has poured sweet consolation into his heart and revived his spirits; he will never forget him. "This was the first prediction the Doctor heard," says Mathesius, Luther's friend, who relates the fact; "and he often mentioned it." It is easy to understand what Mathesius means by calling it a prediction.

When Luther recovered, something within him had undergone a change. The Bible, his illness, and the words of the old priest, seemed to have made a new appeal to him. As yet, however, there was nothing decided in his mind. He continued his studies, and, in 1505, took his degree of Master of Arts, or Doctor in Philosophy. The University of Erfurt was then the most celebrated in Germany,—the others, in comparison with it, being only inferior schools. The ceremony was, as usual, performed with great pomp. A procession with torches came to do homage to Luther. The fête was superb, and all was joy. Luther, encouraged, perhaps, by these honours, was disposed to devote himself entirely to law, agreeably to his father's wish.

But God willed otherwise. While Luther was occupied with other studies, while he began to teach the physics and ethics of Aristotle, and other branches of philosophy, his heart ceased not to cry to him that piety was the one thing needful, and that he ought, above all, to make sure of his salvation. He was aware of the displeasure which God testifies against sin; he also wished to open his heart to his father, and sound him as to the design which was beginning to form in his mind, and obtain a consent to his embracing another calling. He foresaw all the difficulties which awaited him. The indolent habits of the majority of priests displeased the active miner of Mansfeld. Besides, ecclesiastics were little esteemed in the world; most of them had but scanty incomes; and the father, who had made many sacrifices to maintain his son at the university, and who saw him, at twenty, a public teacher in a celebrated school, was not disposed to renounce the hopes which his pride was cherishing.

We know not what passed during Luther's visit at Mansfeld. Perhaps the decided wish of his father made him afraid to open his heart to him. He again quitted the paternal roof to go and take his seat on the benches of the university, and had reached within a short distance of Erfurt, when he was overtaken by one of those violent storms which are not infrequent among these mountains. The thunder bursts, and strikes close by his side. Luther throws himself on his knees. It may be his hour is come,—death, judgment, and eternity, surround him with all their terrors, and speak to him with a voice which he can no longer resist. "Wrapt in agony, and in the terror of death," as he himself describes it, he makes a vow, if he is delivered from this danger, to abandon the world, and give himself entirely to God. After he had risen from the ground, still continuing to see that death which must one day overtake him, he examines himself seriously, and asks what he ought to do. The thoughts which formerly agitated him return with full force. He has endeavoured, it is true, to fulfil all his duties. But in what remembered the punishments which He denounces against the sinner; and he asked himself in fear, whether he was sure of possessing the Divine favour? His conscience answered No! His character was prompt and decided; he resolved to do all that might be necessary to give him a sure hope of immortality. Two events, which happened in succession, shook his soul, and precipitated his determination.

Among his friends at the university, was one named Alexis, with whom he was very intimate. One morning it was rumoured in Erfurt that Alexis had been assassinated. Deeply moved at the sudden loss of his friend, he puts the question to himself, What would become of me were I called thus suddenly? The question fills him with the greatest dismay.

This was in the summer of 1505. Luther, left at liberty by the ordinary recess of the university, resolved on a journey to Mansfeld, to revisit the loved abodes of his infancy, and embrace his parents. Perhaps he state is his soul? Can he appear with a polluted heart before the tribunal of a God so greatly to be feared? He must become holy, and, accordingly, he now thirsts for holiness as he had thirsted for science. But where is it to be found? How shall he acquire it? The university has furnished him with the means of satisfying his desire of knowledge. Who will extinguish the agony, the flame which is consuming him? To what school of holiness must he bend his steps? He will go into a cloister; the monastic life will save him. How often has he heard tell of its power to transform a heart, to sanctify a sinner, to make a man perfect! He will enter a monastic order. He will then become holy, and in that way secure eternal life.

Such was the event which changed the calling and all the destinies of Luther. We here recognise the finger of God. It was His mighty hand which threw down on the high road this young Master of Arts, this candidate for the bar, this future lawyer, in order to give an entirely new direction to his life. Rubinius, one of Luther's friends, wrote to him at a later period,—"Divine Providence had a view to what you were one day to become, when, as you were returning from your parents, the fire of heaven made you fall to the ground like another Paul, near the town of Erfurt, and, carrying you off from our society, threw you into the Order of Augustine." Analogous circumstances thus signified the conversion of Paul and Luther, the two greatest instruments which Divine Providence has employed in the two greatest revolutions which have taken place upon the earth.¹

Luther again enters Erfurt. His resolution is immovable, and yet it is not without a pang he is going to break ties which are dear to him. He gives no hint to any one of his intentions. But one evening he invites his friends in the university to a cheerful and frugal repast. Music once more enlivens their social intercourse. It is Luther's alien to the world. Henceforth, instead of those loved companions of pleasure and toil—monks; instead of those cheerful and intellectual conversations—the silence of the cloister; instead of that enchanting music—the grave notes of the tranquil chapel. God demands it,—all must be sacrificed. Yet, for this last time, once more the joys of youth. His friends are full of glee. Luther even leads them on. But at the moment when they are abandoning themselves to mirth and frolic, the young man becomes unable any longer to restrain the serious thoughts which occupy his heart. He speaks. . . . He makes known his intention to his astonished friends, who endeavour, but in vain, to combat it. That same night, Luther, afraid perhaps of importunate solicitation, quits his lodgings, leaving behind him all his effects and all his books, with the exception of Virgil and Plautus, (as yet he had no Bible.) Virgil and Plautus—epic and comedy—singular representation of Luther's mind. In fact, there was in him a whole epic, a beautiful, splendid, and sublime poem; but being naturally inclined to gaiety, pleasantry, and broad humour, he mingled more than one familiar trait with the solemn and magnificent groundwork of his life.

Furnished with these two books he proceeds alone, in the dark, to the convent of the Eremites of St. Augustine, and asks to be received. The door opens and closes, and he is separated for ever from his parents, his fellow-students, and the world. This took place on the 17th August, 1505, when Luther's age was twenty-one years and nine months.

find. At the sight of this young doctor, the monks were all admiration, and extolled him for his courage and contempt of the world. Luther, meanwhile, did not forget his friends. He wrote to take leave of them and the world, and the next day despatched these letters, with the clothes he had hitherto worn, and his diploma of Master of Arts, which he returned to the university, that nothing might in future remind him of the world which he had abandoned.

His friends at Erfurt were thunderstruck. Must so distinguished a genius go and hide himself in this monastic life—more properly, a kind of death! In deep sorrow they hastened to the convent, in the hope of inducing Luther to retrace the distressing step which he had taken; but all was useless. The gates were closed, and a month passed before any one was permitted to see or speak to the new monk.

Luther had hastened to acquaint his parents with the great change which had just occurred in his life. His father was thunderstruck. He trembled for his son,—so Luther himself informs us in his book on "Monastic Vows," which he dedicated to his father. His weakness, his youth, the ardour of his passions, everything, in short, made him fear that, after the first moment of enthusiasm, the indolence of the cloister would make the youth fall either into despair, or into grievous faults. He knew that this mode of life had proved fatal to many. Besides, the councillor-miner of Mansfeld had other views for his son. He was proposing a rich and honourable marriage for him—and, lo! all his ambitious projects are, in one night, overthrown by this imprudent action.

John wrote his son a very angry letter, in which, as Luther himself tells us, he thou'd him, whereas he had you'd him ever since he had taken his degree of Master of Arts. He withdrew all his favour from him, and declared him disinherited of a father's affection. In vain did the friends of John Luther, and, doubtless, his wife also, endeavour to mollify him; in vain did they say to him, "If you are willing to make some sacrifice to God, let it be the best and dearest thing that you have—your son—your Isaac." The inexorable councillor of Mansfeld would hear nothing.

Some time after, (the statement is given by Luther in a sermon which he preached at Wittenberg, 20th January, 1544.) the plague broke out, and deprived John Luther of two of his sons. On the back of these bereavements, while the father's heart was torn with grief, some one came and told him, "The monk of Erfurt also is dead!" His friends took advantage of the circumstance to bring back the father's heart to the novice. "If it is a false alarm," said they, "at least sanctify your affliction by consenting sincerely to your son's being a monk." "Well, well!" replied John Luther, his heart broken, and still half rebellious; "and God grant him all success." At a later period, when Luther, who had been reconciled to his father, told him of the event which had led him to rush into monastic orders,—“God grant,” replied the honest miner, "that what you took for a sign from heaven may not have been only a phantom of the devil!"

At this time Luther was not in possession of that which was afterwards to make him the Reformer of the Church. His entrance into the convent proves this.

It was an action done in the spirit of an age out of which he was soon to be instrumental in raising the Church. Though destined to become the teacher of the world, he was still its servile imitator. A new stone was placed on the edifice of superstition by the very hand which was soon to overturn it. Luther was seeking salvation in himself, in human practices and observances, not knowing that salvation is wholly of God. He was seeking his own righteousness and his own glory, and overlooking the righteousness and glory of the Lord. But what he as yet knew not, he soon afterwards learned. That immense change which substituted God and His wisdom in his heart for the world and its traditions, and which prepared the mighty revolution of which he was the most illustrious instrument, took place in the cloister of Erfurt.

Martin Luther, on entering the convent, changed his name to that of Augustine.

The monks had received him with joy. It was no small satisfaction to their self-love to see the university abandoned for a house of their order, and that by one of the most distinguished teachers. Nevertheless, they treated him harshly, and assigned him the meanest tasks. They wished to humble the doctor of philosophy, and teach him that his science did not raise him above his brethren. They thought, moreover, they would thus prevent him from spending his time in studies from which the convent could not reap any advantage. The ci-devant Master of Arts behoved to perform the functions of watchman, to open and shut the gates, wind up the clocks, sweep the church, and clean up the rooms. Then, when the poor monk, who was at once porter, sceristan, and household servant to the cloister, had finished his task, "Cum sacco per civitatem"—"To the town with the bag,"—exclaimed the friars; and then, with his bread-bag on his shoulders, he walked up and down over all the streets of Erfurt, begging from house to house, obliged, perhaps, to present himself at the doors of those who had been his friends or inferiors. On his return, he had either to shut himself up in a low narrow cell, looking out on a plot only a few yards in extent, or to resume his menial offices. But he submitted to all. Disposed by temperament to give himself entirely to whatever he undertook, when he turned monk he did it with his whole soul. How, moreover, could he think of sparing his body, or of having regard to what might satisfy the flesh? That was not the way to acquire the humility and holiness in quest of which he had come within the walls of the cloister.

The poor monk, worn out with fatigue, was eager to seize any moment which he could steal from his servile occupations, and devote it to the acquisition of knowledge. Gladly did he retire into a corner, and give himself up to his beloved studies. But the friars soon found him out, gathered around him, grumbled at him, and pushed him away to his labours, saying, "Along! along! it is not by studying, but by begging bread, corn, eggs, fish, flesh, and money, that a friar makes himself useful to his convent." Luther submitted, laid aside his books, and again took up his bag. Far from repenting of having subjected himself to such a yoke, his wish was to bring it to a successful result. At this period, the inflexible perseverance with which he ever after followed out the resolutions which he had once formed, began to be developed. The resistance which he made to rude assaults gave strong energy to his will. God exercised him in small things, that he might be able to stand firm in great things. Besides, in preparing to deliver his age from the miserable superstitions under which it groaned, it was necessary that he should feel the weight of them. In order to empty the cup, he behoved to drink it to the dregs.

This severe apprenticeship, however, did not last so long as Luther might have feared. The prior of the convent, on the intercession of the university of which Luther was a member, relieved him from the mean functions which had been imposed on him, and the young monk resumed his studies with new zeal. The writings of the Fathers, particularly those of Augustine, engaged his attention; the commentary of this illustrious doctor on the Psalms, and his treatise "On the Letter and the Spirit," being his special favourites. Nothing struck him more than the sentiments of this Father on the corruption of the human will, and on Divine grace. His own experience convincing him of the reality of this corruption, and the necessity of this grace, the words of Augustine found a ready response in his heart; and could he have been of any other school than that of Jesus Christ, it had doubtless been the school of the doctor of Hippo. The works of Peter d'Ailly and Gabriel Biel he almost knew by heart. He was struck with a remark of the former—that had not the Church decided otherwise, it would have been much better to admit, that in the Lord's Supper bread and wine are truly received, and not mere accidents.

He likewise carefully studied the theologians, Oecam and Gerson, who both expressed themselves so freely on the authority of the popes. To this reading he joined other exercises. In public discussions he was heard unravelling the most complicated reasonings, and winding his way through labyrinths where others could find no outlet. All who heard him were filled with admiration.

But he had entered the cloister, not to acquire the reputation of a great genius, but in quest of the food of piety. These labours he accordingly regarded as supernumerary.

But the thing in which he delighted above all others was to draw wisdom at the pure fountain of the Word of God. In the convent he found a Bible fastened to a chain, and was ever returning to this chained Bible. He had a very imperfect comprehension of the Word; but still it was his most pleasant reading. Sometimes he spent a whole day in meditating on a single passage; at other times he learned passages of the prophets by heart. His great desire was, that the writings of the apostles and prophets might help to give him a knowledge of the will of God, increase the fear which he had for His name, and nourish his faith by the sure testimony of the Word.

Apparently at this period he began to study the Scriptures in the original tongues, and thereby lay the foundation of the most perfect and the most useful of his labours, the translation of the Bible. He used a Hebrew Lexicon which Reuchlin had just published. His first guide was probably John Lange, a friar of the convent, versed in Greek and Hebrew, and with whom he always maintained a close intimacy. He also made great use of the learned commentaries of Nicolas Lyra, who died in 1340, and hence the saying of Pflug, afterwards bishop of Naumbourg, "Had not Lyra played the lyre, Luther had never danced"—"Si Lyra non lyraasset, Lutherus non saltasset."

The young monk studied so closely and ardently, that he often omitted to say his Hours during two or three weeks. Then, besonning alarmed at the thought of having transgressed the rules of his order, he shut himself up to make amends for his negligence, and commenced conscientiously repeating all the omitted Hours, without thinking of meat or drink. On one occasion his sleep went from him for seven weeks.

Earnestly intent on acquiring the holiness in quest of which he had entered the cloister, Luther addicted himself to the ascetic life in its fullest rigour, seeking to crucify the flesh by fastings, macerations, and vigils. Shut up in his cell as in a prison, he struggled without intermission against the evil thoughts and evil propensities of his heart. A little bread and a herring were often all his food. Indeed, he was naturally very temperate. Often, when he had no thought of purchasing heaven by abstinence, have his friends seen him content himself with the coarsest provisions, and even remain four days in succession without eating or drinking. We have this on the testimony of a very credible witness, Melancthon; and we may judge from it what opinion to form of the fables which ignorance and prejudice have circulated concerning Luther's intemperance. At the period of which we treat, there is no sacrifice he would have declined to make, in order to become holy and purchase heaven. When Luther, after he had become reformer, says that heaven is not purchased, he well knew what he meant. "Truly," wrote he to George, Duke of Saxony,—"truly, I was a pious monk, and followed the rules of my order more strictly than I can tell. If ever monk had got to heaven by monkery, I had been that monk. In this all the monks of my acquaintance will bear me witness. Had the thing continued much longer, I had become a martyr unto death, through vigils, prayer, reading, and other labours."

We are touching on the period which made Luther a new man, and which, revealing to him the immensity of the Divine love, fitted him for proclaiming it to the world.

The peace which Luther had come in search of he found neither in the tranquillity of the cloister nor in monastic perfection. He wished to be assured of his salvation; it was the great want of his soul; and without it he could have no repose. But the fears which had agitated him when in the world, followed him into his cell. Nay, they were even increased; the least cry of his heart raising a loud echo under the silent vaults of the cloister. God had brought him thither that he might learn to know himself, and to despair of his own strength and virtue. His conscience, enlightened by the Divine Word, told him what it was to be holy; but he was filled with alarm at not finding, either in his heart or his life, that image of holiness which he had contemplated with admiration in the Word of God—a sad discovery made by every man who is in earnest! No righteousness within—no righteousness without; everywhere omission, sin, defilement. . . . The more ardent Luther's natural disposition was, the more strongly he felt the secret and unceasing resistance which human nature opposes to goodness. This threw him into despair.

The monks and theologians of the day invited him to do works in order to satisfy the Divine justice. But what works, thought he, can proceed from such a heart as mine! How should I be able with works, polluted in their very principle, to stand in presence of my holy Judge? "I felt myself," says he, "to be a great sinner before God, and deemed it impossible to appease Him by my merits."

He was agitated, and, at the same time, gloomy, shunning the silly and coarse conversation of the monks, who, unable to comprehend the tempests of his soul, regarded him with astonishment, and reproached him for his gloom and taciturnity. It is told by Cochleus, that one day, when they were saying mass in the chapel, Luther had come with his sighs, and stood amid the friars in sadness and anguish. The priest had already prostrated himself, the incense had been placed on the altar, the Gloria had been chanted, and they were reading the Gospel, when the poor monk, no longer able to contain his agony, exclaimed, in a piercing tone, while throwing himself on his knees, "Not I! not I!" Every one was in amazement, and the service was for a moment interrupted. Perhaps Luther thought he had heard himself reproached with something of which he knew he was innocent; perhaps he meant to express his unworthiness to be one of those to whom the death of Christ brought eternal life. Cochleus says that they were reading the passage of Scripture which tells of the dumb man out of whom Christ expelled a demon. If this account is correct, Luther's cry might have a reference to this circumstance. He might mean to intimate, that though dumb like the man, it was owing to another cause than the possession of a demon. In fact, Cochleus informs us that the friars sometimes attributed the agonies of their brother to occult commerce with the devil, and he himself is of the same opinion.

A tender conscience led Luther to regard the smallest fault as a great sin. No sooner had he discovered it, than he strove to expiate it by the severest mortifications. This, however, had no other effect than to convince him of the utter inefficacy of all human remedies. "I tormented myself to death," says he, "in order to procure peace with God to my troubled heart and agitated conscience; but, surrounded with fearful darkness, I nowhere found it."

The acts of monastic holiness which lulled so many consciences, and to which he himself had recourse in his agony, soon appeared to Luther only the fallacious eures of an empirical and quack religion. "At the time when I was a monk, if I felt some temptation assail me, I am lost! said I to myself; and immediately resorted to a thousand methods, in order to suppress the cries of my heart. I confessed every day; but that did me no good. Thus oppressed with sadness, I was tormented by a multiplicity of thoughts. 'Look!' exclaimed I, 'there you are still envious, impatient, passionate! It is of no use then, for you, O wretch, to have entered this sacred order.'"

And yet Luther, imbued with the prejudices of his day, had from his youth up considered the acts, whose impotence he now experienced, as sure remedies for diseased souls. What was he to think of the strange discovery which he had just made in the solitude of the cloister? It is possible, then, to dwell in the sanctuary, and still carry within oneself a man of sin! He has received another garment, but not another heart. His hopes are disappointed. Where is he to stop? Can it be that all these rules and observances are only human inventions? Such a supposition appears to him at one time a suggestion of the devil, and at another time an irresistible truth. Struggling alternately with the holy voice which spoke to his heart, and with venerable institutions which had the sanction of ages, Luther's life was a continual combat. The young monk, like a shade, glided through the long passages of the cloister, making them echo with his sad groans. His body pined away, and his strength left him; on different occasions he remained as if he were dead.¹

Once, overwhelmed with sadness, he shut himself up in his cell, and for several days and nights allowed no one to approach him. Lucas Edeberger, one of his friends, feeling uneasy about the unhappy monk, and having some presentiment of the state in which he actually was, taking with him several boys, who were accustomed to chant in choirs, went and knocked at the door of his cell. No one opens or answers. Good Edeberger, still more alarmed, forces the door. Luther is stretched on the floor insensible, and shewing no signs of life. His friend tries in vain to revive him, but he still remains motionless. The young boys begin to chant a soft anthem. Their pure voices act like a charm on the poor monk, who had always the greatest delight in music, and he gradually recovers sensation, consciousness, and life. But if music could for some moments give him a slight degree of serenity, another and more powerful remedy was wanted to cure him effectually—that soft and penetrating sound of the Gospel, which is the voice of God himself. He was well aware of this, and, accordingly, his sorrows and alarms led him to study the writings of the apostles and prophets with renewed zeal.

LUTHER was not the first monk who had passed through similar struggles. The cloisters often shrouded within the obscurity of their walls abominable vices, at which, if they had been brought to light, every honest mind would have shuddered; but they often also concealed

Christian virtues which were there unfolded in silence, and which, if they had been placed before the eyes of the world, would have excited admiration. These virtues, possessed by those who lived only with themselves and with God, attracted no attention, and were often even unknown to the modest convent within which they were contained. Leading a life known to God only, these humble solitaires fell occasionally into that mystical theology—sad malady of noblest minds—which formerly constituted the delight of the first monks on the banks of the Nile, and which uselessly consumes those who fall under its influence.

Still, when one of these men happened to be called to an eminent station, he there displayed virtues whose salutary influence was long and widely felt. The candle being placed on the candlestick gave light to all the house. Several were awakened by this light; and hence those pious souls, propagated from generation to generation, kept shining like solitary torches at the very time when cloisters were often little better than impure receptacles of the deepest darkness.

A young man had in this way attracted notice in one of the convents of Germany. He was named John Staupitz, and was of a noble family in Misnia. From his earliest youth, having a taste for science and a love of virtue, he longed for retirement, in order to devote himself to literature; but soon finding that philosophy and the study of nature could do little for eternal salvation, he began to study theology, making it his special object to join practice with knowledge. For, says one of his biographers, "it is vain to deck ourselves with the name of theologian, if we do not prove our title to the honourable name by our life." The study of the Bible, and of the theology of St. Augustine, the knowledge of himself, and the war which he, like Luther, had to wage against the wiles and lusts of his heart, led him to the Redeemer, through faith in whom he found peace to his soul. The doctrine of the election of grace had, in particular, taken a firm hold of his mind. Integrity of life, profound science and eloquence, combined with a noble appearance and a dignified address, recommended him to his contemporaries. The Elector of Saxony, Frederick the Wise, made him his friend, employed him on different embassies, and under his direction founded the University of Wittenberg. This disciple of St. Paul and St. Augustine was the first Dean of the Faculty of Theology in that school which was one day to send forth light to enlighten the schools and churches of so many nations. He attended the Council of Lateran, as deputy from the Archbishop of Salzburg, became provincial of his order in Thuringia and Saxony, and ultimately vicar-general of the Augustines all over Germany.

Staupitz lamented the corruption of manners and the errors in doctrine which were laying waste the Church. This is proved by his writings on the love of God, on Christian faith, on resemblance to Christ in His death, and by the testimony of Luther. But he considered the former of these evils as greatly the worse of the two. Besides, the mildness and indecision of his character, and his desire not to go beyond the sphere of action which he thought assigned to him, made him fitter to be the restorer of a convent than the reformer of the Church. He could have wished to confer important stations only on distinguished men; but not finding them, he was contented to employ others. "We must plough with horses," said he, "if we can find them; but if we have no horses, we must plough with oxen."

We have seen the anguish and inward wrestlings to which Luther was a prey in the convent of Erfurt. At this time a visit from the vicar-general was announced; and Staupitz accordingly arrived to make his ordinary inspection. The friend of Frederick, the founder of the University of Wittenberg, the head of the Augustines, took a kind interest in the monks under his authority. It was not long ere one of the friars of the convent attracted his attention. This was a young man of middle stature, whom study, abstinence, and vigils, had so wasted away, that his bones might have been esmited. His eyes, which at a later period were compared to those of the falcon, were sunken, his gait was sad, and his looks bespoke a troubled soul, the victim of numerous struggles, yet still strong and bent on resisting. His whole appearance had in it something grave, melancholy, and solemn. Staupitz, whose discernment had been improved by long experience, easily discovered what was passing in the soul of the young friar, and singled him out from those around him. He felt drawn towards him, had a presentiment of his high destiny, and experienced the interest of a parent for his subaltern. He, too, had struggled like Luther, and could therefore understand his situation. Above all, he could shew him the way of peace, which he himself had found. The information he received of the circumstances which had brought the young Augustine to the convent increased his sympathy. He requested the prior to treat him with great mildness, and availed himself of the opportunities which his office gave him to gain the young friar's confidence. Going kindly up to him, he took every means to remove his timidity, which was, moreover, increased by the respect and reverence which the elevated rank of Staupitz naturally inspired.

The heart of Luther, till then closed by harsh treatment, opened at last, and expanded to the mild rays of charity. "As in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man." The heart of Staupitz answered to the heart of Luther. The vicar-general understood him; and the monk, in his turn, felt a confidence in Luther which no one had hitherto inspired. He revealed to him the cause of his sadness, depicted the fearful thoughts which agitated him, and then in the cloister of Erfurt commenced a conversation full of wisdom and instruction.

"In vain," said Luther despondingly to Staupitz,— "in vain do I make promises to God; sin has always the mastery."

"O my friend," replied the vicar-general, thinking how it had been with himself, "more than a thousand times have I sworn to our holy God to live piously, and I have never done so. Now I no longer swear; for I know I should not perform. Unless God be pleased to be gracious to me for the love of Christ, and to grant me a happy departure when I leave this world, I shall not be able, with all my vows and all my good works, to stand before Him. I must perish."

The young monk is terrified at the thought of the Divine justice, and lays all his fears before the vicar-general. The ineffable holiness of God, and his sovereign majesty, fill him with alarm. Who will be able to support the day of His advent—who to stand when He appeareth?

Staupitz resumes. He knows where he has found peace, and his young friend will hear it. "Why torment thyself," said he to him, "with all these speculations and high thoughts! Look to the wounds of Jesus Christ, to the blood which He has shed for thee; then thou shalt see the grace of God. Instead of making a martyr of thyself for thy faults, throw thyself into the arms of the Redeemer. Confide in Him, in the righteousness of His life, and the expiation of His death. Keep not back; God is not angry with thee; it is thou who art angry with God. Listen to the Son of God, who became man in order to assure thee of the Divine favour. He says to thee, 'Thou art my sheep; thou hearest my voice; none shall pluck thee out of my hand.'"

But Luther does not here find the repentance which he believes necessary to salvation. He replies, and it is the ordinary reply of agonized and frightened souls, "How dare I believe in the favour of God, while there is nothing in me like true conversion? I must be changed before He can receive me."

His venerable guide shews him that there can be no true conversion while God is dreaded as a severe Judge. "What will you say, then," exclaims Luther, "of the many consciences to which a thousand unreportable observances are prescribed as a means of gaining heaven?"

Then he hears this reply from the vicar-general, or rather his belief is, that it comes not from man, but is a voice sounding from heaven. "No repentance," says Staupitz, "is true, save that which begins with the love of God and of righteousness. What others imagine to be the end and completion of repentance is, on the contrary, only the commencement of it. To have a thorough love of goodness, thou must, before all, have a thorough love of God. If thou wouldest be converted, dwell not upon all these macerations and tortures: 'Love Him who first loved thee.'"

Luther listens and listens again. These consoling words fill him with unknown joy, and give him new light. "It is Jesus Christ," thinks he in his heart. "Yes, it is Jesus Christ himself who consoles me so wonderfully by these sweet and salutary words."

These words, in fact, penetrated to the inmost heart of the young monk, like the sharp arrow of a mighty man. In order to repent, it is necessary to love God. Illumined with this new light, he proceeds to examine the Scriptures, searching out all the passages which speak of repentance and conversion. These words, till now so much dreaded, become, to use his own expressions, "an agreeable sport, and the most delightful recreation. All the passages of Scripture which frightened him seem now to rise up from all sides, smiling, and leaping, and sporting with him."

"Hitherto," exclaims he, "though I carefully disguised the state of my heart, and strove to give utterance to a love which was only constrained and fictitious, Scripture did not contain a word which seemed to me more bitter than that of repentance. Now, however, there is none sweeter and more agreeable. Oh! how pleasant the precepts of God are, when we read them not only in books, but in the precious wounds of the Saviour!"

Meanwhile, Luther, though consoled by the words of Staupitz, was still subject to fits of depression. Sin manifested itself anew to his timorous conscience, and then the joy of salvation was succeeded by his former despair. "O my sin! my sin! my sin!" one day exclaimed the young monk in presence of the vicar-general, in accents of the deepest grief. "Ah!" replied he, "would you only be a sinner on canvass, and also have a Saviour only on canvass?" Then Staupitz gravely added, "Know that Jesus Christ is the Saviour even of those who are great, real sinners, and every way deserving of condemnation."

What agitated Luther was not merely the sin which he felt in his heart. The upbraidings of his conscience were confirmed by arguments drawn from reason. If the holy precepts of the Bible frightened him, some of its doctrines likewise increased his terror. Truth, which is the great means by which God gives peace to man, must necessarily begin by removing the false security which destroys him. The doctrine of election, in particular, disturbed the young man, and threw him into a field which it is difficult to traverse. Must he believe that it was man who, on his part, first chose God? or that it was God who first chose man? The Bible, history, daily experience, and the writings of Augustine, had shewn him that always, and in every thing, in looking for a first cause, it was necessary to ascend to the sovereign will, by which every thing exists, and on which every thing depends. But his ardent spirit would have gone further. He would have penetrated into the secret counsel of God, unveiled its mysteries, seen the invisible, and comprehended the incomprehensible. Staupitz interfered, telling him not to pretend to fathom the hidden purposes of God, but to confine himself to those of them which have been made manifest in Christ. "Look to the wounds of Christ," said he to him, "and there see a bright display of the purposes of God towards man. It is impossible to comprehend God out of Jesus Christ. In Christ you will find what I am, and what I require, saith the Lord. You can find Him nowhere else, either in heaven or on the earth."

The vicar-general went further. He convinced Luther of the paternal designs of Providence, in permitting the various temptations and combats which the soul has to sustain. He exhibited them to him in a light well fitted to revive his courage. By such trials God prepares those whom He destines for some important work. The ship must be proved before it is launched on the boundless deep. If this education is necessary for every man, it is so particularly for those who are to have an influence on their generation. This Staupitz represented to the monk of Erfurt. "It is not without cause," said he to him, "that God exercises you by so many combats; be assured He will employ you in great things as His minister."

These words, which Luther hears with astonishment and humility, fill him with courage, and give him a consciousness of powers, whose existence he had not even suspected. The wisdom and prudence of an enlightened friend gradually reveal the strong man to himself. Nor does Staupitz rest here. He gives him valuable directions as to his studies, exhorting him in future to lay aside the systems of the school, and draw all his theology from the Bible. "Let the study of the Scriptures," said he, "be your favourite occupation." Never was good advice better followed. But what, above all, delighted Luther, was the present of a Bible from Staupitz. Perhaps it was the Latin Bible, bound in red leather, which belonged to the convent, and which it was the summit of his desire to possess, that he might be able to carry it about with him wherever he went, because all its leaves were familiar to him, and he knew where to look for every passage. At length this treasure is his own. From that time he studies the Scriptures, and especially the Epistles of St. Paul, with always increasing zeal. The only author whom he admits along with the Bible is St. Augustine. Whatever he reads is deeply imprinted on his soul, for his struggles had prepared him for comprehending it. The soil had been ploughed deep, and the incorruptible seed penetrates far into it. When Staupitz left Erfurt, a new day had dawned upon Luther.

Nevertheless, the work was not finished. The vicar-general had prepared it, but its completion was reserved for a humbler instrument. The conscience of the young Augustine had not yet found repose, and, owing to his efforts and the stretch on which his soul had been kept, his body at length gave way. He was attacked by an illness which brought him to the gates of death. This was in the second year of his residence in the convent. All his agonies and terrors were awakened at the approach of death. His own pollution and the holiness of God anew distracted his soul. One day, when overwhelmed with despair, an old monk entered his cell, and addressed him in consoling terms. Luther opened his heart to him, and made him aware of the fears by which he was agitated. The respectable old man was incapable of following him into all his doubts, as Staupitz had done; but he knew his Credo, and having found in it the means of consoling his own heart, he could apply the same remedy to the young friar. Leading him back to the Apostles' Creed, which Luther had learned in infancy at the school of Mansfeld, the old monk good-naturedly repeated the article, "I believe in the forgiveness of sins." These simple words, which the pious friar calmly repeated at this decisive moment, poured great consolation into the soul of Luther. "I believe," oft repeated he to himself on his sick-bed,—"I believe in the forgiveness of sins." "Ah!" said the monk, "the thing to be believed is not merely that David's or Peter's sins are forgiven; this the devils believe: God's command is, to believe that our own sins are forgiven." How delightful this command appeared to poor Luther! "See what St. Bernard says in his sermon on the Annunciation," added the old friar; "the witness which the Holy Spirit witnesseth with our spirit is, 'Thy sins are forgiven thee.'"

From this moment light sprung up in the heart of the young monk of Erfurt. The gracious word has been pronounced, and he believes it. He renounces the idea of meriting salvation, and puts implicit confidence in the grace of God through Jesus Christ. He does not see all the consequences of the principle which he has admitted; he is still sincere in his attachment to the Church, and yet he has no longer need of her. He has received salvation immediately from God himself; and from that moment Roman Catholicism is virtually destroyed in him. He goes forward and searches the writings of the apostles and prophets, for every thing that may strengthen the hope which fills his heart. Each day he invokes help from above, and each day also the light increases in his soul.

The health which his spirit had found soon restores health to his body, and he rises from his sick-bed, after having, in a double sense, received a new life. During the feast of Noel, which arrived shortly after, he tasted abundantly of all the consolations of faith. With sweet emotion he took part in the holy solemnities; and when, in the middle of the gorgeous service of the day, he came to chant these words,—“O beata culpa, quæ talem meruisti Redemptorem!”¹ his whole being said Amen, and thrilled with joy.

Luther had been two years in the cloister, and must now be consecrated priest. He had received much, and he looked forward with delight to the prospect which the priesthood presented of enabling him freely to give what he had freely received. Wishing to avail himself of the occasion to be fully reconciled to his father, he invited him to be present, and even asked him to fix the day. John Luther, though not yet entirely appeased, nevertheless accepted the invitation, and named Sabbath, the 2d May, 1507.

In the list of Luther's friends was the vicar of Eisenach, John Braum, who had been his faithful adviser when he resided in that town. Luther wrote him on the 22d April. It is the Reformer's earliest letter, and bears the following address:—“To John Braum, Holy and Venerable Priest of Christ and Mary.” It is only in the two first letters of Luther that the name of Mary occurs.

“God, who is glorious and holy in all His works,” says the candidate for the priesthood, “having designed to exalt me exceedingly,—me, a miserable and every way unworthy sinner, and to call me solely out of His abundant mercy, to His sublime ministry, it is my duty, in order to testify my gratitude for a goodness so divine and so magnificent, (as far at least as dust can do it,) to fulfil with my whole heart the office which is entrusted to me.”

At length the day arrived. The miner of Mansfeld failed not to be present at the consecration of his son. . . . He even gave him an unequivocal mark of his affection and generosity, by making him a present of twenty florins on the occasion.

The ceremony took place, Jerome, Bishop of Brandenburg, officiating. At the moment of conferring on Luther the right to celebrate mass, he put the chalice into his hand, uttering these solemn words, “Accipe potestatem sacrificandi pro vivis et mortuis”—“Receive power to sacrifice for the living and the dead.” Luther then listened complacently to these words, which gave him the power of doing the very work appropriated to the Son of God; but they afterwards made him shudder. “That the earth did not swallow us both,” said he, “was more than we deserved, and was owing to the great patience and long-suffering of the Lord.”

The father afterwards dined at the convent with his son, the friends of the young priest, and the monks. The conversation turned on Martin's entrance into the cloister, the friars loudly extolling it as one of the most meritorious of works. Then the inflexible John, turning towards his son, said to him, “Hast thou not read in Scripture to obey thy father and thy mother?” These words struck Luther; they gave him quite a different view of the action which had brought him into the convent, and for a long time continued to echo in his heart.

By the advice of Staupitz, Luther, shortly after his ordination, made short excursions on foot into the neighbouring parishes and convents, both for relaxation, to give his body the necessary exercise, and to accustom himself to preaching.

The Fête Dieu was to be celebrated with splendour at Eisleben, where the vicar-general was to be present. Luther repaired thither. He had still need of Staupitz, and missed no opportunity of meeting with this enlightened conductor who was guiding him into the way of life. The procession was numerous and brilliant. Staupitz himself carried the holy sacrament, and Luther followed in his sacerdotal dress. The thought that it was truly Jesus Christ that the vicar-general was carrying—the idea that Christ was there in person actually before him—suddenly struck Luther's imagination, and filled him with such amazement that he could scarcely move forward. The perspiration fell from him in drops; he shook, and thought he would have died with agony and terror. At length the procession ceased. This host, which had so awakened the fears of the monk, was solemnly deposited in the sanctuary; and Luther, as soon as he was alone with Staupitz, threw himself into his arms, and told him of his consternation. Then the worthy vicar-general, who had long known that Saviour who breaketh not the bruised reed, said to him mildly, “It was not Jesus Christ, my brother. Jesus Christ does not alarm—He consoles merely.”

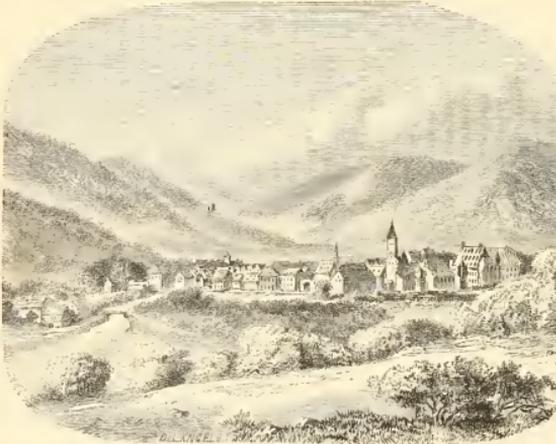

Luther was not to remain hid in an obscure convent. The time had arrived for his being transported to a larger theatre. Staupitz, with whom he was in constant correspondence, was well aware that the soul of the young monk was too active to be confined within so narrow a circle. He mentioned him to Frederick of Saxony; and this enlightened prince, in 1508, probably towards the close of the year, invited him to a chair in the University of Wittenberg. Wittenberg was a field on which he was to fight hard battles; and Luther felt that his vocation was there. Being required to repair promptly to his new post, he answered the appeal without delay; and, in the hurry of his removal, had not even time to write him whom he called his master and beloved father—John Braum, curate of Eisenach. Some months after, he wrote—“My departure was so sudden, that those I was living with scarcely knew of it. I am far away, I confess; but the better part of me is still with you.” Luther had been three years in the cloister of Erfurt.

CHAPTER V.

The University of Wittenberg—First Employment—Biblical Lectures—Sensation—Preaching at Wittenberg—The Old Chapel—Impression.

IN the year 1502, the Elector Frederick had founded a new university at Wittenberg, declaring, in the act by which he confirmed it, that he and his people would turn to it as towards an oracle. He thought not at the time that these words would be so magnificently realized. Two men belonging to the opposition which had been formed against the scholastic system,—viz., Pollich of Mellerstadt, doctor of medicine, law, and philosophy, and Staupitz,—had great influence in founding this school. The university declared St. Augustine its patron; and even this choice was a presage of good. In possession of great freedom, and regarded as a tribunal to which, in cases of difficulty, the supreme decision belonged, this new institution, which was in every way fitted to become the cradle of the Reformation, powerfully contributed to the development of Luther and his work.

On his arrival at Wittenberg, Luther repaired to the convent of Augustines, where a cell was allotted him; for though professor, he ceased not to be monk. He was appointed to teach philosophy and dialectics. In assigning him these departments, regard had, no doubt, been had to the studies which he had prosecuted at Erfurt, and to his degree of Master of Arts. Thus Luther, who was hungering and thirsting for the word of life, saw himself obliged to give his almost exclusive attention to the scholastic philosophy of Aristotle. He had need of the bread of life which God gives to the world, and he must occupy himself with human subtleties. How galling! How much he sighed! "I am well, by the grace of God," wrote he to Braun, "were it not that I must study philosophy with all my might. Ever since I arrived at Wittenberg, I have eagerly desired to exchange this study for that of theology; but," added he, lest it should be thought he meant the theology of the time, "the theology I mean is that which seeks out the kernel of the nut, the heart of the wheat, and the marrow of the bone. Howbeit, God is God," continues he, with that confidence which was the soul of his life; "man is almost always deceived in his judgment; but He is our God, and will conduct us by His goodness for ever and ever." The studies in which Luther was at this time obliged to engage, were afterwards of great service to him in combating the errors of the schoolmen.

Here, however, he could not stop. The desire of his heart must be accomplished. The same power which formerly pushed him from the bar into the monastic life, now pushed him from philosophy towards the Bible. He zealously commenced the study of ancient languages, especially Greek and Hebrew, that he might be able to draw science and learning at the fountain-head. He was all his life an indefatigable student. Some months after his arrival at the university, he applied for the degree of Bachelor in Divinity, and obtained it in the end of March, 1509, with a special injunction to devote himself to biblical theology, ad Biblia.

Every day at one, Luther had to lecture on the Bible,—a precious employment both for the professor and his pupils—giving them a better insight into the divine meaning of those oracles which had so long been lost both to the people and the school.

He began his lectures with an exposition of the Psalms, and shortly after proceeded to the Epistle to the Romans.

It was especially when meditating upon it that the light of truth entered his heart. After retiring to his quiet cell, he spent hours in the study of the Divine Word—the Epistle of St. Paul lying open before him. One day, coming to the seventeenth verse of the first chapter, he read these words of the prophet Habakkuk, "The just shall live by faith." He is struck with the expression. The just, then, has a different life from other men, and this life is given by faith. These words, which he receives into his heart as if God himself had there deposited them, unveils the mystery of the Christian life to him, and gives him an increase of this life. Long after, in the midst of his numerous labours, he thought he still heard a voice saying to him, "The just shall live by faith."

Luther's lectures, thus prepared, had little resemblance to those which had hitherto been delivered. It was not a declamatory rhetorician, or a pedantic schoolman that spoke; it was a Christian who had felt the power of revealed truth—truth which he derived from the Bible, and presented to his astonished hearers, all full of life, as it came from the treasury of his heart. It was not a lesson from man, but a lesson from God.

This novel exposition of the truth was much talked of. The news spread far and wide, and attracted a great number of foreign students to the recently founded university. Even some of the professors attended the lectures of Luther, among others, Mellerstadt, often surnamed, "The Light of the World." He was the first rector of the university, and had previously been at Leipsic, where he had vigorously combated the ridiculous lessons of the schoolmen, and denying that "the light of the first day of creation could be theology," had maintained that this science ought to be based on the study of literature. "This monk," said he, "will send all the doctors to the right about. He will introduce a new doctrine, and reform the whole Church, for he founds upon the Word of God; and no man in the world can either combat or overthrow this Word, even though he should attack it with all the weapons of philosophy; the sophists, Scotists, Albertists, Thomists, and the whole fraternity."

Staupitz, who was the instrument in the hand of Providence to unfold the gifts and treasures hidden in Luther, invited him to preach in the church of the Augustines. The young professor recoiled at this proposal. He wished to confine himself to his academic functions, and trembled at the thought of adding to them that of preacher. In vain did Staupitz urge him. "No, no," replied he, "it is no light matter to speak to men in the place of God." Touching humility in this great Reformer of the Church! Staupitz insisted;

but the ingenious Luther, says one of his biographers, found fifteen arguments, pretexts, and evasions, to excuse himself from this calling. The chief of the Augustines, still continuing his attack, Luther exclaimed, "Ah! doctor, in doing this you deprive me of life. I would not be able to hold out three months." "Very well," replied the vicar-general, "so be it in God's name. For up yonder, also, our Lord has need of able and devoted men." Luther behoved to yield.

In the middle of the public square of Wittemberg was a wooden chapel, thirty feet long by twenty wide, whose sides, propped up in all directions, were falling to decay. An old pulpit made of fir, three feet in height, received the preacher. In this miserable chapel the preaching of the Reformation commenced. God was pleased that that which was to establish His glory should have the humblest origin. The foundation of the church of the Augustines had just been laid, and until it should be finished this humble church was employed. "This building," adds the contemporary of Luther who relates these circumstances, "may well be compared to the stable in which Christ was born. It was in this miserable enclosure that God was pleased, so to speak, to make His beloved Son be born a second time. Among the thousands of cathedrals and parish churches with which the world abounded, there was then one only which God selected for the glorious preaching of eternal life."

Luther preaches, and every thing is striking in the new preacher. His expressive countenance, his noble air, his clear and sonorous voice, captivate the hearers.

The greater part of preachers before him had sought rather to amuse their auditory than to convert them. The great seriousness which predominates in Luther's preaching, and the joy with which the knowledge of the Gospel has filled his heart, give to his eloquence at once an authority, a fervour, and an unction which none of his predecessors had. "Endowed," says one of his opponents, "with a keen and acute intellect, and a retentive memory, and having an admirable facility in the use of his mother tongue, Luther, in point of eloquence, yielded to none of his age. Discouraging from the pulpit as if he had been agitated by some strong passion, and suiting his action to his words, he produced a wonderful impression on the minds of his hearers, and, like a torrent, carried them along whithersoever he wished. So much force, gracefulness, and eloquence, are seldom seen in the people of the north." "He had," says Bossuet, "a lively and impetuous eloquence, which hurried people away and entranced them."

In a short time the little chapel could not contain the hearers who crowded to it. The Council of Wittemberg then made choice of Luther for their preacher, and appointed him to preach in the town church. The impression which he produced here was still greater. The power of his genius, the eloquence of his diction, and the excellence of the doctrines which he announced, equally astonished his hearers. His reputation spread far and wide, and Frederick the Wise himself once came to Wittenberg to hear him.

Luther had commenced a new life. The uselessness of the cloister had been succeeded by great activity. The liberty, the labour, the constant activity to which he could devote himself at Wittenberg, completely restored his internal harmony and peace. He was now in his place, and the work of God was soon to exhibit its majestic step.

Journey to Rome—A Convert on the Pô—Sickness at Bologna—Remembrances in Rome—Superstitious Devotion—Profaneness of the Clergy—Conversation—Disorders in Rome—Biblical Studies—Pilate's Stair—Influence on his Faith and on the Reformation—The Gate of Paradise—Luther's Confession.

LUTHER was teaching both in his academic chair and in the church, when his labours were interrupted. In 1510, or, according to some, not till 1511 or 1512, he was sent to Rome. Seven convents of his order having differed on certain points with the vicar-general, the activity of Luther's mind, the power of his eloquence, and his talent for discussion, made him be selected to plead the cause of these seven monasteries before the pope. This Divine dispensation was necessary to Luther, for it was requisite that he should know Rome. Full of the prejudices and illusions of the cloister, he had always represented it to himself as the seat of holiness.

He accordingly set out and crossed the Alps; but scarcely had he descended into the plains of rich and voluptuous Italy, than he found at every step subjects of astonishment and scandal. The poor German monk was received in a rich convent of Benedictines, situated upon the Pô in Lombardy. This convent had thirty-six thousand ducats of revenue. Of these, twelve thousand were devoted to the table, twelve thousand to the buildings, and twelve thousand to the other wants of the monks. The gorgeousness of the apartments, the beauty of the dresses, and the rarities of the table, all astonished Luther. Marble and silk, and luxury under all its forms! How new the sight to the humble friar of the poor convent of Wittenberg! He was astonished and said nothing; but when Friday came, how surprised was he to see abundance of meat still covering the table of the Benedictines. Then he resolved to speak out. "The Church and the pope," said he to them, "forbid such things." The Benedictines were indignant at this reprimand from the rude German; but Luther having insisted, and perhaps threatened to make their disorders known, some of them thought that the simplest plan was to get rid of their troublesome guest. The porter of the convent having warned him that he ran a risk in staying longer, he made his escape from this epicurean monastery, and arrived at Bologna, where he fell dangerously sick. Some have seen in this sickness the effects of poison; but it is simpler to suppose that it was the effect which a change of living produced in the frugal monk of Wittenberg, whose principal food was wont to be bread and herrings. This sickness was not to be unto death; but for the glory of God. Luther's constitutional sadness and depression again overpowered him. To die thus far from Germany, under this burning sky in a foreign land, what a fate! The agonies which he had felt at Erfurt returned with all their force. The conviction of his sins troubled, while the prospect of the judgment-seat of God terrified him. But at the moment when these terrors were at the worst, the passage of St. Paul which had struck him at Wittenberg, "The just shall live by faith," (Rom. i. 17,) presented itself to his mind, and illumined his soul as with a ray of light from heaven. Revived and comforted, he soon recovered his health, and resumed his journey to Rome, expecting he should there find quite a different life from that of the Lombard convents, and impatient by the sight of Roman holiness to efface the sad impressions which had been left upon his mind by his residence on the Pô.

At length, after a painful journey under the burning sky of Italy in the beginning of summer, he drew near to the city of the seven hills. His heart was moved, and his eyes looked for the queen of the world, and of the Church. As soon as he obtained a distant view of the eternal city, the city of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the metropolis of Catholicism, he threw himself on the ground, exclaiming, "Holy Rome, I salute thee!"

Luther is in Rome; the professor of Wittenberg is in the midst of the eloquent ruins of the Rome of the consuls and emperors—the Rome of the confessors and martyrs. Here lived that Plautus and Virgil whose works he had taken with him into the cloister, and all those great men whose exploits had always caused his heart to beat. He perceives their statues, and the wrecks of monuments which attest their glory. But all this glory and all this power are past, and his foot treads on their dust. At every step he calls to mind the sad forebodings of Scipio shedding tears at the sight of Carthage in ruins, its burned palaces and broken walls, and exclaiming, "Thus, too, will it be with Rome!" "And in fact," says Luther, "the Rome of the Scipios and Cæsars has been changed into a corpse. Such is the quantity of ruins, that the foundations of the modern houses rest upon the roofs of the old. There," added he, casting a melancholy look on the ruins, "there were the riches and treasures of the world." All this rubbish, which he strikes with his foot, tells Luther, within the walls of Rome herself, that what is strongest in the eyes of men, is easily destroyed by the breath of the Lord.

But he remembers that with profane ashes holy ashes are mingled. The burial-place of the martyrs is not far from that of the generals and triumphing heroes of Rome; and Christian Rome, with her sufferings, has more power over the heart of the Saxon monk than Pagan Rome with her glory. It was here the letter arrived in which Paul wrote, "The just is justified by faith;" and not far off is the Appii Forum and the Three Tavernas. There was the house of Narcissus—here the palace of Cæsar, where the Lord delivered the apostle from the mouth of the lion. Oh, what fortitude these recollections give to the heart of the monk of Wittenberg!

Rome then presented a very different aspect. The pontifical chair was occupied by the warlike Julius II., and not by Leo X., as it has been said by some distinguished historians of Germany, no doubt through oversight. Luther often told an anecdote of this pope. When news was brought him of the defeat of his army by the French before Ravenna, he was reading his Hours. He dashed the book upon the ground, and said, with a dreadful oath, "Very well, so you have turned Frenchman. Is this the way in which you protect your Church?" Then, turning in the direction of the country to whose aid he meant to have recourse, he exclaimed, "Holy Switzer, pray for us!" Ignorance, levity, and dissoluteness, a profane spirit, a contempt of all that is sacred, and a shameful traffic in divine things;—such was the spectacle which that unhappy city presented; and yet the pious monk continued for some time in his illusions.

Having arrived about the feast of St. John, he hears the Romans about him repeating a proverb which was then common among the people: "Happy," said they, "is the mother whose son says a mass on the eve of St. John." "Oh! how I could like to make my mother happy!" said Luther. The pious son of Margaret accordingly sought to say a mass on that day, but could not; the press was too great.

Ardent and simple-hearted, he went up and down, visiting all the churches and chapels, believing all the lies that were told him, and devoutly performing the requisite acts of holiness; happy in being able to do so many pious works, which were denied to his countrymen. "Oh! how much I regret," said the pious German to himself, "that my father and mother are still alive! What delight I should have had in delivering them from the fire of purgatory, by my masses, my prayers, and many other admirable works!" He had found the light, but the darkness was still far from being entirely banished from his understanding. His heart was changed, but his mind was not fully enlightened. He possessed faith and love, but not knowledge. It was work of no small difficulty to escape from the dark night which had for so many ages covered the earth.

Luther repeatedly said mass at Rome, taking care to do it with all the unction and dignity which the service seemed to him to require. But how grieved was the heart of the Saxon monk, at seeing the profane formality of the Roman priests in celebrating the sacrament of the altar! The priests, on their part, laughed at his simplicity. One day when he was officiating, he found that at the altar next to him seven masses had been read before he got through a single one. "Get on, get on," cried one of the priests to him; "make haste, and send Our Lady back her Son."—making an impious allusion to the transubstantiation of the bread into the body and blood of Jesus Christ. On another occasion, Luther had only got as far as the Gospel, when the priest beside him had finished the whole mass. "On, on!" said his companion; "make haste, make haste; are ye ever to have done?"

His astonishment was still greater when, in the dignitaries of the Church, he discovered the same thing that he had found in common priests. He had hoped better of them.

It was fashionable at the papal court to attack Christianity; and, in order to pass for a complete gentleman, absolutely necessary to hold some erroneous or heretical opinion on the doctrines of the Church. When Erasmus was at Rome, they had attempted to prove to him, by passages from Pliny, that there was no difference between the soul of man and that of the brutes; and young courtiers of the pope maintained that the orthodox faith was merely the result of crafty inventions by some saints.

Luther's employment, as envoy of the Augustines of Germany, caused him to be invited to several meetings of distinguished ecclesiastics. One day, in particular, he happened to be at table with several prelates, who frankly exhibited themselves to him in their mountebank manners and profane conversation, and did not scruple to commit a thousand follies in his presence, no doubt believing him to be of the same spirit as themselves. Among other things they related, in presence of the monk, laughing and making a boast of it, how, when they were saying mass, instead of the sacramental words, which should transform the bread and wine into the Saviour's flesh and blood, they parodied them, and said, "Panis es, et panis manebis; vinum es, et vinum manebis,"—"Bread thou art, and bread wilt remain; wine thou art, and wine wilt remain." Then, continued they, we raise the ostensorium, and all the people worship it. Luther could scarcely believe his ears. His spirit, which was lively, and even gay in the society of his friends, was all gravity when sacred things were in question. He was scandalized at the profane pleasantries of Rome. "I was," said he, "a young monk, grave and pious, and these words distressed me greatly. If they speak thus in Rome at table, freely and publicly, thought I to myself, what will it be if their actions correspond to their words, and if all—pope, cardinals, courtiers—say mass in the same style? And I, who have devoutly heard so large a number read, how must I have been deceived!"

Luther often mingled with the monks and the citizens of Rome. If some extolled the pope and his court, the great majority gave free utterance to their complaints and their sarcasms. What tales they told of the reigning pope, of Alexander VI., and of many others! One day his Roman friends told him how Caesar Borgia, after having fled from Rome, was apprehended in Spain. When they were going to try him, he pleaded guilty in prison, and requested a confessor. A monk having been sent, he slew him, and, wrapping himself up in his cloak, made his escape. "I heard that at Rome, and it is quite certain," said Luther. One day passing through a public street which led to St. Peter's, he stopped in amazement before a statue, representing a pope under the form of a woman holding a sceptre, clad in the papal mantle, and carrying an infant in her arms. It is a girl of Mentz, said they to him, whom the cardinals chose for pope, and who had a child at this spot. Hence no pope ever passes through this street. "I am astonished," said Luther, "how the popes allow the statue to remain."

Luther had expected to find the edifice of the Church in strength and splendour, but its gates were forced, and its walls consumed with fire. He saw the desolations of the sanctuary, and started back in dismay. He had dreamed of nothing but holiness, and he discovered nothing but profanation.

He was not less struck with the disorders outside the churches. "The Roman police," says he, "is strict and severe. The judge or captain every night makes a round of the town on horseback, with three hundred attendants, and arrests every person he finds in the streets. If he meets any one armed, he hangs him up, or throws him into the Tiber; and yet the city is full of disorder and murder; whereas, when the Word of God is purely and rightly taught, peace and order are seen to reign, and there is no need of law and its severities." "It is almost incredible what sins and infamous actions are committed at Rome," says he, on another occasion; "one would require to see it and hear it in order to believe it. Hence, it is an ordinary saying, that if there is a hell, Rome is built upon it. It is an abyss from whence all sins proceed."

This sight made a strong impression on Luther's mind at the time, and the impression was deepened at a later period. "The nearer we approach Rome the more bad Christians we find," said he several years after. "There is a common saying, that he who goes to Rome, the first time seeks a rogue, the second time finds him, and the third time brings him away with him in his own person; but now people are become so skilful, that they make all the three journeys in one." A genius, one of the most unhappily celebrated, but also one of the most profound of Italy, Machiavelli, who was living at Florence when Luther passed through it on his way to Rome, has made the same remark.—"The strongest symptom," says he, "of the approaching ruin of Christianity [he means Roman Catholicism] is, that the nearer you come to the capital of Christendom, the less you find of the Christian spirit. The scandalous examples and crimes of the court of Rome are the cause why Italy has lost every principle of piety and all religious sentiment. We Italians," continues the great historian, "are chiefly indebted to the Church and the priests for our having become a set of profane scoundrels." At a later period Luther was fully aware how much he had gained by his journey. "I would not take a hundred thousand florins," said he, "not to have seen Rome."

The journey was also of the greatest advantage to him in a literary view. Like Reuchlin, Luther availed himself of his residence in Italy to penetrate further into the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. He took lessons in Hebrew from a celebrated rabbi, named Elias Levita; and thus, at Rome, partly acquired the knowledge of that Divine Word under whose blows Rome was destined to fall.

But there was another respect in which the journey was of great importance to Luther. Not only was the veil torn away, and the sardonic smile, and mountebank infidelity which lurked behind the Roman superstitions, revealed to the future reformer; but, moreover, the living faith which God had implanted in him was powerfully strengthened.

We have seen how he at first entered devotedly into all the vain observances, to which, as a price, the Church has annexed the expiation of sins. One day, among others, wishing to gain an indulgence which the pope had promised to every one who should on his knees climb up what is called Pilate's Stair, the Saxon monk was humbly crawling up the steps, which he was told had been miraculously transported to Rome from Jerusalem. But while he was engaged in this meritorious act, he thought he heard a voice of thunder, which cried at the bottom of his heart, as at Wittenberg and Bologna, "The just shall live by faith." These words, which had already, on two different occasions, struck him like the voice of an angel of God, resounded loudly and incessantly within him. He rises up in amazement from the steps, along which he was dragging his body. Horrified at himself, and ashamed to see how far superstition has abased him, he flies far from the scene of his folly.

In regard to this mighty word there is something mysterious in the life of Luther. It proved a creating word both for the Reformer and for the Reformation. It was by it that God then said, "Let light be, and light was."

It is often necessary that a truth, in order to produce its due effect on the mind, must be repeatedly presented to it. Luther had carefully studied the Epistle to the Romans, and yet, though justification by faith is there taught, he had never seen it so clearly. Now he comprehends the righteousness which alone can stand in the presence of God; now he receives from God himself, by the hand of Christ, that obedience which he freely imputes to the sinner as soon as he humbly turns his eye to the God-Man who was crucified. This is the decisive period in the internal life of Luther. The faith which has saved him from the terrors of death, becomes the soul of his theology, his fortress in all dangers, the stamina of his discourse, the stimulant of his love, the foundation of his peace, the spur of his labours, his consolation in life and in death.

But this great doctrine of a salvation which emanates from God, and not from man, was not only the power of God to save the soul of Luther, it also became the power of God to reform the Church;—a powerful weapon which the apostles wielded, a weapon too long neglected, but at length brought forth, in its primitive lustre, from the arsenal of the mighty God. At the moment when Luther stood up in Rome, all moved and thrilling with the words which Paul had addressed, fifteen centuries before, to the inhabitants of this metropolis, truth, till then a fettered captive within the Church, rose up also, never again to fall.

Here we must let Luther speak for himself. "Although I was a holy and irreproachable monk, my conscience was full of trouble and anguish. I could not bear the words, 'Justice of God.' I loved not the just and holy God who punishes sinners. I was filled with secret rage against Him and hated Him, because, not satisfied with terrifying us, His miserable creatures, already lost by internal sin, with His law and the miseries of life, He still further increased our torment by the Gospel. . . . But when, by the Spirit of God, I comprehended these words; when I learned how the sinner's justification proceeds from the pure mercy of the Lord by means of faith, then I felt myself revive like a new man, and entered at open doors into the very paradise of God. From that time, also, I beheld the precious sacred volume with new eyes. I went over all the Bible, and collected a great number of passages, which taught me what the work of God was. And as I had previously, with all my heart, hated the words, 'Justice of God,' so from that time I began to esteem and love them, as words most sweet and most consoling. In truth, these words were to me the true gate of paradise."

Accordingly, when called on solemn occasions to confess this doctrine, Luther always manifested his enthusiasm and rude energy. "I see," said he, on a critical occasion, "that the devil is incessantly attacking this fundamental article, by the instrumentality of his doctors, and that, in this respect, he cannot rest or take any repose. Very well, I, Doctor Martin Luther, unworthy evangelist of our Lord Jesus Christ, hold this article—that faith alone, without works, justifies in the sight of God; and I declare, that the emperor of the Romans, the emperor of the Turks, the emperor of the Tartars, the emperor of the Persians, the pope, all the cardinals, bishops, priests, monks, nuns, princes, and nobles, all men and all devils, must let it stand, and allow it to remain for ever. If they will undertake to combat this truth, they will bring down the flames of hell upon their heads. This is the true and holy Gospel, and the declaration of me, Doctor Luther, according to the light of the Holy Spirit. . . . Nobody," continues he, "has died for our sins but Jesus Christ the Son of God. I repeat it once more; should the world and all the devils tear each other, and burst with fury, this is, nevertheless, true. And if it be He alone who takes away sin, it cannot be ourselves with our works; but good works follow redemption, as the fruit appears on the tree. This is our doctrine; and it is the doctrine which the Holy Spirit teaches with all true Christians. We maintain it in the name of God. Amen."

It was thus Luther found, what all doctors and reformers, even the most distinguished, had, to a certain degree at least, failed to discover. It was in Rome that God gave him this clear view of the fundamental doctrine of Christianity. He had come to the city of the pontiffs seeking the solution of some difficulties relative to a monastic order, and he carried away in his heart the safety of the Church.

CHAPTER VII.

Return—Doctor's Degree—Carlstadt—Luther's Oath—Principle of Reform—Luther's Courage—First Views of Reformation—The Schoolmen—Spalatin—Affair of Reuchlin.

LUTHER quitted Rome and returned to Wittenberg, his heart full of sadness and indignation. Turning away his eyes in disgust from the pontifical city, he directed them in hope to the Holy Scriptures, and to that new light of which the word of God seemed then to give promise to the world. This word gained in his heart all that the Church lost in it. He detached himself from the one, and turned towards the other. The whole Reformation was in that movement. It put God where the priest had hitherto been.

Staupitz and the elector did not lose sight of the monk whom they had called to the university of Wittenberg. It would seem that the vicar-general had a presentiment of the work that was to be done in the world, and, feeling it too much for himself, wished to urge on Luther. There is nothing more remarkable, and perhaps more mysterious, than this personage, who is ever found hurrying on the monk into the path to which God calls him; and who himself ultimately goes and sadly ends his days in a convent. The preaching of the young professor had made an impression on the prince. He had admired the vigour of his intellect, the nervousness of his eloquence, and the excellence of his expositions. The elector and his friend, wishing to advance a man who gave such high hopes, resolved to make him take the honourable degree of Doctor of Divinity. Staupitz repairing to the convent, led Luther into the garden, and there alone with him, under a tree which Luther was afterwards fond of shewing to his disciples, the venerable father said to him—"It is now necessary, my friend, that you become a doctor of the Holy Scriptures." Luther recoiled at the idea; the high honour frightened him. "Look out," replied he, "for a more worthy person; as for me, I cannot consent to it." The vicar-general insisted, "The Lord God has much to do in the Church, and has need at present of young and vigorous doctors." These words, adds Melancthon, were perhaps used half in jest, and yet the event realized them. Many omens ordinarily precede great revolutions. It is not necessary to suppose that Melancthon here speaks of miraculous predictions. The most incredulous age—that which preceded our own—saw this sentiment verified. There was no miracle; and yet how many presages announced the revolution with which it closed?

"But I am weak and sickly," replied Luther, "and have not long to live. Seek a strong man." "The Lord," replied the vicar-general, "has work in heaven as well as on the earth; dead or alive, God has need of you in His counsel."

"None but the Holy Spirit can make a doctor of theology," exclaimed the monk, still more alarmed. "Do what your convent asks," said Staupitz, "and what I, your vicar-general, command. You promise to obey us." "But my poverty," replied the friar. "I have no means of paying the expenses attendant on such promotion." "Give yourself no trouble about them," said his friend. "The prince has been graciously pleased to take all the expenses on himself." Luther, thus urged, saw it his duty to yield.

This was towards the end of the summer of 1512. Luther set out for Leipzig to receive the money necessary for his promotion from the elector's treasures. But according to the usages of courts, the money came not. The friar, getting impatient, would have left, but monastic obedience detained him. At length, on the 4th of October, he received fifty florins from Peflinger and John Doltzig, and gave them his receipt for it, in which he designates himself merely as a monk. "I, Martin," says he, "friar of the order of Eremites." Luther hastened back to Wittenberg.

Andrew Bodenstein was then Dean of the Faculty of Theology, and is best known under the name of Carlstadt, being that of his native town. He was also called A. B. C. It was Melancthon who first gave him this designation, which is taken from the three initial letters of his name. Bodenstein acquired the first elements of literature in his native place. He was of a grave and gloomy temper, perhaps inclined to jealousy, and of a restless intellect, eagerly bent, however, on acquiring knowledge, and endowed with great ability. He attended different universities in order to increase his acquisitions, and studied theology even at Rome. On his return from Italy into Germany he established himself at Wittenberg, and became doctor in divinity. "At this period," says he himself afterwards, "I had not read the Holy Scriptures." This account gives a very just idea of what the theology of that day was. Carlstadt, besides being a professor, was a canon and archdeacon. This is the person who was, at a later period, to make a rent in the Reformation. In Luther, at that time, he only saw an inferior, but the Augustine soon became an object of jealousy to him. "I am not willing," said he one day, "to be a smaller man than Luther." When Carlstadt conferred the highest university degree on his future rival, he was far from foreseeing the celebrity which the young professor was destined to obtain.

On the 18th of October, 1512, Luther was admitted a licentiate in theology, and took the following oath:—"I swear to defend evangelical truth by every means in my power." The following day, Bodenstein, in presence of a numerous assembly, formally delivered to him the insignia of doctor of theology. He was made Biblical doctor, not doctor of sentences, and in this way was called to devote himself to the study of the Bible, and not to that of human tradition. The oath, then, which he took was, as he relates, to his well-beloved Holy Scripture. He promised to preach it faithfully, to teach it purely, to study it during his whole life, and to defend it by discussion and by writing, as far as God should enable him to do so.

This solemn oath was Luther's call to be the Reformer. In laying it upon his conscience freely to seek, and boldly to announce Christian truth, this oath raised the new doctor above the narrow limits to which his monastic vow might perhaps have confined him. Called by the university and by his sovereign, in the name of the emperor, and of the Sec of Rome itself, and bound before God, by the most solemn oath, he was thenceforth the intrepid herald of the word of life. On this memorable day Luther was dubbed knight of the Bible.

Accordingly, this oath taken to the Holy Scriptures, may be regarded as one of the causes of the renovation of the Church. The infallible authority of the Word of God alone was the first and fundamental principle of the Reformation. All the reformations in detail which took place at a later period—as reformations in doctrine, in manners, in the government of the Church, and in worship—were only consequences of this primary principle. One is scarcely able at the present time to form an idea of the sensation produced by this elementary principle, which is so simple in itself, but which had been lost sight of for so many ages. Some individuals of more extensive views than the generality, alone foresaw its immense results. The bold voices of all the Reformers soon proclaimed this powerful principle, at the sound of which Rome is destined to crumble away:—"Christians, receive no other doctrines than those which are founded on the express words of Jesus Christ, His apostles, and prophets. No man, no assembly of doctors, are entitled to prescribe new doctrines."

The situation of Luther was changed. The call which the Reformer had received became to him like one of these extraordinary calls which the Lord addressed to the prophets under the Old Dispensation, and to the apostles under the New. The solemn engagement which he undertook made so deep an impression on his mind, that, in the sequel, the remembrance of this oath was sufficient to console him amid the greatest dangers and the sharpest conflicts. And when he saw all Europe agitated, and shaken by the word which he had announced; when it seemed that the accusations of Rome, the reproaches of many pious men, and the doubts and fears of his own easily agitated heart, would make him hesitate, fear, and give way to despair, he called to mind the oath which he had taken, and remained firm, tranquil, and full of joy. "I have advanced in the name of the Lord," said he, on a critical occasion, "and I have put myself into His hands. His will be done. Who asked Him to make me a doctor? If He made me, let Him sustain me; or if He repents of having made me, let Him depose me! This tribulation terrifies me not. I seek one thing only, and it is to have the Lord favourable to me in all that He calls me to do." Another time he said, "He who undertakes any thing without a divine call, seeks his own glory; but I, Doctor Martin Luther, was compelled to become a doctor. Papism sought to stop me in the discharge of my duty, and you see what has happened to it; and still worse will happen. They will not be able to defend themselves against me. I desire, in the name of the Lord, to tread upon the lions, and trample under foot the dragons and vipers. This will commence during my life, and be finished after my death."

From the hour when he took the oath, Luther sought the truth solely for itself and for the Church. Still, deeply impressed with recollections of Rome, he saw indistinctly before him a course which he determined to pursue with all the energy of his soul. The spiritual life which had hitherto been manifested within him was now manifested outwardly. This was the third period of his development. His entrance into the convent had turned his thoughts towards God: the knowledge of the forgiveness of sins and of the righteousness of faith, had emancipated his soul; and his doctor's oath gave him that baptism of fire by which he became the Reformer of the Church.

His thoughts were soon directed in a general way to the subject of Reformation. In a discourse which he had written, apparently with a view to its being announced by the Provost of Litzkau, at the Council of Lateran, he affirmed that the corruption of the world was occasioned by the priests, who, instead of preaching the pure Word of God, taught so many fables and traditions. According to him, the word of life alone had power to accomplish the spiritual regeneration of man. Hence, even at this period, he made the salvation of the world depend on the re-establishment of sound doctrine, and not on a mere reformation of manners. Luther was not perfectly consistent with himself; he entertained contradictory opinions; but a powerful intellect was displayed in all his writings. He boldly broke the links by which the systems of the schools chained down human thought, passed beyond the limits to which past ages had attained, and formed new paths for himself. God was in him.

The first opponents whom he attacked were those famous schoolmen whom he had so thoroughly studied, and who then reigned as sovereigns in all universities. He accused them of Pelagianism; and, forcibly assailing Aristotle, the father of the school, and Thomas Aquinas, undertook to tumble both of them from the throne on which they sat,—the one ruling philosophy, and the other theology. "Aristotle, Porphyry, the theologians of sentences," (the schoolmen,) wrote he to Lange, "are the lost studies of our age. There is nothing I more ardently long for than to expose this player, who has sported with the Church by wrapping himself up in a Greek mask, and to make his disgrace apparent to all." In all public disputations he was heard to say, "The writings of the apostles and prophets are more certain and more sublime than all the sophisms and all the theology of the school." Such sayings were new; but people gradually became accustomed to them. About a year after, he could triumphantly write—"God works. Our theology and St. Augustine make wonderful progress, and reign in our university. Aristotle is on the decline, and is already tottering to his speedy and eternal overthrow. The lessons on the sentences are admirable for producing a yawn. No man can hope to have an audience if he does not profess Biblical theology." Happy the university to which such a testimony can be given.

At the same time that Luther attacked Aristotle, he took the part of Erasmus and Reuchlin against their enemies. He entered into communication with these great men and others of the learned, such as Pirekheimer, Mutian, and Hütten, who belonged more or less to the same party. At this period he formed another friendship also, which was of great importance to him during his whole life.

There was then at the court of the elector a man distinguished for wisdom and candour, named George Spalatin. Born at Spalatus, or Spalt, in the bishopric of Eichstadt, he had at first been curate of the village of Hohenkirch, near the forest of Thuringia, and was afterwards selected by Frederick the Wise to be his secretary and chaplain, and also tutor to his nephew, John Frederick, who was one day to wear the electoral crown. Spalatin retained his simplicity in the midst of the court. He appeared timid on the eve of great events, circumspect and prudent, like his master, when contrasted with the impetuous Luther, with whom he was in daily correspondence. Like Staupitz, he was made for peaceful times. Such men are necessary, somewhat resembling those delicate substances in which we wrap up gems and trinkets to protect them from injury in travelling. They seem useless, and yet without them the precious jewels would have been broken and destroyed. Spalatin was not fitted to do great things, but he faithfully and unostentatiously acquitted himself of the task which had been assigned to him. He was at first one of the principal assistants of his master in collecting those relics of saints, of which Frederick was long an amateur, but gradually, along with the prince, turned toward the truth. The faith which was then re-appearing in the Church did not take the firm hold of him that it did of Luther. He proceeded at a slower pace. He became Luther's friend at court; the minister through whom all affairs between the Reformer and the princes were transacted, the mediator between the Church and the State. The elector honoured Spalatin with his friendship; when on a journey they always travelled in the same carriage. In other respects, the air of the court often half suffocated the good chaplain. He took fits of melancholy, and would have liked to quit all his honours, and be again a simple pastor in the woods of Thuringia; but Luther consoled him, and exhorted him to remain firm at his post. Spalatin acquired general esteem; the princes and the learned of his time testifying the sincerest regard for him. Erasmus said, "I inscribe the name of Spalatin not only among those of my principal friends, but also amongst those of my most venerated patrons; and this not on paper, but on my heart."

The affair of Reuchlin and the monks was then making a great noise in Germany. The most pious men were often at a loss as to the party which they ought to embrace; for the monks wished to destroy Jewish books which contained blasphemies against Christ. The doctor of Wittemberg being now in high repute, the elector ordered his chaplain to consult him on this subject. The following is Luther's reply. It is the first letter which he addressed to the preacher of the court:—

"What shall I say? These monks pretend to drive out Beelzebub, but not by the finger of God. For this I cease not to lament and groan. We, Christians, begin to be wise abroad, and we are void of sense at home. On all the places of Jerusalem are blasphemies a hundred times worse than those of the Jews. The world is filled with spiritual idols. Inspired with a holy zeal, we should put away and destroy these internal enemies, whereas we leave the matter which is most pressing; the devil himself persuading us to abandon our own business at the same time that he prevents us from amending what belongs to others."

CHAPTER VIII.

Faith—Popular Declamations—Academical Instruction—Moral Purity of Luther—Germans Theology, or Mysticism—The Monk Spenlein—Justification by Faith—Luther on Erasmus—Faith and Works—Erasmus—Necessity of Works—Practice of Works.

LUTHER did not lose himself in this quarrel. Living faith in Christ filled his heart and his life. "In my heart," said he, "faith in my Lord Jesus Christ reigns sole, and sole ought to reign. He alone is the beginning, the middle, and the end, of all the thoughts which occupy my mind night and day." He was always heard with admiration when he spoke of this faith in Christ, whether in the professor's chair or in the Church. His lessons diffused light, and men were astonished at not having sooner perceived truths which in his mouth appeared so evident. "The desire of justifying ourselves," said he, "is the source of all anguish of heart; whereas he who receives Jesus Christ as a Saviour, has peace, and not only peace, but purity of heart. Sanctification of the heart is entirely a fruit of faith; for faith is in us a divine work, which changes us, and gives us a new birth, emanating from God himself. It kills Adam in us by the Holy Spirit, which it communicates to us, giving us a new heart, and making us new men." "It is not by hollow speculation," exclaimed he again, "but by this practical method that we obtain a saving knowledge of Jesus Christ."

At this time Luther preached discourses on the Ten Commandments, which have come down to us under the name of Popular Declamations. Undoubtedly there are errors in them; for Luther himself was enlightened only by degrees. "The path of the just is like the shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day." But in these discourses what truth! what simplicity! what eloquence! How easy to conceive the effect which the new preacher must have produced upon his audience and his age! We will quote one passage taken from the commencement.

Luther goes up into the pulpit of Wittenberg, and gives out these words, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Then, addressing himself to the people who filled the church, he says, "All the sons of Adam are idolaters, and guilty of violating this First Commandment." This strange assertion no doubt surprises his hearers. He must, therefore, justify it, and accordingly proceeds,—“There are two kinds of idolatry—the one without, the other within.

“The one without is, when man worships wood and stone, beasts and stars,

“The one within is, when man, fearing punishment or seeking his ease, does not give worship to the creature, but loves it internally, and confides in it.

“What religion is this? You do not bend the knee before riches and honours, but you offer them your heart, the noblest part of you. Ah! you worship God with the body, and with the spirit you worship the creature.

“This idolatry reigns in every man until he is cured of it freely by the faith which is in Jesus Christ.

“And how is this cure performed?

“In this way: Faith in Christ strips you of all confidence in your own wisdom, your own righteousness, your own strength. It tells you, that if Christ had not died for you, and so saved you, neither yourself nor any creature could have done it. Then you learn to despise all those things which remained useless to you.

“There now remains to you only Jesus—Jesus alone—Jesus fully sufficient for your soul. No longer having any hopes in the creatures, you have now Christ only, in whom you hope all, and whom you love above all. Now Jesus is the sole, the only, the true God. When you have Him for God you have no longer other gods.”

It is thus Luther shews how, by the Gospel, the soul is brought back to God, its sovereign good, agreeably to the words of Jesus Christ, “I am the way; no man cometh unto the Father but by me.” The man who speaks thus to his age is not merely desirous to overthrow some abuses; he is, first of all, desirous to establish true religion. His work is not negative merely—it is primarily positive.

Luther afterwards directs his discourse against the superstitions with which Christendom then abounded, against signs and mysterious characters, observations of certain days and certain months, familiar demons, ghosts, the influence of the stars and wizards, metamorphoses, incubuses and succubuses, the patronage of saints, &c., &c. He attacks these idols one after the other, and vigorously casts down these false gods.

But it was at the university especially, in presence of enlightened youths, eager for truth, that Luther laid open all the treasures of the Word of God. “His mode of explaining the Scriptures,” says his illustrious friend, Melancthon, “was such, that in the judgment of all pious and enlightened men, it was as if a new light had risen upon doctrine after a long dark night. He pointed out the difference between the Law and the Gospel. He refuted the error then prevalent in churches and schools, that men merit the forgiveness of sins by their own works, and are rendered righteous before God by means of external discipline. He thus brought back the hearts of men to the Son of God, Like John the Baptist, he pointed to the Lamb of God, who had taken away the sins of the world. He explained how sins are pardoned freely for the sake of the Son of God, and how man receives the blessing through faith. He made no change in ceremonies; on the contrary, the established discipline had not, in his order, a more faithful observer and defender. But he laboured more and more to make all comprehend the great and essential doctrines of conversion, of the forgiveness of sins, of faith, and the true consolation which is to be found in the cross. The pious were charmed and penetrated with the sweetness of this doctrine, while the learned received it gladly. One would have said that Christ, the apostles, and prophets, were coming forth from darkness and a loathsome dungeon.”

The firmness with which Luther fortified himself by Scripture gave great authority to his teaching, while other circumstances added to his power. His life corresponded to his words—his discourses were not merely from the life, they came from the heart, and were exemplified in all his conduct. And when the Reformation burst forth, many influential men, who were much grieved at seeing the rents that were made in the Church, won over by the Reformer's purity of conduct, and his admirable talents, not only did not oppose him, but even embraced the doctrine to which his works bore testimony. The more they loved Christian virtue the more they inclined to the Reformer. All honest theologians were in his favour. Such is the testimony of those who knew him, in particular of Melancthon, the wisest man of his age, and Erasmus, Luther's celebrated opponent. Yet prejudice has dared to speak of his debauchery. Wittenberg was changed by this preaching of faith, and became the focus of a light which was soon to illumine Germany, and diffuse itself over all the Church.

In 1516, Luther published a treatise by an anonymous mystic theologian, (probably Ebland, priest at Frankfort,) entitled "German Theology," wherein the author shews how man may attain perfection by the three methods of purification, illumination, and communion. Luther never plunged into mystical theology, but he received a salutary impression from it. It confirmed him in the disgust which he felt for dry scholastics—in his contempt for the works and observances so much dwelt upon by the Church—in his conviction of man's spiritual impotence, and of the necessity of grace—and in his attachment to the Bible. "To the schoolmen," wrote he to Staupitz, "I prefer the Mystics and the Bible;" thus placing the Mystics by the side of the inspired writers. Perhaps the "German Theology" also assisted him in forming a sounder idea of the sacraments, and especially of the mass. For the author of that work insists that the Eucharist gives Christ to man, but does not offer Christ to God. Luther accompanied this publication with a preface, in which he declared, that next to the Bible and St. Augustine, there was no book he had ever met with, from which he had learned more respecting God, Christ, man, and all things. Already several doctors had begun to inveigh against the Professors of Wittenberg, and to accuse them of innovation. "One would suppose," continues Luther, "that there never were men before us who taught as we do; yea, verily, there were. But the wrath of God, which our sins have deserved, did not permit us to see them, and to hear them. For a long time the universities kept the Word of God lying in a corner. Let them read this book, and then tell me if our theology is new; for this book is not new." But if Luther took all the good that was in mystical theology, he took not the bad that was in it. The great error in mysticism is, to overlook a free salvation. We are going to see a remarkable example of the purity of Luther's faith.

Luther, possessed of a tender and affectionate heart, was desirous to see those whom he loved in possession of the light which had guided him into the paths of peace; and availed himself of all the opportunities which he had, as professor, preacher, and monk, as well as of his extensive correspondence, to communicate his treasure to others. One of his old brethren of the convent of Erfurt, the monk George Spenlein, was then in the convent of Memmingen. After having spent some time at Wittenberg, Spenlein had asked the doctor to sell different articles which he had left,—viz., a tunic of Brussels cloth, a work of a doctor of Eisenach, and a monk's frock. Luther carefully executed this commission. "I have received," said he to Spenlein, in a letter, (7th April, 1516,) "a florin for the tunic, half a florin for the book, and a florin for the frock, and have remitted the whole to the father-vicar," to whom Spenlein owed three florins. But Luther passes quickly from this account of monastic spoils to a more important subject.

"I should like much," says he to friar George, "to know how it is with your soul. Is it not weary of its own righteousness?—does it not breathe at length and confide in the righteousness of Christ? In our day pride seduces many, especially those who do their utmost to become righteous. Not comprehending the righteousness which is freely given us of God in Christ Jesus, they would stand before him by their merits. But that cannot be. When you lived with us you were in this error, as I also was. I am still constantly fighting with it; and have not yet completely triumphed.

"O my dear brother, learn to know Christ and Christ crucified. Learn to sing unto Him a new song; to despair of thyself, and say, 'Thou, O Lord Jesus! thou art my righteousness, and I am thy sin! Thou hast taken what is mine, and given me what is thine. What thou wert not thou hast become, in order that what I was not I might become.' Take care, O my dear George, not to pretend to such a purity as will make you unwilling to acknowledge yourself a sinner; for Christ dwells in sinners only. He came down from heaven, where he dwelt among the righteous, that He might dwell also among sinners. Meditate carefully on this love of Christ, and thou wilt derive ineffable blessing from it. If our labours and our afflictions could give us peace of conscience, why should Christ have died? Thou wilt find peace only in Him, by despairing of thyself and of thy works, and learning with what love He opens His arms to thee, takes upon Him all thy sins, and gives thee all His righteousness."

Thus the powerful doctrine which had already saved the world in the days of the Apostles, and which was to save it a second time in the days of the Reformers, was expounded by Luther with force and clearness. Stretching over numerous ages of ignorance and superstition, he here shook hands with St. Paul.

Spenlein was not the only person whom he sought to instruct in this fundamental doctrine. He felt uneasy at the little truth which he discovered, in this respect, in the writings of Erasmus. It was of importance to enlighten a man whose authority was so great, and whose genius was so admirable. But how was he to do it? His friend at court, the elector's chaplain, was respected by Erasmus; and it is to him Luther addresses himself. "My dear Spalatin, the thing which displeases me in Erasmus, that man of vast erudition, is, that by the righteousness of works or of the law, of which the apostle speaks, he understands the fulfilment of the ceremonial law. The justification of the law consists not in ceremonies only, but in all the works of the Decalogue. When these works are performed without faith in Christ, they may, it is true, make Fabriciuses, Reguluses, and other men of strict integrity in the eyes of the world; but then they as little deserve to be called righteousness, as the fruit of a medlar to be called a fig. For we do not become righteous, as Aristotle pretends, by doing works of righteousness; but when we have become righteous we do such works. The man must first be changed, and then the works. Abel was first pleasing to God, and then his sacrifice." Luther continues: "I pray you, fulfil the duty of a friend and of a Christian, by making Erasmus acquainted with those things." This letter is dated, "In haste, from the corner of our convent, 19th Oct., 1516." It gives a true view of the footing on which Luther stood with Erasmus, and shews the sincere interest which he felt in whatever he thought truly advantageous to this distinguished writer. No doubt, at a later period, the opposition of Erasmus to the truth forced Luther to combat him openly; but it was only after he had sought to enlighten his opponent.

At length those views on the nature of goodness were propounded which were at once clear and profound; and the great truth was distinctly proclaimed, that the real goodness of a work consists not in its external form, but in the spirit in which it is done. Thus giving a mortal blow to all the superstitious observances which had for ages choked the Church, and prevented Christian virtues from growing and flourishing in it.

"I read Erasmus," again writes Luther, "but he is every day losing his credit with me. I like to see him, with so much skill and firmness, rebuking priests and monks for their loathsome ignorance; but I fear he will not do great service to the doctrine of Jesus Christ. What is of man has more hold on his heart than what is of God. We live in dangerous times. A man is not a good and judicious Christian because he understands Greek and Hebrew. Jerome, who knew five languages, is inferior to Augustine, who only knew one, though Erasmus thinks differently. I am very careful to conceal my sentiments concerning Erasmus, lest I should give an advantage to his opponents. It may be the Lord will give him understanding in His own time."

The impotence of man, and the omnipotence of God, were the two truths which Luther wished to re-establish. It is a sad religion and a sad philosophy which throws man back upon his natural powers. Ages have made trial of these boasted powers; and while man has of himself succeeded wonderfully in things which concern his earthly existence, he has never been able to dissipate the darkness which hides the true knowledge of God from his mind, nor to change a single inclination of his heart. The highest degree of wisdom attained by ambitious intellects, or minds inflamed with ardent longings after perfection, has only plunged them into despair. The doctrine, therefore, which unveils to us our impotence, in order to acquaint us with a Divine power, which shall enable us to do all things, is a generous, consoling, and perfectly true doctrine; and the reformation which exhibits the glory of heaven on the earth, and pleads the rights of Almighty God with men, is a great reformation.

But nobody was better aware than Luther of the intimate and indissoluble tie which unites the gratuitous salvation of God with the free works of man. Nobody shewed better than he that it is only by receiving all from Christ, that man can give much to his brethren. He always presented the two acts—that of God and that of man—in the same picture. Thus, after having explained to friar Spenlein wherein saving righteousness consists, he adds, "If you believe these things firmly, as you ought to do, (for cursed is he who believeth not,) receive thy still ignorant and erring brethren as Jesus Christ has received thee. Bear with them patiently, make their sins thy own; and if thou hast any thing good, communicate it unto them. Receive one another, saith the apostle, as Christ hath received us to the glory of God. It is a sad righteousness which will not bear with others, because it finds them wicked, and which thinks only of seeking the solitude of the desert, instead of doing them good by patience, prayer, and example. If thou art the lily and the rose of Christ, know that thy dwelling is among the thorns. Only take care that thou do not, by thy impatience, thy rash judgments, and thy hidden pride, become thyself a thorn. Christ reigns in the midst of His enemies. Had He been pleased to live only among the good, and to die only for those who loved Him; for whom, I ask, would He have died, and among whom would He have lived?"

It is touching to see how Luther himself carried these precepts of charity into practice. An Augustine, of Erfurt, named George Leiffer, was subjected to severe trials. Luther learned it, and eight days after he had written the letter to Spenlein, went up to him kindly, and said,—"I learn that you are agitated by many tempests, and that your spirit is tossed up and down upon the billows. . . . The cross of Christ is portioned out over all the earth, and each one receives his part. Do not you, then, reject that which is fallen to you. Rather receive it as a holy relic, not in a vessel of gold and of silver, but, what is far better, in a heart of gold—a heart full of meekness. If the wood of the cross has been so sanctified by the blood and flesh of Christ, that we consider it to be the most venerable relic, how much more ought we to regard the injuries, persecutions, afflictions, and hatred of men as holy relics, since they have not only been touched by the flesh of Christ, but embraced, kissed, and blessed by His boundless love!"

CHAPTER IX

First Theses—The Old Man and Grace—Visit to the Convents—Dresden—Erfurt—Tornator—Peace and the Cross—Results of the Journey—Labours—The Plague.

THE instructions of Luther bore fruit. Several of his disciples already felt themselves urged publicly to profess the truths which the lessons of their master had revealed to them. Among his hearers was a learned youth, named Bernard of Feldkirchen, professor of the physics of Aristotle in the university; and who, five years afterwards, was the first of the evangelical ecclesiastics who entered into the bond of matrimony.

Luther, while he was presiding, desired Feldkirchen to maintain theses in which his principles were expounded. The doctrines professed by Luther thus acquired new publicity. The disputation took place in 1516, and was Luther's first attack on the reign of the sophists and the Papacy. However feeble it was, it gave him considerable uneasiness. "I allow these propositions to be printed," said he, many years after, on publishing them in his works, "principally in order that the greatness of my cause, and the success with which God has crowned it, may not puff me up. For they fully manifest my shame,—that is to say, the infirmity and ignorance, the fear and trembling, with which I commenced this struggle. I was alone, and had imprudently plunged into this affair. Not being able to draw back, I conceded several important points to the pope, and even adored him."

The following are some of these propositions:—

"The old man is vanity of vanities—he is wholly vanity, and renders all other creatures vain, how good soever they be.

"The old man is called the flesh, not only because he is led by sensual lusts, but also because, even though he were chaste, prudent, and just, he is not born anew of God by the Spirit.

"A man who is without the grace of God cannot observe the commands of God, nor prepare himself, in whole or in part, to receive grace, but necessarily remains under sin.

"The will of man without grace is not free, but enslaved, and that voluntarily.

"Jesus Christ, our strength and our righteousness, who trieth the hearts and reins, is alone the Searcher and Judge of our merits.

"Since everything is possible through Christ to him who believeth, it is superstitious to seek other aid, whether in the will of man or in the saints."

This disputation made a great noise, and has been considered as the commencement of the Reformation.

The moment approached when this Reformation was to burst forth. God was hastening to prepare the instrument which he meant to employ. The elector having built a new church at Wittenberg, to which he gave the name of "All-Saints," sent Staupitz into the Netherlands to collect the relics with which he was desirous to enrich it. The vicar-general ordered Luther to take his place during his absence, and, in particular, to pay a visit to forty monasteries in Misnia and Thuringia.

Luther repaired first to Grimma, and thence to Dresden, everywhere labouring to establish the truths which he had ascertained, and to enlighten the members of his own order. "Don't attach yourself to Aristotle, or to other teachers of a deceitful philosophy," said he to the monks; "but diligently read the Word of God. Seek not your salvation in your own strength, and your own good works, but in the merits of Christ, and in Divine grace."

An Augustine monk of Dresden had run off from his convent, and was living at Mayence, where the prior of the Augustines had received him. Luther wrote to the prior to demand restitution of the lost sheep, and added these words, which are full of truth and clarity: "I know that offences must come. It is no wonder that man falls; but it is a wonder he rises again, and stands erect. Peter fell, in order that he might know that he was a man; and we still see the cedar of Lebanon fall. Angels even (a thing which surpasses our comprehension) fell in heaven, and Adam fell in paradise. Why, then, be astonished when a reed is shaken by the wind, and the smoking flax is quenched?" From Dresden Luther proceeded to Erfurt, to do the duties of vicar-general in the very convent where, eleven years before, he had wound up the clock, opened the door, and swept the church. He appointed his friend, bachelor John Lange, a learned and pious, but austere man, prior of the convent, exhorting him to affability and patience. Shortly after he wrote him: "Shew a spirit of meekness towards the prior of Nuremberg. This is fitting, inasmuch as the prior has put on a sour and bitter spirit. Bitter is not expelled by bitter,—that is to say, devil by devil; but sweet expels bitter,—that is to say, the finger of God casts out demons."

It must, perhaps, be regretted, that on different occasions Luther did not remember this excellent advice.

At Neustadt on Orla there was nothing but division. Quarrelling and disturbance reigned in the convent. All the monks were at war with the prior, and assailed Luther with their complaints. The prior, Michael Dressel, or Tornator, as Luther calls him, translating his name into Latin, on his part, explained all his grievances to the doctor. "Peace! peace!" said he. "You seek peace," replied Luther, "but you seek the peace of the world, and not that of Christ. Know you not that our God has placed his peace in the midst of war? He whom nobody troubles has no peace. But he who, troubled by all men, and by all the things of life, bears all calmly and joyfully, possesses true peace. You say, with Israel, Peace, peace; and there is no peace. Say rather with Christ, The cross, the cross; and there will be no cross. For the cross ceases to be a cross as soon as we can sincerely say with joy, O blessed cross, there is no wood like thine!" After his return to Wittenberg, Luther, wishing to put an end to these divisions, allowed the monks to elect another prior.

Luther returned to Wittenberg after an absence of six weeks. He was grieved at all that he had seen, but the journey gave him a better acquaintance with the Church and the world; gave him more confidence in his intercourse with men, and furnished him with numerous opportunities of founding schools, and urging this fundamental truth, that "the Holy Scripture alone shews us the way to heaven," and to exhort the brethren to live together holly, chastely, and peacefully. Doubtless, much seed was sown in the different Augustine convents during this journey of the Reformer. The monastic orders, which had long been the stay of Rome, perhaps did more for the Reformation than against it. This is true especially of the order of Augustines. Almost all pious men of a free and exalted spirit, who were in cloisters, turned to the Gospel; and a new and noble blood soon circulated in their orders, which were, in a manner, the arteries of German Catholicity. The world knew nothing of the new ideas of the Augustine of Wittenberg, after they had become the great subject of conversation in chapters and monasteries. In this way more than one cloister was a seminary of reformers. At the moment when the great blow was struck, pious and brave men came forth from their obscurity, and abandoned the retreat of the monastic life, for the active career of ministers of the Word of God. Even during the inspection of 1516, Luther, by his words, awoke many slumbering spirits; and hence this year has been called "the morning star of the Gospel day."

Luther resumed his ordinary avocations. At this period he was oppressed with work; it was not enough that he was professor, preacher, and confessor; he had, moreover, a variety of temporal business connected with his order and his convent. "I almost constantly require two clerks," wrote he, "for I do little else the whole day than write letters. I am preacher to the convent, chaplain at table, pastor and parish minister, director of studies, vice-prior, (which means prior eleven times over,) inspector of the ponds of Litzkau, advocate of the inns of Herzberg at Torgau, reader of St. Paul, commentator on the Psalms. . . . I have seldom time to say my Hours and chant,—to say nothing of my combat with flesh and blood, the devil and the world. . . . See how lazy a man I am."

About this time the plague broke out in Wittenberg, and a great part of the students and teachers left the town. Luther remained. "I don't well know," wrote he to his friend at Erfurt, "if the plague will allow me to finish the Epistle to the Galatians. Prompt and brisk, it makes great ravages, especially among the young. You advise me to flee. Whither shall I flee? I hope the world will not go to wreck though friar Martin fall. If the plague makes progress, I will disperse the friars in all directions; but for myself, I am stationed here, and obedience permits me not to flee, till He who has called me recall me. Not that I do not fear death, (for I am not the Apostle Paul, I am only his commentator;) but I hope the Lord will deliver me from fear." Such was the firmness of the doctor of Wittenberg. Will he, whom the plague could not force to recoil one step, recoil before Rome? Will he yield to the power of the scaffold?

CHAPTER X.

Relations of Luther with the Elector—Luther and the Elector—Counsels to the Chaplain—Duke George—His Character—Luther before the Court—Dinner at Court—Emser's Supper.

THE same courage which Luther displayed in presence of the most formidable evils, he displayed in presence of the great. The elector was much pleased with the vicar-general, who had made a good collection of relics in the Netherlands. Luther gives an account of it to Spalatin. There is something curious in this affair of relics occurring at the moment when the Reformation is about to commence. Assuredly the Reformers had little idea of the point at which they were to arrive. A bishopric seemed to the elector only a fit recompense to the vicar-general. Luther, to whom Spalatin wrote on the subject, strongly disapproved of it. "Many things," replied he, "please your prince, which, however, displease God. I deny not his ability in the affairs of the world, but in what concerns God and the salvation of souls, I account him seven-fold blind as well as his counsellor Pffeffinger. I say not this behind their backs like a slanderer; don't hide it from them, for I am ready to say it personally to both. Why," continues he, "would you environ this man with all the whirlwinds and tempests of episcopal cares?"

THE AMSELE, NEAR DRESDEN.

The elector did not take Luther's frankness in bad part. "The prince," says Spalatin in a letter to him, "often speaks of you, and with much respect." Frederick sent the monk staff to make a cassock of very fine cloth. "It would be too fine," said Luther, "were it not the gift of a prince. I am unworthy that any man should think of me, far less that a prince should, and so great a prince. The most useful persons to me are those who think the most ill of me. Return thanks to our prince for his favour; but know that I desire not to be praised by you, or by any man—all praise of man being vain, and the praise which cometh from God alone being true."

The excellent chaplain did not wish to confine himself to his court functions. He desired to render himself useful to the people; but, like many of all times, he wished to do it without giving offence. He not only wished not to irritate any one, but, on the contrary, to conciliate general favour. "Point out," says he to Luther, "some work which I may translate into our mother tongue,—a work which will please generally, and at the same time be useful." "Agreeable and useful!" replies Luther; "the request is beyond me. The better things are, the less they please. What is more salutary than Jesus Christ? And yet to most He is a saviour of death. You will tell me that you wish to be useful to those who love what is good. In that case, just let the voice of Christ be heard. You will be agreeable and useful, depend upon it; but it will be to a very small number; for the sheep are rare in this region of wolves."

Luther, however, recommended to his friend the sermons of Tauler. "I have never seen," said he,

"either in Latin or our own tongue, a sounder theology, or one more agreeable to the Gospel. Taste and see how sweet the Lord is; but be it after you have tasted and seen how bitter every thing is that is ours."

It was in the course of the year 1517 that Luther entered into communication with Duke George of Saxony. The House of Saxony had then two heads, The princes, Ernest and Albert,—carried off in their youth from the castle of Altenbourg by Kunz of Kaufungen,—had, by the treaty of Leipsic, become the founders of the two houses which still bear their name, The Elector Frederick, the son of Ernest, at the period of which we write, was the chief of the Ernestine branch; while his brother, Duke George, was chief of the Albertine branch. Dresden and Leipsic were in the states of the duke, who had his residence in the former of these cities. His mother, Sidonia, was daughter of George Podiebrad, King of Bohemia. The long struggle which Bohemia had maintained with Rome, from the days of John Huss, had had some influence on the prince of Saxony, and he had often shewn a desire for a reformation. "He has sucked it from his mother," it was said: "he is by birth an enemy of the clergy." He in various ways annoyed the bishops, abbots, canons, and monks; insomuch that his cousin, the elector, was more than once obliged to interpose in their behalf. It might have been supposed that Duke George would be a warm partisan of the Reformation. Devout Frederick, on the contrary, who had once put on the spurs of Gregory in the Holy Sepulchre, girt himself with the great ponderous sword of the conqueror of Jerusalem, and taking an oath to combat for the Church, like a bold knight, might have been expected to prove one of the most eager champions of Rome. But when the Gospel is in question, the anticipations of human wisdom are often at fault. The result was the opposite of what might have been supposed. The duke would have taken pleasure in humbling the Church, and those connected with it, and lowering the bishops, whose princely train far surpassed his own; but to receive into his heart the evangelical doctrine which must have humbled it, to acknowledge himself a guilty sinner, incapable of being saved, unless through grace, was quite a different matter. He would willingly have reformed others, but he had no desire to reform himself. He would, perhaps, have assisted in obliging the bishop of Mentz to be contented with a single bishopric, and have no more than fourteen horses in his stable, as he himself repeatedly expressed it; but when he saw another than himself appear as reformer,—when he saw a mere monk undertake the work,—and the Reformation gaining numerous adherents among the humbler classes,—the haughty grandson of the Hussite king became the most violent adversary of the reform of which he had at first promised to be a partisan.

In July, 1517, Duke George asked Staupitz to send him a learned and eloquent preacher. Staupitz sent Luther, representing him as a man of great learning and irreproachable character. The prince invited him to preach at Dresden, in the chapel of the castle, on the feast of St. James the Elder.

On the day fixed, the duke and his court proceeded to the chapel to hear the preacher of Wittenberg.

Luther gladly seized the occasion to bear testimony to the truth before such an assembly. He took for his text the Gospel of the day: "Then came to him the mother of Zebedee's children with her sons," (Matt. xx. 20-25.) He preached on the wishes and rash prayers of men; then dwelt strongly on the assurance of salvation, making it rest on this foundation,—viz., That those who hear the Word of God with faith are the true disciples, whom Jesus Christ has elected unto eternal life. He next treated of eternal election, shewing that this doctrine, when exhibited in connection with the work of Christ, is well fitted to calm the terrors of conscience; and so, instead of disposing men to flee from God, allures them to seek their refuge in Him. In conclusion, he brought forward a parable of three virgins, and drew a very instructive improvement from it.

The word of truth made a deep impression on the hearers. Two, in particular, appeared to give earnest attention to the discourse of the monk of Wittenberg. The one was a respectable looking lady who sat in one of the court pews, and whose features bespoke deep emotion. It was Madame de la Sale, grand mistress to the duchess. The other was Jerome Emser, a licentiate in canon law, and secretary and counsellor to the duke. Emser was a man of talent and extensive information. A courtier and able politician, his wish would have been to please both parties at once,—to pass at Rome for a defender of the papacy, and at the same time figure in Germany among the learned men of the age. But under this flexible spirit a violent temper lay concealed. Thus Luther and Emser, who were afterwards repeatedly to break a lance, met, for the first time, in the chapel of the castle of Dresden.

The dinner-bell having rung for the inmates of the castle, the ducal family, and the persons attached to the court, were soon seated at the table. The conversation naturally turned on the preacher of the morning. "How did you like the sermon?" said the duke to Madame de la Sale. "Could I again hear such another discourse," replied she, "I could die in peace." "And I," replied George, angrily, "would give a good sum not to have heard it. Such discourses are good only to make people sin with confidence."

The master having thus stated his opinion, the courtiers proceeded, without restraint, to express their dissatisfaction. Every one was ready with his remark. Some alleged that, in the parable of the three virgins, Luther had had three ladies of the court in his eye. On this the talk was endless. They rallied the three ladies whom they affirmed that Luther had intended. He is an ignorant blockhead, said one. He is a proud monk, said another. Each had his comment on the sermon, making the preacher say whatever he pleased. The truth had fallen into the midst of a court ill prepared to receive it. Every one tore it at pleasure. But while the Word of God was to many an occasion of stumbling, to the grand mistress it was a stone "elect and precious." Falling sick about a month after, she confidently embraced the grace of the Saviour, and died rejoicing.

In regard to the duke, perhaps the testimony which he had heard given to the truth was not in vain. However much he opposed the Reformation during his life, it is known that in his last moments he declared, that his only hope was in the merits of Jesus Christ.

It naturally led to Emser to do the honours to Luther in his master's name. He accordingly invited him to supper. Luther refused; but Emser insisted, and constrained him to come. Luther only expected to meet a few friends; but he soon perceived that a trap had been laid for him. A master of arts from Leipsic, and several Dominicans, were with the prince's secretary. The master of arts, who had an overweening opinion of himself, and a deep hatred of Luther, accosted him with a bland and friendly air; but he soon broke out, and screamed at full pitch. The battle began. "The discussion," says Luther, "turned on the absurdities of Aristotle and St. Thomas." At last, Luther challenged the master of arts, with all the erudition of the Thomists, to define what it was to fulfil the commandments of God. The master of arts, though embarrassed, put on a good countenance. "Pay me my fees," says he, stretching out his hand, "da pastun." One would have said he was going to give a lesson in form, mistaking the guests for his pupils. "At this foolish reply," adds the Reformer, "we all burst a-laughing, and the party broke up."

During the conversation a Dominican had been listening at the door, and would fain have come in to spit in Luther's face. He refrained, however, though he afterwards made a boast of it. Emser, who had been delighted at seeing his guests battling, while he seemed to hold a due medium, hastened to apologize to Luther for the manner in which the party had gone off. Luther returned to Wittenberg.

CHAPTER XI.

Return to Wittenberg—Theses—Nature of Man—Rationalism—Demand at Erfurt—Eck—Urban Regius—Luther's Modesty.

LUTHER zealously resumed his labours. He was preparing six or seven young theologians, who were forthwith to undergo an examination in order to obtain a license to teach. And what most delighted him was, that their promotion was to be to Aristotle's disgrace. "I should like," said he, "to multiply his enemies as fast as possible." With that view he at this time published Theses, which deserve attention.

The leading topic which he discussed was liberty. He had already glanced at it in the theses of Feldkirchen, but now went deeper into it. Ever since Christianity began, there has been a struggle, more or less keen, between the opposite doctrines of the freedom and the slavery of man. Some schoolmen had taught, like Pelagius and others, that man possessed in himself the liberty or power of loving God and doing good. Luther denied this liberty, not to deprive man of it, but, on the contrary, to make him obtain it. The struggle, then, in this great question, is not, as is usually said, between liberty and servitude; but between a liberty proceeding from man, and a liberty proceeding from God. Some who call themselves the advocates of liberty, say to man, "You have the power of doing good, and require a greater liberty." Others, who have been called advocates of slavery, say to him, on the contrary, "You have no true liberty; but God offers it to you in the Gospel." The one party speaks of liberty, but a liberty which must end in slavery; while the other speaks of slavery, in order to give liberty. Such was the struggle in the time of St. Paul, in the time of Augustine, and in the time of Luther. Those who say, "Change nothing!" are champions of slavery. Those who say, "Let your fetters fall!" are champions of liberty.

It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that the whole Reformation can be summed up in this particular question. It is one of the many doctrines which the Wittenberg doctor maintained—that is all. It would, above all, be a strange illusion to hold, that the Reformation was fatalism, or an opposition to liberty. It was a magnificent emancipation of the human mind. Bursting the numerous bands with which thought had been bound by the hierarchy, and reviving the ideas of liberty, right, and examination, it delivered its own age, and with it ours also, and the remotest posterity. And let it not be said that the Reformation, while it freed man from human despotism, enslaved him by proclaiming the sovereignty of grace. No doubt, it wished to bring back the human will to the Divine, to subordinate the one, and completely merge it in the other; but what philosopher knows not that entire conformity to the will of God alone constitutes sovereign, perfect freedom; and that man will never be truly free, until supreme righteousness and truth have sole dominion over him?

The following are some of the Ninety-nine Propositions which Luther sent forth into the Church in opposition to the Pelagian rationalism of scholastic theology:—

"It is true that man, who is become a corrupt tree, can only will and do what is evil.

"It is not true that the will, when left to itself, can do good as well as evil; for it is not free, but captive.

"It is not in the power of the will of man to choose or reject whatever is presented to it.

"Man cannot naturally wish God to be God. His wish is, that he himself were God, and that God were no God.

"The excellent, infallible, and sole preparation for grace, is the eternal election and predestination of God.

"It is false to say, that when man does all he can, he clears away the obstacles to grace.

"In one word, nature possesses neither a pure reason, nor a good will.

"On the part of man there is nothing which precedes grace, unless it be impotence and even rebellion.

"There is no moral virtue without pride or sullenness,—that is to say, without sin.

"From the beginning to the end we are not the masters of our actions, but the slaves of them.

"We do not become righteous by doing what is righteous; but having become righteous, we do what is righteous.

"He who says that a theologian who is not a logician is a heretic and an adventurer, maintains an adventurous and heretical proposition.

"There is no form of reasoning (syllogism) which accords with the things of God.

"If the form of the syllogism could be applied to divine things, we should know the article of the Holy Trinity, and should not believe it.

"In one word, Aristotle is to theology as darkness to light.

"Man is more hostile to the grace of God than he is to the law itself.

"He who is without the grace of God sins incessantly, even though he neither kills, nor steals, nor commits adultery.

"He sins, for he does not fulfil the law spiritually.

"Not to kill, and not to commit adultery, externally, and in regard to action, merely, is the righteousness of hypocrites.

"The law of God and the will of man are two adversaries, who, without the grace of God, can never agree.

"What the law wishes the will never wishes; only from fear it may make a shew of wishing.

"The law is the hangman of the will, and is subject only to the Child who has been born unto us. (Isaiah ix. 6.)

"The law makes sin abound; for it irritates and repulses the will.

"But the grace of God makes righteousness abound, through Jesus Christ, who makes us love the law.

"Every work of the law appears good externally, but internally is sin.

"The will, when it turns toward the law without the grace of God, does so only for its own interest.

"Cursed are those who do the works of the law.

"Blessed are all those who do the works of the grace of God.

"The law, which is good, and in which we have life, is the law of the love of God, shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Spirit. (Rom. v. 5.)

"Grace is not given in order that works may be done more frequently and more easily, but because without grace there cannot be any work of love.

"To love God is to hate oneself, and know nothing out of God."

In this way Luther attributes to God all the good that man can do. The thing to be done, is not to repair, or (so to speak) to patch up the will of man; an entirely new will must be given him. God alone could say this; for God alone could perform it. This is one of the greatest and most important truths that the will of man can acknowledge.

But Luther, while proclaiming the impotence of man, did not fall into the opposite extreme. He says in the eighth thesis, "It follows not that the will is naturally bad,—that is to say, that its nature is of the essence of evil, as the Manichees taught." Originally the nature of man was essentially good; but it turned aside from goodness,—that is, God,—and is inclined to evil. Still its origin remains holy and glorious, and is capable, by the power of God, of regaining its original. The object of Christianity is to restore it. The Gospel, it is true, exhibits man in a state of degradation and impotence, but as placed between two glories and two grandeurs,—a past glory, from which he has been precipitated; and a future glory, to which he is called. This is the truth, and man knows it to be the truth; and how little soever he thinks of it, he easily discovers that all which is told him of his actual purity, power, and glory, is only a lie, designed to cradle his pride and rock it asleep.

Luther, in his theses, attacked not only the pretended goodness of man's will, but also the pretended light of his understanding in regard to divine things. In fact, scholasticism had exalted reason as well as the will. This theology, in the hands of some of its teachers, was, at bottom, only a species of rationalism. The propositions which we have enumerated indicate this; for they look as if directed against the rationalism of our own day. In the theses, which were the signal of the Reformation, Luther attacked the Church and the popular superstitions, which to the Gospel had added indulgences, purgatory, and numberless abuses. In those which we have just given, he attacked the school and the rationalism which had robbed the Gospel of the doctrine of the sovereignty of God, His revelation, and His grace. The Reformation attacked rationalism before it attacked superstition. It proclaimed the rights of God, before lopping off the excrescences of man. It was positive before it was negative. This has not been sufficiently attended to; and yet, without attending to it, it is impossible duly to appreciate the character of this religious revolution.

Be this as it may, the truths which Luther thus expressed with so much energy were quite new. To maintain these theses at Wittenberg had been an easy matter. There his influence was paramount, and it would have been said that he had chosen a field of battle where he knew no combatant could appear. In offering battle in another university, he gave them a greater publicity; and it was by publicity that the Reformation was effected. He turned his eyes towards Erfurt, where the theologians had shewn themselves so exasperated against him.

He, accordingly, sent his theses to John Lange, prior of Erfurt, and wrote him as follows: "My anxiety for the decision which you will give us to these theses is great, extreme, too great, perhaps, and keeps me on the rack. I much suspect that your theologians will consider as paradoxical and kakodocical, what I must henceforth regard as most orthodox. Tell me how it is, and as soon as you possibly can. Have the goodness to make known to the Faculty of Theology, and to all, that I am ready to come and publicly maintain these propositions either in the university or the monastery." It does not seem that Luther's challenge was accepted. The monks of Erfurt contented themselves with intimating that his theses had incurred their high displeasure.

But he was desirous to send them to some other part of Germany; and with that view bethought him of a man who plays an important part in the history of the Reformation, and with whom the reader must be made acquainted.

A distinguished professor, named John Meyer, was then teaching in the university of Ingolstadt, in Bavaria. He was a native of Eck, a village in Swabia, and was commonly called Doctor Eck. He was a friend of Luther, who respected his talents and acquirements. Full of intellect, he had read much, and was possessed of a very retentive memory. To erudition he added eloquence. His voice and gesture bespoke the vivacity of his genius. In regard to talent, Eck was in the south of Germany what Luther was in the north. They were the two most distinguished theologians of the period, though of very different views. Ingolstadt was almost the rival of Wittenberg. The reputation of these two doctors attracted crowds of eager students from all quarters to the universities in which they taught; their personal qualities, not less than their abilities, endearing them to their pupils. The character of Doctor Eck has been assailed; but an anecdote in his history will shew that at this period, at least, his heart was not closed against generous impressions.

Among the students whom his fame had attracted to Ingolstadt, was a young man, named Urban Regius, from the banks of an Alpine lake. He had first studied at the university of Fribourg, in Brisgau. On his arrival at Ingolstadt, to which he had been attracted by the fame of Doctor Eck, Urban engaged in his course of philosophy, and gained the favour of his master. Requiring to provide for his maintenance, he was under the necessity of taking charge of some young noblemen, and had not only to superintend their studies and their conduct, but also to purchase, on his own account, whatever books and clothes they required. The youths dressed in style, and kept a good table. Regius becoming embarrassed, prayed the parents to recall their sons. "Never fear," was the answer. His debts increased, his creditors became pressing, and he was at his wit's end. The emperor was raising an army against the Turks, and a recruiting party having arrived at Ingolstadt, Urban, in despair, enlisted. Clothed in military attire, he appeared in the ranks at the time when the review took place, previous to their departure. Doctor Eck coming up at that instant, with several of his colleagues, was greatly surprised to discover his student among the recruits. "Urban Regius!" said he, fixing his keen eye on him. "Here," replied the recruit. "What, pray, is the cause of this?" The young man told his story. "I take the matter upon myself," replied Eck; and setting his halberd aside, bought him off from the recruiting party. The parents, threatened by the doctor with the displeasure of the prince, sent the necessary funds to defray the expenses of their children, and Urban Regius was saved to become, at a later period, one of the pillars of the Reformation.

Doctor Eck occurred to Luther as the proper person to publish his theses on Pelagianism and scholastic rationalism in the south of the empire. He did not, however, send them to the professor of Ingolstadt directly; but employed a mutual friend, the excellent Christopher Scheurl, secretary to the town of Nuremberg, praying him to send them to Eck at Ingolstadt, which is at no great distance from Nuremberg. "I send you," says he, "my paradoxical, and even kakistodoxical propositions, as many think them. Communicate them to our dear friend, the very learned and talented Eck, that I may learn and know what he thinks of them." These were the terms in which Luther then spoke of Doctor Eck,—such was the friendship then subsisting between them. It was not Luther who broke it off.

Ingolstadt, however, was not the field on which the battle was to be fought. The doctrines on which these theses turned were, perhaps, of greater importance than those which, two months after, set the Church in a blaze; and yet, notwithstanding of Luther's challenges, they passed unnoticed. At most, they were read within the circle of the school, and produced no sensation beyond it. The reason was, because they were only university propositions, and theological doctrines; whereas the subsequent theses related to an evil which had grown up in the midst of the people, and was then causing devastation in all parts of Germany. So long as Luther was contented with reviving forgotten doctrines, all was silence; but when he attacked abuses which were universally felt, every one turned to listen.

Nevertheless, all that Luther proposed in either case, was to produce one of those theological discussions which were then so common in universities. To this circle his views were confined. He was humble, and his humility amounted even to distrust and anxiety. "Considering my ignorance," said he, "all I deserve is to be hid in a corner, without being known by any one under the sun." But a mighty hand drew him out of this corner in which he wished to remain unknown to the world. A circumstance, independent of Luther's will, threw him into the field of battle, and the war commenced. This providential circumstance we are now called upon to relate.

BOOK III.

THE INDULGENCES AND THESES—1517, 1518.

CHAPTER I.

Cortège—Tetzel—Tetzel's Discourse—Confession—Four Graces—Sale—Public Penance—A Letter of Indulgence—Exceptions—Feasting and Debauchery.

At this period the people of Germany were all in motion. The Church had opened a vast market on the earth. From the crowd of customers, and the noise and pleasantry of the sellers, one would have thought it a fair, only a fair held by monks. The merchandise which they were shewing off, and selling a bargain, was, as they said, the salvation of souls.

The merchants travelled the country in a fine carriage, accompanied by three mounted attendants, journeying in grand style, and living at great expense. One would have said it was some high mightiness with his suite and officers, and not a vulgar dealer or mendicant monk. When the cortège approached a town, a messenger was despatched to the magistrate to say, "The grace of God and of St. Peter is at your gates." Immediately the whole place was in motion. Clergy, priests, nuns, the council, schoolmasters and their scholars, the incorporations with their colours, men and women, old and young, went out to meet the merchant with lighted tapers in their hands, amid the sound of music and the ringing of bells; "insomuch," says a historian, "that God himself could not have been received with greater honour." After the formalities were over, the whole body proceeded to the church. The Bull of Grace by the pontiff was carried in front, on a velvet cushion or cloth of gold. Next came the chief of the indulgence merchants, carrying a large wooden cross, painted red. The whole procession moved forward, amid hymns, prayers, and the smoke of incense. The merchant monk and his attendants were received at the church by the pealing organ, and thrilling music. The cross was placed in front of the altar, and over it the pope's arms were suspended. All the time it remained there, the clergy of the place, the penitentiaries, and sub-commissaries, came each day, after vespers or before the salute, to do obeisance to it with white wands in their hands. This grand affair produced a lively sensation in the quiet cities of Germany.

At these sales one personage, in particular, drew the attention of the spectators. It was he who carried the great red cross, and played the principal character. He was clothed in the dress of a Dominican, and had an arrogant air. His voice was stentorian, and though in his sixty-third year, he seemed still in full vigour. This man, the son of one Dietz, a jeweller of Leipsic, was called John Dietzel, or Tetzel. He had studied in his native town, became bachelor in 1487, and two years after entered the Dominican order. Numerous honours had accumulated on his head. Bachelor in theology, prior of the Dominicans, apostolic commissary, inquisitor, (hereticæ pravitatis inquisitor), he had discharged the office of commissary of indulgences, without intermission, from 1502. The skill which he had acquired as subaltern, soon raised him to the office of commissary-in-chief. He had eighty florins a-month, and all his expenses paid, together with a carriage and three horses; but his perquisites (it is easy to comprehend what they were) far exceeded his salary. In 1507, at Fribourg, he gained two thousand florins in two days. If he discharged the functions, he had also the manners of a quack. Convicted of adultery and shameful misconduct at Inspruck, his vices had almost cost him his life. The Emperor Maximilian had ordered him to be put into a sack and thrown into the river; but the Elector Frederick happening to arrive, obtained his pardon. The lesson which he thus received had not given him more modesty; for he had two of his children along with him.

Miltitz, the pope's legate, mentions the fact in one of his letters. It would have been difficult to find, in all the cloisters of Germany, a man better fitted for the traffic with which he was entrusted. To the theology of a monk, to the zeal and temper of an inquisitor, he united the greatest effrontery; but the thing which, above all, made the task easy to him, was his skill in inventing extraordinary stories to captivate the minds of the people. To him all means were good that filled his coffers. Raising his voice, and giving free vent to his vulgar eloquence, he offered his indulgences to every corner, and knew better than any dealer at a fair how to set off his merchandise.

After the cross was erected, and the arms of the pope suspended over it, Tetzel mounted the pulpit, and with a tone of assurance began to extol the value of the indulgences in presence of the crowd who had been attracted to the church by the ceremony. The people listened and stared on hearing the wondrous virtues of which he told them. A Jesuit historian, speaking of the Dominicans, with whom Tetzel was associated, says, "Some of these preachers failed not, as usual, to outrage the subject which they treated; and so to exaggerate the value of the indulgences, as to make people suppose they were certain of their own salvation, and of the deliverance of souls from purgatory as soon as the money was paid." If such were the scholars, we may judge what the master was. Let us listen to one of his harangues after setting up the cross.

"Indulgences are the most precious and most sublime gift of God.

"This cross (pointing to the red cross) has the very same efficacy as the actual cross of Jesus Christ.

"Come, and I will give you letters under seal, by which even the sins which you may have a desire to commit in future will all be forgiven.

"I would not exchange my privileges for that of St. Peter in heaven; for I have saved more souls by my indulgences than the apostle by his sermons.

"There is no sin too great for an indulgence to remit; and even should any one (the thing, no doubt, is impossible) have done violence to the Holy Virgin Mary, mother of God, let him pay,—let him only pay well,—and it will be forgiven him.

"Think, then, that for each mortal sin you must, after confession and contrition, do penance for seven years, either in this life or in purgatory. Now, how many mortal sins are committed in one day—in one week? How many in a month—a year—a whole life? Ah! these sins are almost innumerable, and innumerable sufferings must be endured for them in purgatory. And now, by means of these letters of indulgence, you can at once, for life,—in all cases except four, which are reserved to the Apostolic See,—and afterwards at the hour of death, obtain a full remission of all your pains, and all your sins."

Tetzel even made financial calculations on the subject. "Do you not know," said he, "that when a man proposes to go to Rome, or to any other country where travellers are exposed to danger, he sends his money to the bank; and for every five hundred florins that he means to have, gives five, or six at most, in order that, by means of letters from the bank, he may receive the money safely at Rome or elsewhere. . . . And you, for the fourth of a florin, will not receive these letters of indulgence, by means of which you might introduce into the land of paradise, not worthless money, but a divine and immortal soul, without exposing it to the smallest risk."

Tetzel next passed to another subject.

"But more than this," said he; "indulgences not only save the living; they also save the dead.

"For this repentance is not even necessary.

"Priest!—noble!—merchant!—wife!—young girls!—young men!—hear your departed parents, and your other friends, crying to you from the bottom of the abyss. We are enduring horrible torments! A little alms would deliver us; you can give it, and yet will not!"

These words, uttered by the formidable voice of the charlatan monk, made his hearers shudder.

"At the very instant," continued Tetzel, "when the piece of money clicks on the bottom of the strong box, the soul comes out of purgatory, and, set free, flies upward into heaven."

"O imbecile and brutish people, who perceive not the grace which is so richly offered to you! . . . Now heaven is everywhere open! . . . Do you refuse at this hour to enter? When, then, will you enter? Now you can ransom so many souls! Hard-hearted and thoughtless man, with twelve pence you can deliver your father out of purgatory, and you are ungrateful enough not to save him! I will be justified on the day of judgment; but you, you will be punished so much the more severely, for having neglected so great salvation. I declare to you, that though you had only a single coat, you would be bound to take it off and sell it, in order to obtain this grace. . . .

The Lord our God is no longer God. He has committed all power to the pope."

Then, trying to avail himself of other weapons still, he added,—"Know you why our most holy Lord is distributing so great a grace? His object is to raise up the ruined church of St. Peter and St. Paul, so that it may not have its equal in the universe. That church contains the bodies of the holy apostles Peter and Paul, and of a multitude of martyrs. Owing to the actual state of the building, these holy bodies are now, alas! beaten, flooded, soiled, dishonoured, and reduced to rottenness, by the rain and the hail. . . . Ah! are these sacred ashes to remain longer in mud and disgrace?"

This picture failed not to make an impression on many who felt a burning desire to go to the help of poor Leo X., who had not wherewith to shelter the bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul from the rain.

Then the orator opened on the arguers and traitors who opposed his work: "I declare them excommunicated," exclaimed he.

Afterwards, addressing docile souls, and making a profane use of Scripture,—"Happy are the eyes which see what you see; for I tell you, that many prophets and many kings have desired to see the things which you see, and have not seen them; and to hear the things which you hear, and have not heard them." And at last, shewing the strong box in which the money was received, he usually concluded his pathetic discourse with this triple appeal to the people: "Bring!—bring!—bring!" "These words," says Luther, "he uttered with such horrible bellowing, that one might have thought it was a mad bull making a rush at people, and striking them with his horns." When his discourse was ended, he came down from the pulpit, ran towards the chest, and, in presence of the people, chucked a piece of money into it, taking care to make it give a very loud tinkle.

Such were the discourses which astonished Germany heard in the days when God was preparing Luther.

At the termination of the discourse, the indulgence was understood "to have established its throne in the place in due form." Confessionals were set up adorned with the pope's arms. The sub-commissionaries, and the confessors whom they selected, were considered to represent the apostolical penitentiaries of Rome at the jubilee; and on each of these confessionals were posted, in large characters, their names, surnames, and designations.

Then a crowd pressed forward to the confessor, each coming with a piece of money in his hand. Men, women, and children, the poor, even those who lived on alms, all found means of procuring money. The penitentiaries, after having anew explained the greatness of the indulgence to each individual, asked, "How much money can you afford to part with, in order to obtain so complete a forgiveness?" "This question," says the Instruction of the Archbishop of Mentz to the commissaries,—"this question ought to be put at this moment, that the penitents may thereby be the better disposed to contribute."

Four valuable graces were promised to those who aided in building the basilisk of St. Peter. "The first grace which we announce to you," said the commissary ries, (according to their Letter of Instruction,) "is the complete pardon of all sins." After this came three other graces,—first, the right of choosing a confessor, who, whenever the hour of death should seem to be at hand, would give absolution from all sins, and even from the greatest crimes reserved for the apostolic see; second, a participation in all the blessings, works, and merits of the Catholic Church, in prayers, fastings, alms, and pilgrimages; and, third, the redemption of the souls which are in purgatory.

To obtain the first of these graces, it was necessary to have contrition of heart, and confession of the lips, or, at least, the intention of confessing. But for the three others, they could be obtained without contrition or confession, merely by paying. Previous to this, Christopher Columbus, extolling the value of gold, had said quite gravely, "He who possesses it may introduce souls into paradise." Such was the doctrine taught by the Archbishop-Cardinal of Mentz, and the commissaries of the pope. "As to those," said they, "who would deliver souls from purgatory, and procure for them pardon of all their offences, let them throw money into the chest. It is not necessary for them to have contrition of the heart, or confession of the lips. Let them only hasten with their money; for they will thus do a work most useful to the souls of the departed, and to the erection of the church of St. Peter." Greater blessings could not be offered at a cheaper rate.

THE OLD COUNCIL-HOUSE, LEIPSIG.

When the confession was over (and it did not take long) the faithful hastened towards the seller. One only had charge of the sale, and kept his counter near the cross. He carefully eyed those who approached him,—examining their air, bearing, and dress,—and asked a sum proportioned to the appearance which each presented. Kings, queens, princes, archbishops, bishops, were, according to the regulation, to pay twenty-five ducats for an ordinary indulgence. Abbots, counts, and barons, paid ten. Others of the nobility, rectors, and all who had an income of five hundred florins, paid six. Those who had two hundred florins a-year, paid one; others, only a half. Moreover, when the tax could not be followed to the letter, full powers were given to the commissary-apostolic, who was to arrange everything in accordance with the dictates of "sound reason," and the generosity of the donor. For particular sins, Tetzel had a particular tax. Polygamy paid six ducats; theft in a church, and perjury, nine ducats; murder, eight ducats; magic, two ducats. Samson, who carried on the same traffic in Switzerland as Tetzel in Germany, had a somewhat different tax. For infanticide, he charged four livres tournois; for parricide or fratricide, a ducat.

The apostolic commissaries sometimes encountered difficulties in carrying on their trade. It often happened, both in towns and villages, that husbands were opposed to the whole concern, and prohibited their wives from giving anything to these merchants. What, then, were devout spouses to do? "Have you not your dowry, or some other property, at your own disposal?" asked the dealers. "In that case we may dispose of part for so sacred a purpose, even against the will of your husbands."

The hand which had given the indulgence could not receive the money. This was prohibited under the severest penalties; for there might be good reason to suspect that that hand would not have been faithful. The penitent himself behaved to deposit the price of his pardon in the chest. Angry looks were given to those who were audacious enough not to open their purses.

If among those who pressed forward to the confessionals, there happened to be any one whose crime was publicly known, though of a kind which the civil law could not reach, he behaved, first of all, to do public penance. For this purpose, they first led him to a chapel or sacristy, where they stripped him of his clothes, and took off his shoes, leaving him nothing but his shirt. His arms were crossed upon his breast, a light placed in one hand, and a rod in the other. Then the penitent walked at the head of the procession which proceeded to the red cross. He remained on his knees till the chant and the collect was finished. Then the commissary gave out the Psalm, Miserere mei. The confessors immediately approached the penitent, and led him across the church towards the commissary, who, taking the rod from his hand, and gently striking him thrice on the back with it, said to him, "The Lord have pity on thee, and forgive thy sin." He then gave out the Kyrie eleison. The penitent was led back to the front of the cross, and the confessor gave him the apostolic absolution, and declared him restored to the company of the faithful. Sad mummary, concluded with a holy expression, which, at such a moment, was mere profanation!

It is worth while to know the contents of one of those diplomas of absolution, which led to the Reformation of the Church. The following is a specimen:—"May our Lord Jesus Christ have pity on thee, N. N., and absolve thee by the merit of His most holy passion. And I, in virtue of the apostolic power entrusted to me, absolve thee from all ecclesiastical censures, judgments, and penalties, which thou mayest have deserved; moreover, from all the excesses, sins, and crimes, which thou mayest have committed, how great and enormous soever they may have been, and for whatever cause, even should they have been reserved to our most holy father the pope, and to the apostolic see. I efface all the marks of disability, and all the notes of infamy which thou mayest have incurred on this occasion. I remit the pains which thou shouldst have to endure in purgatory. I render thee anew a partaker in the sacraments of the Church. I again incorporate thee into the communion of saints, and re-establish thee in the innocence and purity in which thou wert at the hour of thy baptism; so that, at the moment of thy death, the gate of entrance to the place of pains and torments will be shut to thee; and, on the contrary, the gate which leads to the heavenly paradise will be opened to thee. If thou art not to die soon, this grace will remain unimpaired till thy last hour arrive. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

"Friar John Tetzel, commissary, has signed it with his own hand."

How dexterously presumptuous and lying words are here intermingled with holy Christian expressions!

All the faithful required to come and confess at the place where the red cross was erected. The only exceptions were the sick, the aged, and pregnant women. If, however, there happened to be in the neighbourhood some noble in his castle, or some great personage in his palace, there was an exemption for him; for he might not care to mingle with the crowd, and his money was worth the going for.

If there happened to be a convent whose heads were opposed to the traffic of Tetzel, and prohibited their monks from visiting the places where the indulgence had erected its throne, means were still found to remedy the evil, by sending them confessors, who were commissioned to absolve them against the will of their order, and the will of their heads. There was not a vein in the mine, however small, which they did not find means of working.

At length they arrived at the object and end of the whole affair; the summing up of the cash. For greater security, the strong box had three keys,—one in the hands of Tetzel; the second in those of the treasurer, appointed by the firm of Fugger of Augsburg, who had been appointed agents in this vast enterprise; while the third was entrusted to the civil authority. When the moment arrived, the counters were opened in the presence of a notary-public, and the whole was duly counted and recorded. Must not Christ arise and drive these profane sellers from the temple?

The mission being closed, the dealers relaxed from their labours. It is true the instructions of the commissary-general forbade them to frequent taverns and suspicious places; but they cared little for this prohibition. Sin must have appeared a very trivial matter to people who had such an easy trade in it. "The mendicants," says a Roman Catholic historian, "led a bad life, expending in taverns, gaming-houses, and places of infamy, what the people retrenched from their necessities." It is even averred, that in taverns they sometimes played at dice for the salvation of souls.

CHAPTER II.

The Franciscan Confessor—The Soul in the Burying-Ground—The Shoemaker of Hagenua—The Students—Myconius—Conversation with Tetzel—Stratagem by a Gentleman—Conversation of the Wise and of the People—A Miner of Schneeberg.

BUT let us look at some of the scenes which then took place in Germany during this sale of the pardon of sins; for we here meet with anecdotes which, by themselves alone, give a picture of the times. As we proceed with our narrative, we deem it best to let men speak for themselves.

At Magdebourg Tetzel refused to absolve a wealthy female, unless she would pay him one hundred florins in advance. She consulted her ordinary confessor, who was a Franciscan. "God," replied he, "gives the remission of sins freely, and does not sell it." However, he begged her not to tell Tetzel what advice he had given her. But the merchant having somehow or other heard of words so injurious to his interest, exclaimed, "Such an adviser deserves to be banished or burned."

Tetzel rarely found men enlightened enough, and still more rarely men bold enough, to resist him. For the most part he had a good market from the superstitious crowd. He had erected the red cross of indulgences at Zwickau, and the good parishioners had hastened to make the money, which was to deliver them, chink on the bottom of the chest. He was going away with a well-filled purse. The evening before his departure, the chaplains and their attendants applied to him for a farewell entertainment. The request was reasonable; but how was it possible to comply with it?—the money was already counted and sealed up. The next morning he orders the large bell to be rung. Crowds hastened to the church, every one thinking that something extraordinary must have happened, as the station was closed. "I had resolved," said he, "to depart this morning, but last night was awoken by groans. On listening, I found they came from the burying-ground. Alas! it was a poor soul calling and entreating me instantly to deliver it from the torment by which it was consumed. I have, therefore, remained one day more, in order to stir up the compassion of Christian hearts in favour of this unhappy soul. I am willing myself to be the first to give, and whosoever does not follow my example will deserve damnation." What heart would not have responded to such an appeal? Who knew, moreover, whose soul it was that was crying in the burying-ground? The people contributed freely, and Tetzel gave the chaplains and their attendants a jovial entertainment, defraying the expense by the offerings which he had received in favour of the soul of Zwickau.

The indulgence merchants had fixed their station at Hagenau in 1517. A shoemaker's wife, taking advantage of the authority of the instruction of the commissary-general, had, contrary to the will of her husband, procured a letter of indulgence, and paid a gold florin for it. She died shortly after. The husband not having caused mass to be said for the repose of her soul, the curate charged him with contempt of religion, and the judge of Hagenau summoned him to appear. The shoemaker put his wife's indulgence in his pocket, and repaired to the court. "Is your wife dead?" asked the judge.—"Yes," replied he. "What have you done for her?"—"I have buried her body, and commended her soul to God." "But have you caused a mass to be said for the salvation of her soul?"—"I have not; it was unnecessary. She entered heaven the moment of her death." "How do you know that?"—"Here is the proof." So saying, he takes the indulgence out of his pocket, and the judge, in presence of the curate, reads in as many words, that the woman who received it would not enter purgatory, but go straight to heaven. "If the reverend curate maintains that a mass is still necessary, my wife has been cheated by our most holy father the pope. If she was not cheated, then it is the reverend curate who is cheating me." This was unanswerable, and the accused was acquitted. Thus the good sense of the people did justice to these pious frauds.

One day when Tetzel was preaching at Leipsic, and introducing into his sermons some of those stories of which we have given a sample, two students, feeling quite indignant, rose up and left the church, exclaiming, "It is impossible for us to listen longer to the drolleries and puerilities of this monk." One of them, it is said, was young Camerarius, afterwards the intimate friend of Melancthon, and his biographer.

But of all the young men of the period, he on whom Tetzel made the strongest impression unquestionably was Myconius, afterwards celebrated as a Reformer, and historian of the Reformation. He had received a Christian education. His father, a pious man of Franconia, was wont to say to him, "My son, pray frequently; for all things are freely given to us by God alone. The blood of Christ," added he, "is the only ransom for the sins of the whole world. O my son! were there only three men that could be saved by the blood of Christ, believe, and believe with confidence, that thou art one of the three. It is an insult to the blood of the Saviour to doubt if it saves." Then cautioning his son against the traffic which was beginning to be established in Germany,—“The Roman indulgences,” said he to him, “are nets which fish for money, and deceive the simple. The forgiveness of sins, and of eternal life, are not things for sale.”

At the age of thirteen Frederick Myconius was sent to the school of Annaberg to finish his studies. Shortly after, Tetzel arrived in the town, and remained in it for two years. The people flocked in crowds to his sermon. "There is no other method," exclaimed Tetzel, in his voice of thunder,—“there is no other method of obtaining eternal life than the satisfaction of works; but this satisfaction is impossible for man, and, therefore, all he can do is to purchase it from the Roman pontiff." When Tetzel was about to quit Annaberg, his addresses became more urgent. "Soon," exclaimed he, in a threatening tone,—“soon will I take down the cross, shut the gate of heaven, and quench the lustre of that sun of grace which is now shining in your eyes." Then resuming the gentle accent of persuasion, "Now," said he, "is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation." Then raising his voice anew, the pontifical Stentor, who was addressing the inhabitants of a rich mineral district, loudly exclaimed, "Bring your money, burghers of Annaberg, contribute largely in behalf of the indulgences, and your mines and your mountains will be filled with pure silver." In conclusion, he declared that at Pentecost he would distribute his letters to the poor gratuitously, and for the love of God.

Young Myconius, being among the number of Tetzel's hearers, felt an eager desire to avail himself of this offer. Going up to the commissaries, he said to them in Latin, "I am a poor sinner, and need a gratuitous pardon!" The merchants replied, "Those alone can have part in the merits of Jesus Christ who lend a helping-hand to the Church,—in other words, who give money." "What is the meaning, then," said Myconius, "of those promises of free gift, which are posted up on the walls and doors of the churches?" "Give at least a shilling," said Tetzel's people who had gone to their master, and interceded with him for the young man, but without effect. "I am not able." "Only sixpence."—"I have not even so much." The Dominicans then began to fear that he wished to entrap them. "Listen," said they to him, "we will make you a present of the sixpence." The young man, raising his voice in indignation, answered, "I want no indulgences that are purchased. If I wished to purchase, I would only have to sell one of my school-books. I want a free pardon, given purely for the love of God, and you will have to give account to God for having allowed the salvation of a soul to be lost for a sixpence." "Who sent you to entrap us?" exclaimed the merchants.—“Nothing but the desire of receiving the grace of God could have tempted me to appear before such mighty lords," replied the young man, and withdrew.

"I was much grieved," said he, "at being sent thus pitilessly away; but I still felt within myself a Comforter, who told me that there was a God in heaven, who, without money and without price, pardons repenting sinners for the love of His Son Jesus Christ. As I was taking leave of those people, I melted into tears, and, sobbing, prayed, 'O God! since these men have refused me the forgiveness of my sins, because I had no money to pay for it, do thou, O Lord! have pity on me, and forgive my sins in pure mercy!' I went to my lodging, and taking up my crucifix, which was lying on my desk, laid it on my chair, and prostrated myself before it. I cannot describe what I felt. I asked God to be my Father, and to do with me whatsoever He pleased. I felt my nature changed, converted, and transformed. What formerly delighted me, now excited my disgust. To live with God, and please Him, was my strongest, my only desire." Thus Tetzel himself contributed to the Reformation. By crying abuses he paved the way for a purer doctrine, and the indignation which he excited in a generous youth was one day to break forth mightily. We may judge of this by the following anecdote.

A Saxon gentleman, who had heard Tetzel at Leipsic, felt his indignation aroused by his falsehoods; and going up to the monk, asked him whether he had power to pardon the sins which were intended to be committed?—"Assuredly," replied Tetzel. "I have full power from the pope to do so." "Well, then," resumed the knight, "there is one of my enemies on whom I should like to take a slight revenge without doing him any deadly injury, and I will give you ten crowns in return for a letter of indulgence, which will completely acquit me." Tetzel made some objections: at last, however, they came to an agreement for thirty crowns. Soon after the monk quits Leipsic. The gentleman, accompanied by his servants, waited for him in a wood between Jüterboch and Treblin, and rushing out upon him, and giving him some blows with a stick, carried off the rich indulgence chest, which the inquisitor had with him. Tetzel cries out robbery, and carries his complaint before the judges; but the gentleman shews the letter with Tetzel's own signature, exempting him beforehand from all punishment. Duke George, who had at first been very angry, on seeing the document ordered the accused to be acquitted.

This traffic everywhere occupied men's thoughts, and was everywhere talked of. It was the subject of conversation in castles, in academies, and at the firesides of the citizens, as well as in inns and taverns, and all places of public resort. Opinions were divided,—some believing, and others expressing indignation. The sensible portion of the community rejected the whole system of indulgences with disgust. It was so contrary to Scripture and to morality, that all who had any knowledge of the Bible, or any natural light, condemned it in their hearts, and only waited for a signal to declare their opposition to it. On the other hand, scoffers found ample materials for raillery. The people, who had for many years been irritated by the misconduct of the priests, and whom nothing but the fear of punishment induced to keep up a certain shew of respect, gave free vent to their hatred. Complaints and sarcasms were everywhere heard on the avarice of the clergy.

Nor did they stop here. They even attacked the power of the keys, and the authority of the sovereign pontiff. "Why," said they, "does not the pope deliver all souls from purgatory at once from a holy charity, and in consideration of the sad misery of these souls, seeing he delivers so great a number for the love of perishable money, and of the cathedral of St. Peter? Why do feasts and anniversaries of the dead continue to be celebrated? Why does not the pope restore or allow others to resume the benefices and prebends which have been founded in favour of the dead, since it is now useless, and even reprehensible, to pray for those whom indulgences have for ever delivered?" "What kind of new holiness in God and the pope is this—from a love of money to enable a wicked profane man to deliver a pious soul beloved of the Lord from purgatory, rather than deliver it themselves gratuitously from love, and because of its great wretchedness."²¹

The gross and immoral conduct of the traffickers in indulgences was much talked of. "In paying carriers for transporting them with their goods, the innkeepers with whom they lodge, or any one who does any piece of work for them, they give a letter of indulgence for four, five, or any number of souls, as the case may be." In this way the diplomas of salvation were current in inns and in markets, like bank bills or paper money. "Bring! bring!" said the common people, "is the head, the belly, the tail, and the whole body of the sermon."

A miner of Schneeberg, meeting a seller of indulgences, asked,—“Must we indeed give credit to what you have often said of the power of the indulgence, and of the authority of the pope, and believe it possible, by throwing a penny into the box, to ransom a soul from purgatory?” The merchant assured him it was true. “Ah!” resumed the miner, “what an unmerciful man the pope must be, for a paltry penny to leave a miserable soul so long crying in the flames! If he has no ready money, let him borrow some hundred thousand crowns, and deliver all these people at once. We poor folks will willingly pay him both the interest and the capital.” Thus Germany was weary of the shameful traffic which was going on in the midst of her, and could no longer tolerate the impostures of these master-swindlers of Rome, as Luther calls them. Yet no bishop, no theologian, durst oppose their quackery and their fraud. The minds of men were in suspense, and asked whether God would not raise up some mighty man for the work which required to be done? This man nowhere appeared.

CHAPTER III.

Leo X.—Necessities of the Pope—Albert—His Character—Favours the Indulgences—The Franciscans and the Dominicans.

THE pope then on the pontifical throne was not a Borgia, but Leo X., of the illustrious house of Medici. He was able, frank, kind, and gentle. His address was affable, his liberality without bounds, and his morals superior to those of his court. Cardinal Palavicini, however, acknowledges that they were not altogether irreproachable. To this amiable character he joined several of the qualities of a great prince. He shewed himself friendly to science and art. The first Italian comedies were represented in his presence; and there are few of his day which he did not see performed. He was passionately fond of music. Musical instruments resounded every day in his palace; and he was often heard humming the airs which had been performed before him. He was fond of magnificence, and spared nothing when fêtes, games, theatricals, presents, or rewards, were in question. No court surpassed that of the sovereign pontiff in splendour and gaiety. Accordingly, when it was learned that Julian Medicis was proposing to reside at Rome with his young bride,—“God be praised,” exclaimed Cardinal Bibbiena, the most influential counsellor of Leo X., “the only thing we wanted was a female court.” A female court was necessary to complete the court of the pope. To religious sentiment Leo was completely a stranger. "His manners were so pleasing," says Sarpi, "that he would have been perfect if he had had some acquaintance with religious matters, and been somewhat more inclined to piety, which seldom, if ever, gave him any concern."

Leo was greatly in want of money. He had to provide for his immense expenditure; supply all his liberalities; fill the purse of gold which he daily threw to the people; keep up the licentious exhibitions of the Vatican; satisfy the numerous demands of his relations and voluptuous courtiers; give a dowry to his sister, who had been married to Prince Cibo,—a natural son of Pope Innocent VIII.; and meet the expenditure occasioned by his taste for literature, arts, and pleasure. His cousin, Cardinal Pucci, as skilful in the art of hoarding as Leo in that of lavishing, advised him to have recourse to indulgences. Accordingly, the pope published a bull, announcing a general indulgence, the proceeds of which were, he said, to be employed in the erection of the church of St. Peter, that monument of sacerdotal magnificence. In a letter, dated at Rome, under the seal of the Fisherman, in November, 1517, Leo applies to his commissary of indulgences for one hundred and forty-seven gold ducats, to pay a manuscript of the thirty-third book of Livy. Of all the uses to which he put the money of the Germans, this was, doubtless, the best. Still, it was strange to deliver souls from purgatory, in order to purchase a manuscript history of the wars of the Roman people.

There was at this time in Germany a young prince who might be regarded as, in many respects, a living image of Leo X. This was Albert,—a younger brother of the Elector Joachim of Brandenburg. At twenty-four years of age he had been appointed archbishop and elector of Mentz and of Magdebourg, and two years after made a cardinal. Albert had neither the virtues nor the vices which are often met with in the high dignitaries of the Church. Young, fickle, worldly, but not without some generous feelings, he was perfectly aware of many of the abuses of Catholicism, and cared little for the fanatical monks by whom he was surrounded. His equity disposed him, in part at least, to acknowledge the justice of what the friends of the Gospel demanded. In his secret heart he was not much opposed to Luther. Capito, one of the most distinguished Reformers, was long his chaplain, counsellor, and confidant. Albert regularly attended his sermons. "He did not despise the Gospel," says Capito; "on the contrary, he highly esteemed it, and for a long time would not allow the monks to attack Luther." But he would have liked Luther not to compromise him, and to take good care, while exposing the doctrinal errors and vices of the inferior clergy, not to disclose the faults of bishops and princes. In particular, he was most anxious that his name should not be mixed up with the affair. His confidant, Capito, who had imposed upon himself, as men often do in situations similar to his, thus addressed Luther: "Look to the example of Jesus Christ and the apostles; they rebuked the Pharisees and the incestuous men of Corinth, but they never expressly named them. You know not what is passing in the hearts of the bishops; and, perhaps, there is more good in them than you suppose." But the fickle and profane spirit of Albert, still more than the susceptibilities and fears of his self-love, estranged him from the Reformation. Affable, clever, handsome, extravagant, and wasteful; delighting in the pleasures of the table, in rich equipages, splendid buildings, licentious pleasures, and literary society; this young archbishop-electoral was in Germany what Leo X. was at Rome. His court was one of the most magnificent in the empire, and he was prepared to sacrifice to pleasure and grandeur all the sentiments of truth which, perhaps, might have insinuated themselves into his heart. Nevertheless, his better convictions continued even to the last to exercise some degree of influence over him, and he repeatedly gave indications of moderation and equity.

Albert, like Leo, was in want of money. The Fuggers, rich merchants in Augsburg, had made him advances which he behoved to repay; and hence, though he had managed to secure two archbishoprics and a bishopric, he was unable to pay Rome for his Pallium. This ornament of white wool, bespangled with black crosses, and blessed by the pope, who sent it to the archbishops as a token of their dignity, cost them twenty-six, or, some say, thirty thousand florins. In order to obtain money, Albert, naturally enough, be thought himself of having recourse to the same methods as the pope. He accordingly applied to him for the general farming of the indulgences, or, as they expressed it at Rome, "of the sins of the Germans."

The popes sometimes kept the indulgences in their own hands, and at other times farmed them out, in the same way as some governments still do gaming-houses. Albert made an offer to Leo to share the profits with him; and Leo, in agreeing to the bargain, stipulated for immediate payment of the Pallium.

Albert had been counting on paying it out of the indulgences, and therefore applied anew to the Fuggers, who, thinking the security good, agreed, on certain conditions, to make the advance required, and were appointed bankers to the concern. They were the bankers of the princes of this period, and were afterwards made counts in return for the services which they had rendered.

The pope and the archbishop having thus, by anticipation, shared in the spoils of the good souls of Germany, the next matter was to select the persons who were to carry the affair into effect. It was first offered to the Franciscan order, whose guardian was conjoined with Albert. But, as it was already in bad odour with honest people, these monks were not anxious to have anything to do with it. The Augustines, who were more enlightened than the other religious orders, would have been less inclined to undertake it. The

ST. PETER'S, ROME.

Franciscans, however, being afraid of offending the pope, who had just sent their chief, De Forli, a cardinal's hat,—a hat which had cost this poor mendicant order thirty thousand florins,—the guardian deemed it more prudent not to refuse openly; but, at the same time, threw all sorts of difficulties in Albert's way. They could never understand each other; and, accordingly, when the proposal was made to the elector to undertake the whole charge, he eagerly closed with it. The Dominicans, on the other hand, longed for a share in the general collection which was about to commence. Tetzel, who was already famous in the trade, hastened to Mentz to offer his services to the elector. In consideration of the talent which he had displayed in publishing the indulgences for the knights of the Teutonic order of Prussia and Livonia, his proposals were accepted, and in this way the whole traffic passed into the hands of his order.

CHAPTER IV.

Tetzel approaches—Luther at the Confessional—Tetzel's Rage—Luther without a Plan—Jealousy among the Orders—Luther's Discourse—The Elector's Dream.

IN so far as we know, Luther heard of Tetzel, for the first time, at Grimma, in 1516, when he was on the eve of beginning his visit to the churches. While Staupitz was still with Luther, it was told him that an indulgence merchant was making a great noise at Würzen. Even some of his extravagant sayings were quoted. Luther's indignation was roused, and he exclaimed, "Please God, I'll make a hole in his drum."

Tetzel, on his return from Berlin, where he had met with a most friendly reception from the Elector Joachim, brother of the farmer-general, took up his head quarters at Jüterboch. Staupitz, availing himself of his influence with the Elector Frederick, had often represented to him the abuses of the indulgences, and the scandalous proceedings of the mendicants; and the princes of Saxony, feeling indignant at the shameful traffic, had forbidden the merchant to enter their territory. He was, accordingly, obliged to remain on those of the Archbishop of Magdebourg, but at the same time came as near to Saxony as he could, Jüterboch being only four miles from Wittenberg. "This great thrasher of purses," says Luther, "set about thrashing the country in grand style, so that the money began to leap, tumble, and tinkle, in his chest." The people of Wittenberg went in crowds to the indulgence market of Jüterboch.

At this period Luther had the highest respect for the Church and for the pope. "I was then," said he, "a monk, a most bigoted Papist; so intoxicated and imbued with the doctrines of Rome, that if I had been able I would willingly have lent a hand in killing any one audacious enough to refuse obedience to the pope in the minutest matter. I was a real Saul, as many still are." But, at the same time, his heart was ready to declare in favour of all that he believed to be truth, and against all that he believed to be error. "I was a young doctor just off the irons, ardent and rejoicing in the word of the Lord."

One day when Luther had taken his seat in the confessional at Wittenberg, several citizens of the town came before him, and one after another confessed the grossest immoralities. Adultery, libertinism, usury, ill-gotten wealth, were the crimes with which the minister of the Word was entertained by persons of whose souls he was one day to give account. He rebukes, corrects, and instructs them; but what is his astonishment when these people tell him that they don't choose to abandon their sins? . . . Quite amazed, the pious monk declares, that since they refuse to promise amendment, he cannot give them absolution. The wretched creatures then appealed to their letters of indulgence, exhibiting them, and extolling their virtues. But Luther replied, that he cared little for the paper which they had shewn him, and added, Unless you repent, you will all perish. They made an outcry, and expostulated; but the doctor was immovable: "they must cease to do evil, and learn to do well, . . . otherwise no absolution." "Beware," added he, "of lending an ear to the harangues of the vendors of indulgences; you might be better employed than in buying those licences which are sold you for the most paltry sum."

Much alarmed, these inhabitants of Wittenberg hastened back to Tetzel to tell him how his letters were disregarded by an Augustine monk. Tetzel, on hearing this, became red with fury, crying, and stamping, and cursing in the pulpit. To strike a deeper terror into the people, he repeatedly kindled a fire in the market-place, declaring he had received orders from the pope to burn all heretics who should dare to oppose his holy indulgences.

Such is the circumstance, which was not the cause, but the first occasion of the Reformation. A pastor seeing the sheep of his flock in a path which must lead them to destruction, makes an effort to deliver them. As yet, he has no thought of reforming the Church and the world. He has seen Rome and its corruptions;

but he declares not against Rome. He perceives some of the abuses under which Christianity is groaning; but has no thought of correcting these abuses. He has no desire to become Reformer.¹ He has no plan for the reformation of the Church, any more than he had had one for himself. God intends reform, and for reform selects Luther. The same remedy which had proved so powerful in curing his own wretchedness, the hand of God will employ by him to cure the miseries of Christendom. He remains quiet in the sphere which is assigned to him, walking merely where his Master calls him; and fulfilling his duties as professor, preacher, and pastor, at Wittenberg. While seated in the church his hearers come and open their hearts to him. Evil makes an assault upon him, and error seeks him out of her own accord. He is interfered with in the discharge of his duty, and his conscience, which is bound to the Word of God, resists. Is it not God that calls him? To resist is a duty; and being a duty, is also a right. He has no alternative but to speak. In this way were events ordered by that God who was pleased, says Mathesius, "to restore Christendom by means of the son of a forge master; and to purify the impure doctrine of the Church, by making it pass through his furnaces."

Having given this detail, it must be unnecessary to refute a false imputation invented by some of Luther's enemies, but not till after his death. Jealousy for his order, it has been said,—grief at seeing a shameful and condemned traffic entrusted to the Dominicans, in preference to the Augustines, who had hitherto enjoyed it,—led the doctor of Wittenberg to attack Tetzel and his doctrines. The well known fact that this traffic was first offered to the Augustines, who refused it, is sufficient to refute this fable, which has been repeated by writers who have copied each other; even Cardinal Pallavicini states that the Augustines never had discharged this office. Besides, we have seen the travail of Luther's soul. His conduct needs no other explanation. It was impossible for him not to make open profession of the doctrine to which he owed his happiness. In Christianity, every man who finds a blessing longs to make others partakers in it. In our day it is time to abandon those puerile explanations which are unworthy of the great revolution of the sixteenth century. To lift a world, a more powerful lever was required. The Reformation existed not in Luther only; it was the offspring of his age.

Luther, impelled equally by obedience to the truth of God, and by charity towards men, mounted the pulpit. He forewarned his hearers; but, as he himself says, he did it gently. His prince had obtained particular indulgences from the pope for the church of the castle of Wittenberg, and it was possible that some of the blows which he was going to level at the indulgences in question might fall on those of the elector. No matter; he will run the risk. If he sought to please men, he would not be the servant of Christ.

"No man can prove by Scripture," says the faithful minister of the Word to the people of Wittenberg, "that the justice of God exacts a penalty or satisfaction from the sinner; the only duty which it imposes upon him is true repentance, sincere conversion, a resolution to bear the cross of Jesus Christ, and to be diligent in good works. It is a great error to think we can ourselves satisfy the justice of God for our sins. He always pardons them gratuitously by His inestimable grace.

"The Christian Church, it is true, requires something from the sinner, and consequently has the power of remitting what she so requires; but that is all. Even these indulgences of the Church are tolerated, only on account of indolent and imperfect Christians, who will not zealously exercise themselves in good works. For they stimulate none to sanctification, but leave all in imperfection."

Then adverting to the pretext under which the indulgences were published, he continues:—"It would be much better to contribute to the erection of St. Peter's church from love to God, than to purchase indulgences in this view. . . . But you ask, Are we then never to purchase them? I have already said, and I repeat it; my advice is, Don't purchase. Leave them to sleepy Christians; but do you walk apart in your own path. The faithful must be diverted from indulgences, and urged to do the works which they neglect."

At last, glancing at his adversaries, Luther concludes thus:—"If some cry out that I am a heretic, (for the truth which I preach is very hurtful to their strong box,) their clamour gives me little concern. They are dull and sickly brains; men who never felt the Bible, never read Christian doctrine, never comprehended their own teachers, and who turn to rottenness, wrapped up in the tatters of their vain opinions. . . . God grant them and us a sound mind. Amen." After these words the doctor descended from the pulpit, leaving his hearers in astonishment at his bold language.

This sermon was printed, and made a deep impression on all who read it. Tetzel answered it, and Luther replied; but these discussions did not take place till a later period, (1518.)

The feast of All Saints drew near. The chronicles of that day here relate a circumstance which, though not important to the history of the period, may, however, serve to characterize it. It is a dream of the elector, which in substance is unquestionably authentic, though several circumstances may have been added by those who have related it. It is mentioned by Seckendorf,¹ who observes, that the fear of giving their adversaries ground to say that the doctrine of Luther was founded upon dreams, has, perhaps, prevented several historians from speaking of it.

The Elector Frederick of Saxony (say the chronicles of the time) was at his castle of Schweinitz, six leagues from Wittenberg. On the morning of the 31st October,—being in company with his brother, Duke John, who was then co-regent, and became sole elector after his death, and with his chancellor,—the elector said to the duke, "Brother, I must tell you a dream which I had last night, and the meaning of which I should like much to know. It is so deeply impressed on my mind, that I will never forget it, were I to live a thousand years. For I dreamed it thrice, and each time with new circumstances."

Duke John.—"Is it a good or a bad dream?"

The Elector.—"I know not; God knows."

Duke John.—"Don't be uneasy at it; but be so good as tell it to me."

The Elector.—"Having gone to bed last night, fatigued and out of spirits, I fell asleep shortly after my prayer, and slept quietly for about two hours and a-half; I then awoke, and continued awake till midnight—all sorts of thoughts passing through my mind. Among other things, I thought how I was to observe the feast of All Saints. I prayed for the poor souls in purgatory; and supplicated God to guide me, my counsels, and my people, according to truth. I again fell asleep, and then dreamed that Almighty God sent me a monk, who was a true son of the Apostle Paul. All the saints accompanied him by order of God, in order to bear testimony before me, and to declare that he did not come to contrive any plot; but that all that he did was according to the will of God. They asked me to have the goodness graciously to permit him to write something on the door of the church of the castle of Wittenberg. This I granted through my chancellor. Thereupon the monk went to the church, and began to write in such large characters, that I could read the writing at Schweinitz. The pen which he used was so large, that its end reached as far as Rome, where it pierced the ears of a lion that was couching there, and caused the triple crown upon the head of the pope to shake. All the cardinals and princes, running hastily up, tried to prevent it from falling. You and I, brother, wished also to assist, and I stretched out my arm; . . . but at this moment I awoke, with my arm in the air, quite amazed, and very much enraged at the monk for not managing his pen better. I recollected myself a little: it was only a dream.

"I was still half asleep, and once more closed my eyes. The dream returned. The lion, still amoyed by the pen, began to roar with all his might, so much so that the whole city of Rome, and all the states of the holy empire, ran to see what the matter was. The pope requested them to oppose this monk, and applied particularly to me, on account of his being in my country. I again awoke, repeated the Lord's Prayer, entreated God to preserve his Holiness, and once more fell asleep.

"Then I dreamed that all the princes of the empire, and we among them, hastened to Rome, and strove, one after another, to break the pen; but the more we tried, the stiffer it became—sounding as if it had been made of iron. We at length desisted. I then asked the monk (for I was sometimes at Rome, and sometimes at Wittenberg) where he got this pen, and why it was so strong. 'The pen,' replied he, 'belonged to an old goose of Bohemia—a hundred years old.' I got it from one of my old schoolmasters. As to its strength, it is owing to the impossibility of depriving it of its pith or marrow; and I am quite astonished at it myself.' Suddenly I heard a loud noise,—a large number of other pens had sprung out of the long pen of the monk. . . . I awoke a third time: it was daylight. . . ."

¹ John Huss. This circumstance may, perhaps, have been afterwards added, in allusion to the saying of John Huss, which we have quoted. See the First Book.

¹ And in a manuscript of the Archives of Weimar, taken down from the statement of Spalatin. Our account of the dream is conformable to this manuscript, which was re-published at the last jubilee of the Reformation, 1817.

Duke John.—"Chancellor, what is your opinion? Would we had a Joseph or a Daniel enlightened by God!"

Chancellor.—"Your highnesses know the common proverb, that the dreams of young girls, learned men, and great lords, have usually some hidden meaning. The meaning of this dream, however, we will not be able to know for some time,—not till the things to which it relates have taken place. Wherefore, leave the accomplishment to God, and place it wholly in his hand."

Duke John.—"I am of your opinion, Chancellor; 'tis not fit for us to annoy ourselves in attempting to discover the meaning; the God will overrule all for His glory."

Elector.—"May our faithful God do so; yet I will never forget this dream. I have indeed thought of an interpretation, but I kept it to myself. Time, perhaps, will shew if I have been a good diviner."

Thus, according to the manuscript of Weimar, the morning of 31st of October was spent at Schweinitz. Let us see how the evening was spent at Wittenberg. We again return to the province of history.

CHAPTER V.

Feast of All Saints—The Theses—Their Force—Moderation—Providence—Letter to Albert—Indifference of the Bishops—Dissemination of the Theses.

THE words of Luther had produced little effect. Tetzel, without troubling himself, continued his traffic and his impious harangues. Will Luther submit to these crying abuses, and keep silence? As a pastor, he has earnestly exhorted those who have had recourse to his ministry; and, as a preacher, he has lifted his warning voice in the pulpit. It still remains for him to speak as a theologian—to address, not individuals in the confessional, not the assembly of the faithful in the church of Wittenberg; but all who, like himself, are teachers of the Word of God. His resolution is taken.

He has no thought of attacking the Church, or of putting the pope on his defence. On the contrary, it is his respect for the pope that will not allow him to be any longer silent with regard to claims by which he is injured. He must take the part of the pope against audacious men, who dare to associate his venerable name with their disgraceful traffic. Far from thinking of a revolution which is to destroy the primacy of Rome, Luther expects to have the pope and Catholicism for his allies against impudent monks.

The feast of All Saints was an important day for Wittenberg, and especially for the church which the elector had there erected and filled with relics. On that day these relics, adorned with silver and gold, and precious stones, were brought out and exhibited to the eyes of the people, who were astonished and dazzled by their magnificence. Whoever on that day visited the church, and confessed in it, obtained a valuable indulgence. Accordingly, on this great occasion, pilgrims came in crowds to Wittenberg.

On the 31st of October, 1517, Luther, who had already taken his resolution, walks boldly towards the church to which the superstitious crowds of pilgrims were repairing, and puts up on the door of this church ninety-five theses or propositions against the doctrine of indulgences. Neither the elector, nor Staupitz, nor Spalatin, nor any, even the most intimate of his friends, had been previously informed of this step. In these theses, Luther declares, in a kind of preamble, that he had written them with the express desire of setting the truth in the full light of day. He declares himself ready to defend them on the morrow at the university, against all and sundry. The attention which they excite is great; they are read and repeated. In a short time the pilgrims, the university, the whole town is ringing with them. The following are some of these propositions, written with the pen of the monk, and fixed on the door of the church of Wittenberg:—

1. "When our Lord and Master Jesus Christ says 'repent,' He means that the whole life of His followers on the earth is a constant and continual repentance.

2. "This expression cannot be understood of the sacrament of penitence,—that is to say, of confession and satisfaction,—as administered by the priest.

3. "Still the Lord intends not to speak merely of internal repentance. Internal repentance is null, if it does not manifest itself externally by the mortification of the flesh.

4. "Repentance and sorrow—that is to say, true penitence—continue so long as a man is displeased with himself; that is, until he passes from this life into life eternal.

5. "The pope is not able, and does not wish to remit any other penalty than that which he has imposed of his own good pleasure, or conformably to the canons,—that is to say, the papal ordinances.

6. "The pope cannot remit any condemnation, but only declare and confirm the remission which God himself has given. At least, he can only do it in cases which belong to him. If he does otherwise, the condemnation remains exactly as before.

8. "The laws of ecclesiastical penance ought to be imposed on the living only, and have nothing to do with the dead.

21. "The commissaries of indulgence are mistaken when they say that the pope's indulgence delivers from all punishment, and saves.

25. "The same power which the pope has over purgatory throughout the Church, each bishop has individually in his own diocese, and each curate in his own parish.

27. "It is the preaching of human folly to pretend, that at the very moment when the money tinkles in the strong box, the soul flies off from purgatory.

28. "This much is certain, as soon as the money tinkles, avarice and the love of gain arrive, increase, and multiply. But the aids and prayers of the Church depend only on the will and good pleasure of God.

32. "Those who imagine they are sure of salvation by means of indulgences, will go to the devil, with those who teach them so.

33. "It is an antichristian doctrine to pretend, that, in order to deliver a soul from purgatory, or to purchase an indulgence, there is no need of either sorrow or repentance.

34. "Every Christian who truly repents of his sins has entire forgiveness of the penalty and the fault; and, so far, has no need of indulgence.

35. "Every true Christian, dead or alive, participates in all the blessings of Christ and of the Church by the gift of God, and without a letter of indulgence.

36. "Still the dispensation and pardon of the pope must not be despised; for his pardon is a declaration of the pardon of God.

37. "Genuine sorrow and repentance seek, and love punishment; but the mildness of indulgence takes off the fear of punishment, and begets hatred against it.

38. "Christians must be told that the pope has no wish and no intention that they should, in any respect, compare the act of purchasing indulgences with any work of mercy.

39. "Christians must be told that he who gives to the poor, or lends to the needy, does better than he who buys an indulgence:

40. "For the work of charity makes charity increase, and renders a man more pious; whereas, the indulgence does not make him better, but only gives him more self-confidence, and makes him more secure against punishment.

41. "Christians must be told that he who sees his neighbour want, and, instead of helping him, purchases an indulgence, purchases not the indulgence of the pope; but incurs the Divine displeasure.

42. "Christians must be told that if they have no superfluity, they are bound to keep what they have, in order to procure necessaries for their families, and not to lavish it on indulgences.

43. "Christians must be told that to purchase an indulgence is optional, not obligatory.

44. "Christians must be told that the pope, having more need of prayer offered up in faith than of money, desires the prayer more than the money when he dispenses indulgences.

45. "Christians must be told that the indulgence of the pope is good, provided they do not place their confidence in it; but that nothing is more hurtful if it diminishes piety.

46. "Christians must be told that if the pope knew of the extortions of the preachers of indulgences, he would rather that the metropolis of St. Peter were burned and reduced to ashes, than see it built with the skin, flesh, and bones, of his sheep.

47. "Christians must be told that the pope, as is his duty, would dispense his own money to the poor people whom the preachers of indulgences are now robbing of their last penny, were he, for that purpose, even to sell the metropolis of St. Peter.

48. "To hope to be saved by indulgences is an empty and lying hope, even should the commissary of indulgences—nay, the pope himself—be pleased to pledge his own soul in security of it.

49. "Those who, on account of the preaching of indulgences, forbid the preaching of the Word of God, are enemies of the pope and of Jesus Christ.

50. "The pope cannot have any other thought than this: If the indulgence, which is the lesser matter, is celebrated with bell, pomp, and ceremony, it is necessary, a fortiori, to honour and celebrate the Gospel, which is the greater matter, with a hundred bells, a hundred pomps, and a hundred ceremonies.

51. "The true and precious treasure of the Church is the holy Gospel of the glory and grace of God.

52. "The treasures of the Gospel are nets, which once caught the rich, and those who were at ease in their circumstances:

53. "But the treasures of indulgence are nets, in which, now-a-days, they catch not rich people, but the riches of people.

54. "It is the duty of bishops and pastors to receive the commissaries of apostolic indulgences with all respect:

55. "But it is still more their duty to use their eyes and their ears, in order to see that the said commissaries do not preach the dreams of their own imaginations, instead of the orders of the pope.

56. "Cursed be he who speaketh against the indulgence of the pope.

57. "But blessed be he who speaks against the foolish and impudent words of the preachers of indulgences.

58. "The indulgence of the pope cannot take away the smallest daily sin, in regard to the fault or delinquency.

59. "To say that a cross adorned with the arms of the pope is as powerful as the cross of Christ, is blasphemy.

60. "Bishops, pastors, and theologians, who allow such things to be said to the people, will be called to account for it.

61. "This shameful preaching, these impudent eulogiums on indulgences, make it difficult for the learned to defend the dignity and honour of the pope against the calumnies of the preachers, and the subtle and puzzling questions of the common people.

62. "Why, say they, does not the pope, whose wealth is greater than that of rich Cæsar, build the metropolis of St. Peter with his own money, rather than with that of poor Christians?

63. "Would, then, that we were dismembered of all the preachers who say to the Church of Christ, Peace! Peace! when there is no peace!

64. "Christians should be exhorted to diligence in following Christ their head through crosses, death, and hell.

65. "For it is far better to enter the kingdom of heaven through much tribulation, than to acquire a carnal security by the flattery of a false peace."

Here, then, was the commencement of the work. The germ of the Reformation was contained in these theses of Luther. The abuses of indulgence were attacked in them, (and this was their most striking feature;) but behind those attacks there was, moreover, a principle which, although it attracted the attention of the multitude far less, was destined one day to overthrow the edifice of the papacy. The evangelical doctrine of a free and gratuitous remission of sins was here publicly professed, for the first time. Henceforth the work must grow. In fact, it was evident that any man who had faith in the remission of sins, as preached by the doctor of Wittenberg,—any one who had this conversion and sanctification, the necessity of which he urged,—would no longer concern himself about human ordinances; but would escape from the swaddling-bands of Rome, and secure the liberty of the children of God. All errors behoved to give way before this truth. By it light had at first entered Luther's own mind; and by it, in like manner, light is to be diffused in the Church. What previous reformers wanted was a clear knowledge of this truth; and hence the unfruitfulness of their labours. Luther himself was afterwards aware that, in proclaiming justification by faith, he had laid the axe to the root of the tree. "This is the doctrine," said he, "which we attack in the followers of the papacy. Huss and Wickliffe only attacked their lives; but in attacking their doctrine, we take the goose by the neck. All depends on the Word which the pope took from us and falsified. I have vanquished the pope, because my doctrine is according to God, and his is according to the devil."

We, too, have, in our day, forgotten the capital doctrine of justification by faith, though, in a sense, the reverse of that of our fathers. "In the time of Luther," says one of our contemporaries, "the remission of sins at least cost money; but in our day every one supplies himself gratis." These two extremes are very much alike. Perhaps there is even more forgetfulness of God in our extreme, than in that of the sixteenth century. The principle of justification by the grace of God, which brought the Church out of so much darkness at the time of the Reformation, is also the only principle which can renew our generation, put an end to its doubts and waverings, destroy the canker of egotism, establish the reign of morality and justice, and, in one word, reunite the world to God, from whom it has been separated.

But if the theses of Luther were mighty in virtue of the truth which they proclaimed, they were not less so through the faith of their declared defender. He had boldly unsheathed the sword of the Word, and he had done it trusting to the power of truth. He had felt, that in leaning on the promises of God he could, in the language of the world, afford to risk something. Speaking of this bold attack, he says, "Let him who would begin a good enterprise undertake it, trusting to its own merits, and not (of this let him beware) to the help and countenance of man. Moreover, let not men, nor even the whole world, deter him. For these words will never deceive: 'It is good to trust in the Lord; and none that trust in Him shall be confounded.' But let him who neither is able nor willing to hazard something through trust in God, beware of undertaking anything." Doubtless, Luther, after putting up his theses on the door of the church of All Saints, retired to his tranquil cell, in full possession of the peace and joy imparted by an action done in the name of the Lord, and for the sake of eternal truth.

These theses, notwithstanding of their great boldness, still bespeak the monk, who refuses to allow a single doubt as to the authority of the See of Rome.

But in attacking the doctrine of indulgences, Luther had, without perceiving it, assailed several errors, the exposure of which could not be agreeable to the pope, seeing that they tended, sooner or later, to bring his supremacy in question. Luther, at the time, did not see so far; but he felt all the boldness of the step which he had just taken, and, consequently, thought himself bound to temper it in so far as was consistent with the respect due to truth. He, accordingly, presented his theses only as doubtful propositions, on which he was anxious for the views of the learned; and, conformably to the established custom, annexed to them a solemn protestation, declaring that he wished not to say or affirm anything not founded on Holy Scripture, the Fathers of the Church, and the rights and decretals of the See of Rome.

Often, in the sequel, on contemplating the immense and unlooked-for consequences of this courageous attack, Luther was astonished at himself, and could not understand how he had ventured upon it. An invisible hand, mightier than his own, held the leading reins, and pushed him into a path which he knew not, and from the difficulties of which he would, perhaps, have recoiled, if he had known them, and been advancing alone and of himself. "I engaged in this dispute," says he, "without premeditated purpose, without knowing it or wishing it; and was taken quite unprepared. For the truth of this I appeal to the Searcher of hearts."

Luther had become acquainted with the source of these abuses. He had received a little book, ornamented with the arms of the Archbishop of Mentz and Magdebourg, and containing the regulations to be observed in the sale of indulgences. It was this young prelate, therefore,—this accomplished prince,—who had prescribed, or at least sanctioned, all this quackery. In him Luther only sees a superior, to whom he owes fear and reverence; and wishing not to beat the air, but to address those entrusted with the government of the Church, he sends him a letter, distinguished at once by its frankness and humility. Luther wrote this letter to Albert the same day on which he put up his theses.

"Pardon me, most reverend Father in Christ, and most illustrious Prince," says he to him, "if I, who am only the dregs of mankind, have the presumption to write your High Mightiness. The Lord Jesus is my witness, that, feeling how small and despicable I am, I have long put off doing it. . . . Will your Highness, however, be pleased to let fall a look on a grain of dust, and, in accordance with your episcopal meekness, graciously receive my petition.

"There are people who are carrying the papal indulgence up and down the country in the name of your Grace. I do not so much blame the declamation of the preachers, (I have not heard them,) as the erroneous ideas of unlearned and simple people, who imagine that by buying indulgences they secure their salvation. . . .

"Good God!—souls entrusted to your care, most venerable Father, are conducted to death, and not to life. The just and strict account which will be required of you grows and augments from day to day. . . . I have not been able to continue longer silent.

Ah! man is not saved by works, or by the performances of his bishop. . . . Even the righteous scarcely is saved; and the way that leadeth unto life is strait. Why, then, do the preachers of indulgences by vain fables inspire the people with a false security?

"According to them, indulgence alone ought to be proclaimed, ought to be extolled. . . . What!—Is it not the chief and only duty of bishops to instruct the people in the Gospel and the love of Jesus Christ? Jesus Christ has nowhere ordered the preaching of indulgence; but has strongly enjoined the preaching of the Gospel. How dreadful, then, and how perilous, for a bishop to allow the Gospel to be passed in silence, and nothing but the sound of indulgence to be incessantly dunned into the ears of his people. . . .

"Most worthy Father in God, in the instruction of the commissaries, which has been published in name of your Grace, (doubtless without your knowledge,) it is said that the indulgence is the most precious treasure,—that it reconciles man to God, and enables those who purchase it to dispense with repentance.

"What, then, can I, what ought I to do, most venerable Bishop, most serene Prince? Ah! I supplicate your Highness, by the Lord Jesus Christ, to turn upon this business an eye of paternal vigilance, to suppress the pamphlet entirely, and ordain preachers to deliver a different sort of discourses to the people. If you decline to do so, be assured you will one day hear some voice raised in refutation of these preachers, to the great dishonour of your most serene Highness."

Luther at the same time sent his theses to the archbishop, and, in a postscript, asked him to read them, that he might be convinced how little foundation there was for the doctrine of indulgences.

Thus Luther's whole desire was, that the watchmen of the Church should awake, and exert themselves in putting an end to the evils which were laying it waste. Nothing could be more noble and more respectful than this letter from a monk to one of the greatest princes of the Church and the empire. Never was there a better exemplification of the spirit of our Saviour's precept, "Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and unto God the things which are God's." This is not the course of violent revolutionists, who condemn powers and blame dignities. It is a cry proceeding from the conscience of a Christian and a priest, who gives honour to all; but, in the first place, fears God. However, all prayers and supplications were useless. Young Albert, engrossed by his pleasures and ambitious designs, made no reply to this solemn appeal. The Bishop of Brandebourg, Luther's ordinary,—a learned and pious man, to whom, also, he sent his theses,—replied, that he was attacking the power of the Church—that he would involve himself in great trouble and vexation—that the thing was beyond his strength—and that his earnest advice to him was to keep quiet. The princes of the Church shut their ears against the voice of God, thus energetically and affectingly declared by the instrumentality of Luther. They would not comprehend the signs of the times; they were struck with that blindness which has been the ruin of so many powers and dignities. "Both thought," says Luther afterwards, "that the pope would be too many for a miserable mendicant like me."

But Luther was better able than the bishops to perceive the disastrous effects which the indulgences had upon the manners and lives of the people; for he was in direct correspondence with them. He had constantly a near view of what the bishops learned only by unfaithful reports. If the bishops failed him, God did not fail him. The Head of the Church, who sits in heaven, and to whom has been given all power upon the earth, had himself prepared the ground, and deposited the grain in the hands of His servant. He gave wings to the seed of truth, and sent it in an instant over the whole length and breadth of His Church.

Nobody appeared at the university next day to attack the propositions of Luther. The traffic of Tetzel was too much in discredit, and too disgraceful for any other than himself, or some one of his creatures, to dare to take up the gauntlet. But these theses were destined to be heard in other places than under the roof of an academical hall. Scarcely had they been nailed to the door of the castle church of Wittenberg, than the feeble strokes of the hammer were followed throughout Germany by a blow which reached even to the foundations of proud Rome, threatening sudden ruin to the walls, the gates, and the pillars of the papacy, stunning and terrifying its champions, and, at the same time, awakening thousands from the sleep of error.

These theses spread with the rapidity of lightning. A month had not elapsed before they were at Rome. "In a fortnight," says a contemporary historian,¹ "they were in every part of Germany, and in four weeks had traversed almost the whole of Christendom; as if the angels themselves had been the messengers, and carried them before the eyes of all men. Nobody can believe what a noise they made." They were afterwards translated into Dutch and Spanish, and a traveller even sold them at Jerusalem. "Every one," says Luther, "was complaining of the indulgences; and as all the bishops and doctors had kept silence, and nobody had ventured to bell the cat, poor Luther became a famous doctor, because, as they expressed it, one had at length come who dared to do it. But I liked not this glory; the music seemed to me too lofty for the words."

Some of the pilgrims who had flocked from different countries to Wittenberg for the feast of All Saints, instead of indulgences, carried home with them the famous theses of the Augustine monk, and thus helped to circulate them. All read, pondered, and commented on them. They occupied the attention of all convents and all universities. All pious monks who had entered the cloister to save their soul, all upright and honest men, rejoiced in this striking and simple confession of the truth, and wished with all their heart that Luther would continue the work which he had begun. At length a monk had had the courage to undertake this perilous contest. It was a reparation made to Christendom, and the public conscience was satisfied. In these theses piety saw a blow given to all kinds of superstition; the new theology hailed in them the defeat of the scholastic dogmas; princes and magistrates regarded them as a barrier raised against the encroachments of ecclesiastical power; while the nations were delighted at seeing the decided negative which this monk had given to the avarice of the Roman chancery. Erasmus, a man very worthy of credit, and one of the principal rivals of the reformer, says to Duke George of Saxony,—“When Luther attacked this fable, the whole world concurred in applauding him.” “I observe,” said he, on another occasion, to Cardinal Campeggi, “that those of the purest morals, and an evangelical piety, are the least opposed to Luther. His life is lauded even by those who cannot bear his faith. The world was weary of a doctrine containing so many childish fables, and was thirsting for that living water, pure and hidden, which issues from the springs of the evangelists and the apostles. The genius of Luther was fitted to accomplish these things, and his zeal must have animated him to the noble enterprise.”

We must follow these propositions wherever they penetrated,—to the studies of the learned, the cells of monks, and the palaces of princes,—in order to form some idea of the various, but wonderful effects which they produced in Germany.

Reuchlin received them. He was weary of the hard battle which he had been obliged to fight against the monks. The power which the new combatant displayed in his theses revived the spirit of the old champion of letters, and gave joy to his saddened heart. “Thanks be to God,” exclaimed he, after he had read them, “now they have found a man who will give them so much to do, that they will be obliged to let me end my old age in peace.”

The prudent Erasmus was in the Netherlands when the theses reached him. He was inwardly delighted at seeing his secret wishes for the reformation of abuses expressed with so much boldness, and commended their author, only exhorting him to more moderation and prudence. Nevertheless, some persons in his presence blaming Luther's violence, he said, “God has given men a cure which cuts thus deep into the flesh, because otherwise the disease would be incurable.” And at a later period, when the Elector of Saxony asked his opinion as to Luther's affair, he replied, with a smile, “I am not at all astonished at his having made so much noise, for he has committed two unpardonable faults,—he has attacked the tiara of the pope, and the belly of the monks.”

Dr. Flek, prior of the cloister of Steinlausitz, had for some time given up reading mass; but had not told any one his reason. He one day found the theses of Luther posted up in the refectory of his convent. He went up and began to read them, but had only perused a few, when, unable to contain his joy, he exclaimed, “Well, well, he whom we have been so long looking for is come at last; and this you monks will see.”

Then reading in the future, says Mathesius, and playing upon the word Wittenberg, he said, “Everybody will come to seek wisdom at this mountain, and will find it.” He wrote to the doctor to persevere courageously in his glorious combat. Luther calls him a man full of joy and consolation.

The ancient and celebrated episcopal see of Würzburg was then held by Lorenzo de Bibra, a man, according to the testimony of his contemporaries, pious, honest, and wise. When a gentleman came to intimate to him that he intended his daughter for the cloister, “Give her rather a husband,” said he; and then added, “Are you in want of money for that purpose? I will lend you.” The emperor and all the princes held him in the highest esteem. He lamented the disorders of the Church, and especially those of convents. The theses having reached his palace also, he read them with great delight, and publicly declared his approbation of Luther. At a later period he wrote to the Elector Frederick, “Don't part with pious Dr. Martin Luther; for he has been wronged.” The elector, delighted at this testimony, wrote the reformer with his own hand to acquaint him with it.

The Emperor Maximilian, predecessor of Charles V., also read and admired the theses of the monk of Wittenberg. He perceived his talents, and foresaw that this obscure Augustine might, indeed, become a powerful ally of Germany in her struggle with Rome. Accordingly, he instructed his envoy to say to the Elector of Saxony, “Take good care of the monk Luther, for the time may come when we shall have need of him;” and shortly after, being at a diet with Pfeffinger, the elector's confidential councillor, he said to him, “Well, what is your Augustine doing? Assuredly his propositions are not to be despised; he will give the monks enough to do.”

At Rome even, and in the Vatican, the theses were not so ill received as might have been supposed. Leo X. judged of them as a friend of letters, rather than a pope. The amusement which they gave him made him overlook the severe truths which they contained; and when Sylvester Prierias, the master of the sacred palace, who had the office of examining new works, urged him to treat Luther as a heretic, he replied, “This friar, Martin Luther, is a great genius; all that is said against him is mere monkish jealousy.”

There were few on whom the theses of Luther produced a deeper impression than on the scholar of Annaberg, whom Tetzel had so pitilessly repulsed. Myconius had entered a convent, and the very first evening dreamed he saw an immense field quite covered with ripe corn. “Cut,” said the voice of his guide to him; and when he excused himself for want of skill, his guide shewed him a reaper, who was working with inconceivable rapidity. “Follow, and do like him,” said the guide. Myconius, eager for holiness as Luther had been, devoted himself, when in the convent, to vigils, fasts, macerations, and all the works invented by men; but at length he despaired of ever attaining the objects of his efforts. He abandoned study, and spent his whole time in manual labour. Sometimes he bound books, sometimes used the turning-lathe, and sometimes did any other kind of work. Still, however, this external labour did not appease his troubled conscience. God had spoken to him, and he could not fall back into his former slumber. This state of agony lasted for several years. It is sometimes supposed that the paths of the reformers were quite smooth, and that after they renounced the observances of the Church, their remaining course was easy and pleasant. It is not considered that they arrived at the truth by means of internal struggles, a thousand times more painful than the observances to which servile minds easily submitted.

At length the year 1517 arrived. The theses of Luther were published, and, traversing Christendom, arrived also at the convent where the scholar of Annaberg was residing. He hid himself in a corner of the cloister, with John Voit, another monk, that they might be able to read them without interruption. They contained the very truth of which his father had told him. His eyes were opened, he felt a voice within him responding to that which was then sounding throughout Germany, and great consolation filled his heart. "I see plainly," said he, "that Martin Luther is the reaper whom I saw in my dream, and who taught me to gather the ears of corn." He immediately began to profess the doctrine which Luther had proclaimed. The monks, alarmed when they heard him, argued with him, and declaimed against Luther and against his convent. "That convent," replied Myconius, "is like our Lord's sepulchre; they wish to prevent Christ from rising again, but will not succeed." At last his superior, seeing they could not convince him, interdicted him for a year and a-half from all intercourse with the world, not permitting him even to write or to receive letters, and threatening him with perpetual imprisonment. However, for him also the hour of deliverance arrived. Being afterwards appointed pastor at Zwickau, he was the first who declared against the papacy in the churches of Thuringia. "Then," says he, "I could work with my venerable father Luther at the Gospel harvest." Jonas describes him as a man as able as he was willing.

Doubtless there were others also to whom Luther's theses were the signal of life. They kindled a new light in many cells, cottages, and palaces. "While those who had entered convents in quest of good fare and indolence, or rank and honours," says Mathesius, "began to load the name of Luther with reproaches,—the monks who lived in prayer, fasting, and mortification, thanked God as soon as they heard the cry of the eagle, announced by John Huss a century before." Even the people who did not well understand the theology of the question, and who only knew that Luther was assailing the empire of mendicants and lazy monks, received it with bursts of joy. An immense sensation was produced in Germany by his bold propositions. However, some of the reformer's contemporaries, who foresaw the consequences to which they might lead, and the numerous obstacles which they were destined to encounter, loudly expressed their fears, or, at most, rejoiced with trembling.

"I am much afraid," wrote the excellent canon of Augsburg, Bernard Adelman, to his friend Pirckheimer, "that the worthy man must yield at last to the avarice and power of the partizans of indulgences. His representations have had so little effect, that the Bishop of Augsburg, our primate and metropolitan, has just ordered new indulgences, in the name of the pope, for St. Peter's at Rome. Let him hasten to seek the aid of princes. Let him beware of tempting God; for it were to shew an absolute want of sense to overlook the imminent danger to which he is exposed." Adelman was greatly delighted when it was rumoured that Henry VIII. had invited Luther to England. "There," thought he, "he will be able to teach the truth in peace." Several thus imagined that the doctrine of the Gospel was to be supported by the power of princes, not knowing that it advances without this power, and is often trammelled and weakened by the possession of it.

The celebrated historian, Albert Kranz, was at Hamburg on his deathbed when Luther's theses were brought to him. "You are right, friar Martin," he exclaimed; "but you will not succeed. . . . Poor monk! Go into your cell and cry, 'Lord, have mercy on me!'"

An old priest of Hexter in Westphalia, having received and read the theses in his presbytery, said in low German, shaking his head, "Dear friar Martin! if you succeed in overthrowing this purgatory and all these paper merchants, assuredly you are a mighty seignior!" Erbenius, a century later, wrote beneath these words the following stanza:—

"Quid vero nunc si viveret, Bonus iste clericus diceret?"
"What, then, would the good clerk say,
Were he alive to see this day?"

Not only did many of Luther's friends entertain fears as to the step which he had taken, but several even testified their disapprobation.

The Bishop of Brandenburg, distressed at seeing his diocese the scene of so important a contest, was anxious to suppress it. He resolved to take the gentle method, and employed the Abbot of Lenin to say to Luther, in his name, "I don't find anything in the theses contradictory of Catholic truth. I myself condemn these indiscreet proclamations; but for the love of peace and deference to your bishop, cease writing on the subject." Luther was confounded at being thus humbly addressed by so great an abbot and so great a bishop, and, led away by the feelings of the moment, replied, "I consent. I would rather obey than work miracles, were it in my power."

The elector was grieved at the commencement of a contest which was, no doubt, legitimate; but the end of which it was impossible to foresee. No prince was more desirous than Frederick for the maintenance of public peace. Now, what an immense fire might this small spark not kindle! What discord, what rending of nations, might this quarrel of monks not produce! The elector repeatedly made Luther aware how much he was annoyed.

Even in his own order, and his own convent of Wittenberg, Luther met with disapprobation. The prior and sub-prior, terrified at the clamour of Tetzl and his companions, repaired in fear and trembling to the cell of friar Martin, and said, "Do not, we entreat you, bring shame on our order. The other orders, and especially the Dominicans, are overjoyed to think that they are not to be alone in disgrace." Luther was moved by these words, but soon recovering himself, he replied: "Dear fathers, if the thing is not done in the name of God, it will fail; but if it is, let it proceed." The prior and sub-prior said no more. "The thing proceeds even now," adds Luther, after relating this anecdote, "and, please God, always will proceed better and better, even to the end. Amen."

Luther had many other attacks to sustain. At Erfurt he was accused of violence and pride in his manner of condemning the opinions of others—the charge usually brought against those who act under the strong conviction which the word of God gives. He was also charged with precipitation and fickleness.

"They call upon me for moderation," replied Luther, "and they themselves, in the judgment which they pass upon me, trample it under foot! . . . We see the mote in our brother's eye, and observe not the beam in our own. . . . Truth will no more gain by my moderation, than it will lose by my presumption. I desire to know," continued he, addressing Lange, "what errors you and your theologians have found in my theses? Who knows not that a new idea is seldom advanced without an appearance of arrogance, and an accusation of disputatiousness? Were humility herself to undertake something new, those of an opposite opinion would charge her with pride. Why were Christ and all the martyrs put to death? Because they were deemed proud despisers of the wisdom of the time, and advanced new truths without previously taking counsel of the organs of ancient opinion."

"Let not the wise of the present day, then, expect of me humility, or rather hypocrisy enough, to ask their opinion before publishing what duty calls me to say. What I do will be done, not by the prudence of men, but by the counsel of God. If the work is of God, who can arrest it? If it is not of God, who can advance it? Not my will, nor theirs, nor ours, but Thy will be done, O Holy Father, who art in heaven!" In these words what courage, what noble enthusiasm, what confidence in God; and, above all, what truth—truth fitted to all times!

Still, the reproaches and accusations which assailed Luther from all quarters, failed not to make some impression on his mind. His hopes were disappointed. He had expected to see the heads of the Church, and the most distinguished scholars of the nation, publicly uniting with him; but it was otherwise. A word of approbation, allowed to escape at the first moment of enthusiasm, was all that the best disposed gave him; while several of those whom he had till then most highly venerated, were loud in censuring him. He felt himself alone in the whole Church—alone against Rome—alone at the foot of that ancient and formidable edifice, whose foundations lay deep in the bowels of the earth, whose battlements reached the clouds, and at which he had just struck a daring blow. He was troubled and depressed. Doubts, which he thought he had surmounted, returned with new force. He trembled at the thought of having the authority of the whole Church against him, of withdrawing from that authority, and resisting that voice which nations and ages had humbly obeyed,—of setting himself in opposition to that Church which he had from infancy been accustomed to venerate as the mother of the faithful. . . . He, a paltry monk, . . . the effort was too great for man. No step cost him more than this, and, accordingly, it was the step which decided the Reformation.

The struggle which took place in his soul cannot be better described than in his own words. "I began this affair," says he, "with great fear and trembling. Who was I, a poor, miserable, despicable friar, like a corpse than a living man,—who was I, to oppose the majesty of the pope, before whom not only the kings of the earth and the whole world, but also (if I may so speak) heaven and hell trembled, compelled to yield obedience to his nod? Nobody can imagine what my heart suffered during those two first years, and into what depression—I might say what despair—I was often plunged. No idea of it can be formed by those proud spirits who afterwards attacked the pope with great boldness, although with all their ability they could not have done him the least harm, had not Jesus Christ, by me, his feeble and unworthy instrument, given him a wound which never will be cured. But while they were contented to look on, and leave me alone in danger, I was not so joyful, so tranquil, or so sure about the business; for at that time I did not know many things which, thank God, I know now. It is true, several pious Christians were much pleased with my propositions, and set a great value upon them, but I could not own and regard them as the organs of the Holy Spirit. I looked only to the pope, the cardinals, bishops, theologians, juriconsults, monks, and priests. That was the direction from which I expected the Spirit to come. Still having, by means of Scripture, come off victorious over all contrary arguments, I have at length, by the grace of Christ, though after much pain, travail, and anguish, surmounted the only argument which arrested me,—viz., that it is necessary to listen to the Church; for, from the bottom of my heart, I honoured the church of the pope as the true Church; and did so with much more sincerity and veneration than those shameless and infamous corrupters who are now so very forward in opposing me. Had I despised the pope as much as he is despised in the hearts of those who praise him so loudly with their lips, I would have dreaded that the earth would instantly open and swallow me up, as it did Korah and his company!"

How honourable these misgivings are to Luther! How well they display the sincerity and uprightness of his soul! And how much more worthy of respect do those painful assaults which he had to sustain, both within and without, prove him to be, than mere intrepidity without any such struggle, could have done! The travail of his soul clearly displays the truth and divinity of his work. We see that their origin and principle were in heaven. After all the facts which we have stated, who will presume to say that the Reformation was an affair of politics? No, assuredly; it was not the effect of human policy, but of the power of God. Had Luther been urged by human passions only, he would have yielded to his fears; his miscalculations and scruples would have smothered the fire which had been kindled in his soul, and he would only have thrown a transient gleam upon the Church, in the same way as the many zealous and pious men whose names have come down to us. But now God's time had arrived; the work was not to be arrested; the emancipation of the Church was to be accomplished. Luther was destined at least to prepare that complete emancipation, and those extensive developments which are promised to the kingdom of Christ. Accordingly, he experienced the truth of the magnificent promise: "The strong men shall faint and be weary, and the young men utterly fail; but they who wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings like eagles." This Divine power which filled the heart of the doctor of Wittemberg, and which had engaged him in the combat, soon gave him back all his former resolution.

CHAPTER VII.

Tetzel's Attack—Luther's Reply—Good Works—Luther and Spalatin—Study of Scripture—Scheurl and Luther—Doubts on the Theses—Luther for the People—A New Suit.

THE reproaches, timidity, or silence, of Luther's friends had discouraged him; the attacks of his enemies had the very opposite effect. This frequently happens. The adversaries of the truth, while thinking by their violence to do their own work, often do that of God himself. The gauntlet which had been thrown down was taken up by Tetzel with a feeble hand. Luther's sermon, which had been to the people what his theses had been to the learned, was the subject of his first reply. He refuted it point by point in his own way, and then announced that he was preparing to combat his adversary at greater length in theses, which he would maintain at the University of Frankfort on the Oder. "Then," said he, adverting to the conclusion of Luther's sermon,—“then every one will be able to judge who is heresiarch, heretic, schismatic, erroneous, rash, and calumnious. Then will it be manifest to the eyes of all who has a dull brain, who has never felt the Bible, read Christian doctrines, understood his own teachers. . . . In maintaining the propositions which I advance, I am ready to suffer all things, prison, cudgel, water, and fire.”

One thing which strikes us in reading this production of Tetzel, is the difference between his German and that of Luther. One would say that an interval of several ages is between them. A foreigner, especially, sometimes finds it difficult to comprehend Tetzel, whereas the language of Luther is almost the same as that of our day. A comparison of the two is sufficient to shew that Luther is the creator of the German language. No doubt this is one of his least merits, but still it is one.

Luther replied without naming Tetzel; Tetzel had not named him. But there was nobody in Germany who could not have placed at the head of their publications the name which they had judged it expedient to suppress. Tetzel tried to confound the repentance which God demands with the penance which the Church imposes, in order to give a higher value to his indulgences. Luther made it his business to clear up this point.

“To avoid many words,” said he, in his graphic style, “I give to the wind (which, besides, has more leisure than I have) his other words, which are only sheets of paper and withered leaves; and I content myself with examining the foundations of his house of bur-thistle.

“The penitence which the holy father imposes cannot be that which Jesus Christ demands; for whatever the holy father imposes he can dispense with; and if these two penitences were one and the same, it would follow that the holy father takes away what Jesus appoints, and thereby makes void the commandment of God. . . . Ah! if it so pleases him, let him maltreat me,” continues Luther, after quoting other false interpretations of Tetzel; “let him call me heretic, schismatic, calumniator, or anything he likes; I will not, on that account, be his enemy, but will pray for him as for a friend. But it is not possible to allow him to treat the Holy Scriptures, our consolation, (Rom. xv. 4,) as a sow treats a sack of corn.”

We must accustom ourselves to Luther's occasional use of expressions too harsh and homely for our age,—it was the custom of the time; and under those words, which in our days would violate the proprieties of language, there is usually a force and justness which disposes us to pardon their rankness. He continues thus:

“He who buys indulgences, say our adversaries, does better than he who gives alms to a poor man not absolutely in extremity. Now, let them tell us that the Turks are profaning our churches and crosses, we will be able to hear it without a shudder; for we have amongst ourselves Turks a hundred times worse, who profane and annihilate the only true sanctuary, the Word of God, which sanctifies all things. . . . Let him who would follow this precept take good care not to give food to the hungry, nor clothing to the naked, before they give up the ghost, and, consequently, have no need of his assistance.”

It is important to contrast the zeal which Luther thus manifests for good works with what he says of justification by faith. Indeed, no man who has any experience, or any knowledge of Christianity, needs this new proof of a truth of which he is fully assured,—viz., that the more we adhere to justification by faith, the more strongly we feel the necessity of works, and the more diligently we practise them; whereas lax views as to the doctrine of faith necessarily lead to laxity of conduct. Luther, as St. Paul before, and Howard after him, are proofs of the former; all men without faith (and with such the world is filled) are proofs of the latter.

Luther comes next to the insulting language of Tetzel, and pays him back in his own way. “At the sound of these invectives methinks I hear a large ass braying at me. I am delighted at it, and would be very sorry that such people should give me the name of a good Christian.” We must give Luther as he is with all his foibles. This turn for pleasantry, coarse pleasantry, was one of them. The Reformer was a great man, undoubtedly a man of God; but he was a man, not an angel, and not even a perfect man. Who is entitled to call upon him for perfection?

"For the rest," adds he, challenging his opponents to the combat, "although it is not usual to burn heretics for such points, here, at Wittemberg, am I, Doctor Martin Luther! Is there any inquisitor, who pretends to chew fire, and make rocks leap into the air? I give him to know, that he has a safe-conduct to come here, an open door, and bed and board certain, all by the gracious care of our admirable Duke Frederick, who will never protect heresy."

We see that Luther was not deficient in courage. He trusted to the Word of God—a rock which never gives way in the tempest. But God, in faithfulness, gave him still further aid. The bursts of joy with which the multitude had hailed Luther's theses were soon succeeded by a gloomy silence. The learned had timidly drawn back on hearing the calamities and insults of Tetzel and the Dominicans. The bishops, who had previously been loud in condemnation of the abuses of indulgences, seeing them at length attacked, had not failed, with an inconsistency of which there are but too many examples, to find that at that time the attack was inopportune. The greater part of the Reformer's friends were frightened. Several of them had fled. But when the first terror was over, the minds of men took an opposite direction. The monk of Wittemberg soon saw himself again surrounded with a great number of friends and admirers.

There was one who, although timid, remained faithful to him throughout this crisis, and whose friendship at once solaced and supported him. This was Spalatin. Their correspondence was not interrupted. "I thank you," says he, when speaking of a particular mark of friendship which he had received from him; "but what do I not owe you?" It was on the 11th November, just fifteen days after the publication of the theses, and consequently when the minds of men were in a state of the greatest fermentation, that Luther thus delights to unbosom his gratitude to his friend.

In the same letter to Spalatin, it is interesting to see the strong man, who had just performed a most daring exploit, declaring from what source he derives his strength. "We can do nothing of ourselves; we can do everything by the grace of God. By us all ignorance is invincible, but no ignorance is invincible by the grace of God. The more we endeavour of ourselves to attain to wisdom, the nearer we approach to folly. It is not true that this invincible ignorance excuses the sinner; were it so, there would be no sin in the world."

Luther had not sent his propositions either to the prince or to any of his courtiers. The chaplain seems to have expressed some surprise at this, and Luther answers: "I did not wish my theses to reach our illustrious prince or any of his court before those who think themselves specially addressed had received them, lest it should be thought that I had published them by order of the prince, or to gain his favour, or from opposition to the Bishop of Mentz. I hear there are already several who dream such things. But now I can swear in all safety that my theses were published without the knowledge of Duke Frederick."

If Spalatin solaced his friend, and supported him by his influence, Luther, on his part, was desirous to meet the requests of the modest chaplain. The latter, among other questions, asked one which is frequently repeated in our day,—"What is the best method of studying the Holy Scriptures?"

"Till now, my dear Spalatin," replied Luther, "you have asked questions which I could answer. But to direct you in the study of the Scriptures, is more than I am able to do. However, if you would absolutely know my method, I will not hide it from you.

"It is most certain that we cannot succeed in comprehending the Scripture either by study or mere intellect. Your first duty, then, is to begin with prayer. Entreat the Lord that He will, in His great mercy, deign to grant you the true knowledge of His Word. There is no other interpreter of the Word of God than the Author of that Word, according as it is said, 'They will all be taught of God.' Hope nothing from your works, nothing from your intellect. Trust only in God, and in the influence of His Spirit. Believe one who is speaking from experience."

We here see how Luther attained possession of the truth of which he was a preacher. It was not, as some pretend, by confiding in a presumptuous reason, nor, as others maintain, by abandoning himself to hateful passions. The source from which he drew it was the purest, holiest, and most sublime—God himself consulted in humility, confidence, and prayer. Few in our day imitate him, and hence few comprehend him. To a serious mind these words of Luther are in themselves a justification of the Reformation.

Luther likewise found comfort in the friendship of respectable laymen. Christopher Scheurl, the excellent secretary of the imperial city of Nuremberg, gave him gratifying marks of his friendship. We know how pleasant expressions of sympathy are to the man who feels himself assailed from all quarters. The secretary of Nuremberg did more; he tried to make friends to his friend. He urged him to dedicate one of his works to a then celebrated lawyer of Nuremberg, named Jerome Ebner. "You have a high idea of my studies," modestly replied Luther; "but I have the poorest idea of them myself. Nevertheless, I was desirous to meet your wishes. I have searched . . . ; but in all my store, which I never found so meagre, nothing presented itself which seemed at all worthy of being dedicated to so great a man by so little a man." Striking humility! It is Luther who speaks thus, and the person with whom he contrasts himself is Doctor Ebner, who is altogether unknown to us. Posterity has not ratified Luther's judgment.

Luther, who had done nothing to circulate his theses, had not sent them to Scheurl any more than to the elector and his courtiers. The secretary of Nuremberg expressed his surprise. "I had no intention," replies Luther, "to give my theses so much publicity. I wished only to confer on their contents with some of those who reside with us or near us; intending, if they condemned, to destroy, and if they approved, to publish them. But now they are printed, reprinted, and spread far and wide, beyond my expectation; so much so that I repent of their production. Not that I have any fear of the truth being known by the people, (for this was all I sought;) but this is not the way of instructing them. There are questions in the theses as to which I have still my doubts; and if I had thought that they were to produce such a sensation, there are things which I would have omitted, and others which I would have affirmed with greater confidence." Luther afterwards thought differently. Far from fearing he had said too much, he declared that he ought to have said still more. But the apprehensions which Luther expresses to Scheurl do honour to his sincerity. They shew that he had nothing like a premeditated plan, had no party spirit, no overweening conceit, and sought nothing but the truth. When he had fully discovered the truth, his language was different. "You will find in my first writings," said he, many years after, "that I very humbly made many concessions to the pope, and on points of great importance,—concessions which I now detest, and regard as abominable and blasphemous."

Scheurl was not the only layman of importance who, at this time, testified his friendship for Luther. The celebrated painter, Albert Durer, sent him a present,—perhaps one of his pictures; and the doctor expressed his sense of the obligation in the warmest terms.

Thus Luther had practical experience of the truth of that saying of Divine wisdom,—“A friend loveth at all times; and a brother is born for adversity.” These words he remembered for the sake of others also, and accordingly pleaded the cause of the whole population. The elector had just levied a tax, and it was confidently alleged that he was going to levy another, probably on the advice of his counsellor Pfeflinger, against whom Luther often throws out cutting sarcasms. The doctor boldly placed himself in the breach. “Let not your Highness,” said he, “despise the prayer of a poor mendicant. In the name of God I entreat you not to order a new tax. My heart is broken, as well as that of several of your most devoted servants, at seeing how much the last has injured your fair fame, and the popularity which your highness enjoyed. It is true that God has endowed you with profound intellect, so that you see much farther into things than I, or doubtless all your subjects, do. But, perhaps, it is the will of God that a feeble intellect instruct a great one, in order that no one may trust in himself, but only in the Lord our God. May he deign to keep your body in health for our good, and destine your soul to life eternal. Amen.” In this way it is that the Gospel, while it makes us honour kings, makes us also plead the cause of the people. While it tells them of their duties, it, at the same time, reminds the prince of their rights. The voice of a Christian such as Luther, raised in the cabinet of a sovereign, might often supply the place of a whole assembly of legislators.

In this letter, in which Luther addresses a harsh lesson to the elector, he fears not to present a request to him, or rather to remind him of a promise,—viz., to give him a new suit. This freedom of Luther, at a moment when he might have feared he had given offence to Frederick, is equally honourable to the prince and to the reformer. “But,” adds he, “if it is Pfeflinger who has the charge of it, let him give it in reality, and not in protestations of friendship. He knows very well how to weave a web of good words, but no good cloth ever comes out of it.” Luther thought, that by the faithful counsel which he had given to his prince, he had well deserved his court dress. Be this as it may, two years later he had not received it, and renewed his request. This seems to indicate that Frederick was not so much under the influence of Luther as has been said.

CHAPTER VIII.

Disputation at Frankfurt—Tetzels Theses—Menaces—Opposition of Knipstraw—Luther's Theses Burnt—The Monks—Luther's Peace—Tetzels Theses Burnt—Luther's Vexation.

THE minds of men had thus gradually recovered from their first alarm. Luther himself was disposed to declare that his words did not mean so much as had been imagined. New circumstances might divert public attention, and the blow struck at Roman doctrine might, as had been the case with so many others, spend itself in the air. The partisans of Rome prevented this result. They fanned the flame instead of smothering it.

Tetzel and the Dominicans replied haughtily to the attack which had been made upon them. Burning with eagerness to crush the audacious monk who had disturbed their traffic, and to gain the favour of the Roman pontiff, they uttered cries of rage. They maintained that to attack the indulgence ordered by the pope was to attack the pope himself, and they called in the aid of all the monks and theologians of their school. In fact, Tetzel felt that an opponent like Luther was too much for him single-handed. Quite disconcerted, but more especially enraged at the doctor's attack, he quitted the envious of Wittemberg, and repaired to Frankfort-on-the-Oder, where he arrived as early as November, 1517. The university of that town, like that of Wittemberg, was of recent date. One of the professors was Conrad Wimpina, a man of much eloquence,—an old rival of Pollich of Mellerstadt,—and one of the most distinguished theologians of the time. Wimpina's envy was excited both by the doctor and by the university of Wittemberg; for their reputation obscured his. Tetzel applied to him for a reply to Luther's theses, and Wimpina wrote two series of antitheses,—the former to defend the doctrine of indulgences, and the latter to defend the authority of the pope.

This disputation, which had been long prepared and loudly advertised, and of which Tetzel entertained the highest hopes, took place on the 20th January, 1518. Tetzel having beaten up for recruits, monks had been sent from all the neighbouring cloisters, and assembled to the number of more than three hundred. Tetzel read his theses, one of which declared, "that whosoever says that the soul does not fly away from purgatory as soon as the money tinkles on the bottom of the strong box, is in error."

But, above all, he maintained propositions, according to which the pope appeared to be truly, as the apostle expresses it, seated as God in the temple of God. It was convenient for this shameless merchant to take refuge under the pope's mantle, with all his disorders and scandals.

In presence of the numerous assembly in which he stood, he declared himself ready to maintain as follows:

3. "Christians must be taught that the pope, by the greatness of his power, is above the whole universal Church and all councils. His orders ought to be implicitly obeyed.

4. "Christians must be taught that the pope alone is entitled to decide in matters of Christian faith; that he, and none but he, has the power to explain the meaning of Scripture in his own sense, and to approve or condemn all words or works of others.

5. "Christians must be taught that the judgment of the pope in things which concern Christian faith, and which are necessary to the salvation of the human race, cannot possibly err.

6. "Christians must be taught that in matters of faith, they ought to lean and rest more upon the opinion of the pope, as manifested by his decisions, than on the opinion of all wise men, as drawn by them out of Scripture.

8. "Christians must be taught that those who attack the honour and dignity of the pope are guilty of the crime of lese-majesty, and deserve malediction.

17. "Christians must be taught that there are many things which the Church regards as authentic articles of universal truth, although they are not found either in the canon of Scripture or in ancient doctors.

44. "Christians must be taught to regard those as obstinate heretics, who, by their words, their actions, or their writings, declare that they would not retract their heretical propositions were excommunication after excommunication to rain or hail upon them.

48. "Christians must be taught that those who protect heretics in their error, and who, by their authority, prevent them from being brought before the judge who is entitled to try them, are excommunicated; that if, in the space of a year, they desist not from doing so, they will be declared infamous, and severely punished with various punishments, in terms of law, and to the terror of all men.

50. "Christians must be told that those who spoil so many books and so much paper, and who preach or dispute publicly and wickedly on the confession of the mouth, the satisfaction of works, the rich and great indulgences of the Bishop of Rome, and on his power; that those who ally themselves with those so preaching or writing, who take pleasure in their writings, and circulate them among the people and in the world; that those, in fine, who secretly speak of those things in a contemptuous and irreverent manner, may well tremble at incurring the pains which have just been named, and of precipitating themselves and others with them, at the last day, into eternal condemnation, and even here below into great disgrace. For every beast that toucheth the mountain shall be stoned."

We see that Luther was not the only person whom Tetzel attacked. In the forty-eighth thesis he had probably the Elector of Saxony in view. These propositions savour much of the Dominican. To threaten every contradictor with severe punishment, was an inquisitor's argument, and scarcely admitted of a reply. The three hundred monks whom Tetzel had brought together gaped and stared in admiration of his discourse. The theologians of the university were too much afraid of being classed with the abettors of heresy, or were too much attached to the principles of Wimpina, candidly to adopt the extraordinary theses which had just been read.

The whole affair, about which so much noise had been made, seemed destined to be only a sham fight; but among the crowd of students, present at the disputation, was a young man of about twenty, named John Knipstrow. He had read the theses of Luther, and found them conformable to the doctrines of Scripture. Indignant at seeing the truth publicly trampled under foot, while no one appeared to defend it, this young man rose up, to the great astonishment of the whole assembly, and attacked the presumptuous Tetzel. The poor Dominican, who had not counted on such opposition, was quite disconcerted. After some efforts, he quitted the field of battle, and gave place to Wimpina, who made a more vigorous resistance; but Knipstrow pressed him so closely, that, to put an end to a contest which, in his eyes, was so unbecoming, Wimpina, who presided, declared the discussion closed, and proceeded forthwith to confer the degree of doctor on Tetzel, in recompense of this glorious combat. Wimpina, to disengage himself of the young orator, caused him to be sent to the convent of Pyritz in Pomerania, with orders that he should be strictly watched. But this dawning light was only removed from the banks of the Oder that it might afterwards shed a bright effulgence in Pomerania. When God sees it meet, he employs scholars to confound teachers.

Tetzel, wishing to repair the check which he had received, had recourse to the ultima ratio of Rome and the inquisitors,—I mean the faggot. On a public walk in one of the suburbs of Frankfort, he caused a pulpit and a scaffold to be erected, and repaired thither in solemn procession with his insignia of inquisitor. Mounting the pulpit, he let loose all his fury. He darted his thunder, and with his stentorian voice exclaimed, that the heretic Luther ought to be burned alive. Then, placing the doctor's theses and sermon on the scaffold, he burned them. He was better acquainted with this kind of work than with the defence of theses. Here he met with no opponents, and his victory was complete. The impudent Dominican returned in triumph to Frankfort. When parties in power are vanquished, they have recourse to certain demonstrations which must be conceded to them as a kind of consolation to their disgrace.

The second theses of Tetzel form an important epoch in the Reformation. They changed the locality of the dispute, transporting it from the indulgence market to the halls of the Vatican, and diverting it from Tetzel to the pope. Instead of the contemptible creature whom Luther had taken in his fist, they substituted the sacred person of the head of the Church. Luther was stunned at this. It is probable that he would himself have taken the step at a later period, but his enemies spared him the trouble. Thenceforward the question related not merely to a disreputable traffic, but to Rome; and the blow by which a bold hand had tried to demolish the shop of Tetzel, shook the very foundations of the pontifical throne.

Tetzel's theses were only a signal to the Roman troops. A cry against Luther arose among the monks, who were infuriated at the appearance of an adversary more formidable than either Erasmus or Reuchlin had been. The name of Luther resounded from the pulpits of the Dominicans, who addressed themselves to the passions of the people, and inveighed against the courageous doctor as a madman, a deceiver, and a demoniac. His doctrine was denounced as the most dreadful heresy. "Wait only for a fortnight, or four weeks at furthest," said they, "and this noted heretic will be burned." Had it depended only on the Dominicans, the fate of the Saxon doctor had soon been that of Huss and Jerome; but his life was destined to accomplish what the ashes of Huss had begun. Each does the work of God—one by his death, and another by his life. Several now began to cry out that the whole university of Wittenberg was tainted with heresy, and pronounced it infamous. "Let us pursue the villain, and all his partizans," continued they. In several places these exclamations had the effect of stirring up the passions of the people. Those who shared the opinions of the reformer had the public attention directed towards them; and in every place where the monks were strongest, the friends of the Gospel felt the effects of their hatred. Thus, in regard to the Reformation, the Saviour's prediction began to be accomplished: "They will revile you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake." This is a recompense which the world at no time fails to bestow on the decided friends of the Gospel.

When Luther was made acquainted with Tetzel's theses, and with the general attack of which they were the signal, his courage rose. He felt that it was necessary to withstand such adversaries to the face; and his intrepid zeal had no difficulty in resolving so to do. At the same time their feebleness made him aware of his own strength, and told him what he was.

He did not, however, allow himself to give way to those emotions of pride which are so natural to the heart of man. "It gives me more difficulty," he writes to Spalatin, "to refrain from despising my adversaries, and so sinning against Jesus Christ, than it would give me to vanquish them. They are so ignorant in things human and divine, that one is ashamed at having to fight with them; and yet it is their very ignorance which gives them their inconceivable audacity and face of brass." But the most powerful support to Luther's heart, in the midst of this universal opposition, was the deep conviction that his cause was the cause of truth. "Let it not surprise you," he writes to Spalatin, at the beginning of the year 1518, "that I am so much insulted. I am delighted with these insults. Did they not curse me, I could not believe so firmly that the cause which I have undertaken is God's own cause. Christ has been set up for a sign to be spoken against. I know," added he, "that from the beginning of the world the nature of the Word of God has been such, that every one who has preached it to the world, has been obliged—like the apostles—to leave all, and lay his account with death. Were it otherwise, it would not be the Word of Jesus Christ." This peace in the midst of agitation is a thing unknown to the world's heroes. Men placed at the head of a government, or of a political party, are seen to give way under their labours and their vexations. The Christian, in his struggles, usually acquires new strength, because he has access to a mysterious source of repose and courage, unknown to those whose eyes are closed to the Gospel.

One thing, however, sometimes distressed Luther,—viz., the thought of the dissensions which his courageous opposition might produce. He knew that a single word might be sufficient to set the world in a flame; and when he foresaw prince against prince, and perhaps nation against nation, his patriotic heart was saddened, and his Christian charity alarmed. His wish was for peace; but he behoved to speak out. So God required. "I tremble," said he, "I shudder at the thought of being the cause of discord among such mighty princes."

He still kept silence in regard to Tetzel's propositions concerning the pope. Had he been carried away by passion, he would, doubtless, have made an impetuous assault on the extraordinary doctrine under which his opponents sought to take shelter. He did not do so; and there is in this delay, reserve, and silence, something grave and solemn, which sufficiently explains the spirit by which he was animated. He waited, but not through weakness; for when he struck he gave a heavier blow.

Tetzel, after his auto da fe at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, had hastened to send his theses into Saxony. There, thought he, they will serve as an antidote to those of Luther. A man from Halle, employed by the inquisitor to circulate his propositions, arrived at Wittenberg. The students of the university, still indignant at Tetzel for having burned the theses of their master, no sooner heard of the messenger's arrival, than they sought him out, and, gathering round, jostled and frightened him. "How dare you bring such things here?" demanded they. Some purchasing part of the copies with which he was provided, and others seizing the rest, they got possession of his whole stock, amounting to eight hundred copies. Then, unknown to the elector, the senate, the rector, Luther, and all the other professors, they put up the following notice on the boards of the university:—"Whoever is desirous to be present at the burning and funeral of Tetzel's theses, let him repair at two o'clock to the market-place."

Crowds assembled at the hour, and committed the propositions of the Dominican to the flames, amid loud acclamations. One copy which escaped, Luther afterwards sent to his friend, Lange of Erfurt. These generous but imprudent youths followed the old precept, "Eye for eye, and tooth for tooth," and not that of Jesus Christ; but after the example which doctors and professors had given at Frankfort, can we be astonished that young students followed it at Wittenberg? The spread throughout Germany, and made a great noise. Luther was extremely vexed at it.

"I am astonished," he writes to his old master, Jodocus, at Erfurt, "how you could think it was I that burned Tetzel's theses. Do you think that I am so devoid of sense? But what can I do? When I am the subject of remark, everything seems to be believed. Can I tie up the tongues of the whole world? Very well! Let them say, let them hear, let them see, let them pretend whatever they please; I will act as long as the Lord gives me strength, and with His help will fear nothing." "What will come out of it," says he to Lange, "I know not, unless it be that my danger is much increased." The act of the students shews how much their hearts already burned for the cause which Luther defended. This was an important symptom; for a movement among the young of necessity soon extends to the whole nation.

The

The theses of Tetzel and Wimpina, though little esteemed, produced a certain effect. They heightened the dispute, widened the rent which had been made in the mantle of the Church, and brought questions of the highest interest into the field. Accordingly, the heads of the Church began to look more narrowly at the matter, and to declare decidedly against the reformer. "Verily, I know not in whom Luther confides," said the Bishop of Brandenburg, "when he dares thus attack the power of bishops." Perceiving that this new circumstance called for new proceedings, the bishop came in person to Wittenberg; but he found Luther animated with the inward joy which a good conscience imparts, and determined to give battle. The bishop felt that the Augustine monk was obeying an authority superior to his, and returned to Brandenburg in a rage. One day, in the winter of 1518, when sitting at his fireside, he turned to those who were about him and said, "I will not lay down my head in peace till I have thrown Martin into the fire, as I do this brand," throwing one into the grate. The revolution of the sixteenth century was not to be accomplished by the heads of the Church, any more than that of the first century had been by the Sanhedrim and the synagogue. In the sixteenth century, the heads of the Church were opposed to Luther, the Reformation, and its ministers; in the same way as they were opposed to Jesus Christ, the Gospel, and His apostles, and as they too often are at all times to the truth. "The bishops," says Luther, in speaking of the visit which the Bishop of Brandenburg had paid him, "begin to perceive that they ought to have done what I am doing, and they are consequently ashamed. They call me proud and audacious, and I deny not that I am so. But they are not the people to know either what God is, or what we are."

CHAPTER IX

Priero—System of Rome—The Dialogue—System of Reform—Reply to Priero—The Word—The Pope and the Church—Hochstraten—The Monks—Luther replies—Eck—The School—The Obilisks—Luther's Sentiments—The Asterisks—Rupture.

A MORE serious resistance than that of Tetzel was already opposed to Luther. Rome had answered. A reply had issued from the walls of the sacred palace. It was not Leo X. who had taken it into his head to speak theology. "A quarrel of monks," he had one day said. "The best thing is not to meddle with it." And on another occasion, "It is a drunken German who has written these theses; when he recovers from his wine he will speak differently." A Dominican of Rome, Sylvester Mazolini de Priero or Prierias, master of the sacred palace, exercised the functions of censor, and in this character was the first man in Italy who knew of the Saxon monk's theses.

A Roman censor and the theses of Luther! What a rencounter! Liberty of speech, liberty of investigation, liberty of faith, come into collision in Rome with that power which pretends to have in its hands a monopoly of intelligence, and to open and shut the mouth of Christendom at its pleasure. The struggle between Christian liberty, which begets children of God, and pontifical despotism, which begets slaves of Rome, is, as it were, personified during the first days of the Reformation, in the encounter between Luther and Prierio.

The Roman censor, prior-general of the Dominicans, employed to determine what Christendom must say or not say, and know or not know, hastened to reply, and published a tract, which he dedicated to Leo X. He spoke contemptuously of the German monk, and declared, with a self-sufficiency altogether Roman, "that he was anxious to know whether this Martin had a nose of iron, or a head of brass, which could not be broken." Then, in the form of a dialogue, he attacked the theses of Luther, employing alternately ridicule, insult, and threatening.

The combat between the Augustine of Witttemberg and the Dominican of Rome took place on the very question which lies at the foundation of the Reformation,—viz., "What is the sole infallible authority to Christians?" The following is the system of the Church, as expounded by its most independent organs. The letter of the written Word is dead without the spirit of interpretation, which alone unfolds its hidden meaning. Now, this spirit is not granted to every Christian, but to the Church; in other words, to the priests. It is great presumption to maintain, that He who promised to be with His Church always to the end of the world, could abandon it to the power of error. It will be said, perhaps, that the doctrine and constitution of the Church are not the same as we find them in the sacred oracles. This is true; but the change is only apparent, relating to the form, and not to the substance. Moreover, the change is an advance. The living power of the Spirit has given reality to what exists in Scripture only in idea; it has embodied the sketches of the Word, put a finishing hand to these sketches, and completed the work of which the Bible had furnished only the first outlines. Scripture ought, therefore, to be understood in the sense determined by the Church, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Here the Catholic doctors are divided. General councils, say some, and Gerson among the number, are the representatives of the Church. The pope, says others, is the depositary of the Spirit of interpretation; and no man is entitled to understand Scripture in a sense differing from that of the Roman pontiff. This was the opinion of Prierio.

Such was the doctrine which the master of the sacred palace opposed to the rising Reformation. On the power of the pope and the Church he advanced propositions at which the most shameless flatterers of the court of Rome would have blushed. The following is one of the points which he maintains at the commencement of his tract:—"Whoever rests not in the doctrine of the Roman Church, and the Roman pontiff, as the infallible rule of faith, from which the Holy Scripture itself derives its force and authority, is a heretic."

Then, in a dialogue, in which Luther and Sylvester are the speakers, the latter tries to refute the doctor's propositions. The sentiments of the Saxon monk were quite new to a Roman censor. Accordingly, Prierio shews that he understood neither the emotions of his heart, nor the motives of his conduct. To the teacher of truth he applied the little standards of the valets of Rome. "Dear Luther!" says he, "were you to receive a bishopric and a plenary indulgence for the repair of your Church from our lord the pope, you would proceed more gently, and would even prose in favour of the indulgence which you are now pleased to blacken!" The Italian, so proud of the elegance of his manners, sometimes assumes the most scurrilous tone. "If the property of dogs is to bite," says he to Luther, "I fear your father must have been a dog." The Dominican begins at last to be almost astonished at his own condescension in speaking to a rebellious monk; and concludes with shewing his opponent the cruel teeth of an inquisitor. "The Roman Church," says he, "having in the pope the summit of spiritual and temporal power, may, by the secular arm, constrain those who, after receiving the faith, stray from it. She is not bound to employ arguments for the purpose of combating and subduing the rebellious."

These words, traced by the pen of one of the dignitaries of the Roman court, had a very significant meaning. They failed, however, to terrify Luther. He believed, or feigned to believe, that this dialogue was not by Prierio, but by Ulrich von Hütten, or by some other of the authors of "The Letters of some Obscure Men," who (said he in his sarcastic strain) had, in order to stir up Luther against Prierio, compiled this mass of absurdity. He had no desire to see the court of Rome in arms against him. However, after remaining for some time silent, his doubts, if he had any, having been dispelled, he set to work, and in two days after was prepared with his reply.

The Bible had produced the Reformer and begun the Reformation. Luther, in believing, had no need of the testimony of the Church. His faith was derived from the Bible itself,—from within, and not from without. His thorough conviction that the evangelical doctrine was immovably founded on the Word of God, made him regard all external authority as useless. Luther's experience, in this respect, opened a new prospect to the Church. The living spring which had burst forth before the monk of Witttemberg, was destined to become a stream at which nations would quench their thirst.

The Church had said that, in order to understand the Word, the Spirit of God must interpret it; and so far the Church was right. But her error consisted in regarding the Holy Spirit as a monopoly conferred on a certain caste, and in thinking that it could be appropriated exclusively to certain assemblies and colleges, to a city or a conclave. "The wind bloweth where it listeth," were the words of the Son of God, when speaking of the Spirit of God; and, on another occasion, "They will ALL be taught of God." The corruption of the Church, the ambition of pontiffs, the animosities of councils, the squabbles of the clergy, and the pomp of prelates, had made this Holy Spirit—this breath of humility and peace—eschew the dwelling of the priesthood. He had deserted the assemblies of the proud, and the palaces of the princes of the Church, and gone to live in retirement among simple Christians and modest priests. He had shunned a domineering hierarchy, which often forced blood from the poor, whom it trampled under foot; He had shunned a proud and ignorant clergy, whose chiefs were skilled, not in the Bible, but in the sword; and He was found sometimes among despised sects, and sometimes among men of talents and learning. The holy cloud, withdrawing from proud basilisks and gorgeous cathedrals, had descended on the obscure dwellings of the humble, or on chambers where studious men calmly pursued their conscientious labours. The Church, degraded by her love of power and riches, dishonoured in the eyes of the people by the venal use which she made of the doctrine of life,—the Church which sold salvation in order to fill a treasury, for luxury and debauchery to empty, had lost all respect. Men of sense no longer set any value on her testimony; but, despising an authority so degraded, turned with joy towards the Divine Word, and its infallible authority, as toward the only refuge which remained to them in the general confusion.

The age, therefore, was prepared. The bold movement by which Luther changed the point on which the human heart rested its highest hopes, and with a mighty hand transferred those hopes from the walls of the Vatican to the rock of the Word of God, was hailed with enthusiasm. This was the work which the reformer had in view in his reply to Prierio.

Putting aside the axioms which the Dominican had placed at the head of his work, he says: "After your example, I, too, am going to lay down some axioms."

"The first is the saying of St. Paul, 'Should we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other Gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed.'"

The second is the following passage of St. Augustine, addressed to St. Jerome: "I have learned to pay to the canonical books alone the honour of believing very firmly that none of them has erred; as to others, I believe not what they say, for the simple reason, that it is they who say it."

Luther then vigorously proceeds to lay down the fundamental principles of the Reformation,—the Word of God, the whole Word of God, and nothing but the Word of God. "If you understand these principles," continues he, "you will also understand that your whole dialogue is completely overturned; for you have done nothing else than adduce the words and opinions of St. Thomas." Next, attacking the axioms of his opponent, he frankly declares his opinion that popes and councils may err. He complains of the flattery of the Roman courtiers, in attributing to the pope the alleged infallibility of both popes and councils, and declares that the Church exists virtually only in Christ, and representatively only in councils. Coming afterwards to the supposition which Prierio had made, he says: "No doubt you judge me by yourself; but if I aspired to a bishopric, assuredly I would not use language which sounds so hateful in your ears. Do you imagine I am ignorant how bishoprics and the popedom are procured at Rome? Do not the very children in the streets sing the well-known words,—

"Rome now-a-days is more unclean, Than ought that in the world is seen?"

This was among the stanzas current in Rome before the election of one of the last popes. Nevertheless, Luther speaks of Leo with respect. "I know," says he, "that in him we have, as it were, a Daniel in Babylon; his integrity has repeatedly endangered his life." He concludes with a few words in reply to the menaces of Prierio: "In fine, you say that the pope is at once pontiff and emperor, and that he has power to constrain by the secular arm. Are you thirsting for murder? Take my word for it, your rhodomontades and your loud-sounding threats cannot terrify me. Though I be killed, Christ lives—Christ my Lord, and the Lord of all, blessed for ever and ever. Amen."

Thus Luther, with a strong arm, assails the infidel altar of the papacy, opposing to it the altar of the Word of God, alone holy, alone infallible, before which he would have every knee to bow, and on which he declares himself ready to sacrifice his life.

Prierio published a reply, and after it a third treatise on "The Irrefragable Truth of the Church and of the Roman Pontiff," in which, founding on ecclesiastical law, he says, that though the pope were to send the people and himself to the devil, en masse, he could not for so doing be either judged or deposed. The pope was at length obliged to impose silence on Prierio.

A new opponent soon entered the list. He, too, was a Dominican. James Hochstraten, inquisitor at Cologne, whom we have already seen assailing Reuchlin and the friends of letters, was furious when he saw Luther's boldness. It was indeed necessary that darkness and monkish fanaticism should engage in close fight with him who was to give them their death-blow. Monkism was formed after primitive truth had begun to decay, and from that period downward, errors and monks had gone hand-in-hand. The man who was to hasten their ruin had appeared; but these sturdy champions would not quit the field without a fierce combat. This combat they continued to wage with him throughout his whole life, though the proper personification of it is in Hochstraten; Hochstraten and Luther—the one, the free and intrepid Christian, and the other, the blustering slave of monkish superstition. Hochstraten unchains his rage, and, with loud cries, demands the death of the heretic. . . . His wish is to secure the triumph of Rome by means of the flames. "It is high treason against the Church," exclaims he, "to let so execrable a heretic live another single hour. Let a scaffold be instantly erected for him!" This sanguinary counsel was, alas! but too well followed in many countries; the voice of numerous martyrs, as in the first days of the Church, bore testimony to the truth in the midst of the flames. But in vain were fire and sword invoked against Luther. The angel of Jehovah constantly encamped around him and shielded him.

Luther replied to Hochstraten briefly, but very energetically. "Go," says he to him, when concluding, "go, delirious murderer, whose thirst can only be quenched by the blood of the brethren. My sincere desire is, that you guard against calling me a Christian and a believer; and that, on the contrary, you never cease to denounce me as a heretic. Understand these things well, you bloody man, you enemy of the truth; and if your furious rage impel you to devise mischief against me, do it with circumspection, and time your measures well. God knows what I purpose if He grants me life. My hope and expectation (God willing) will not deceive me." Hochstraten was silent.

A more painful attack awaited the reformer. Dr. Eck, the celebrated professor of Ingolstadt, who procured the liberty of Urban Regius, Luther's friend, had received the famous theses. Eck was not the man to defend the abuses of indulgences; but he was a doctor of the school, and not of the Bible, being well versant in scholastics, but not in the Word of God. If Prierio had represented Rome, and Hochstraten had represented the monks, Eck represented the school. The school which, for about five centuries, had ruled Christendom, far from yielding to the first blows of the reformer, proudly rose up to crush the man who dared to assail it with floods of contempt. Eck and Luther, the school and the Word, came to blows on more than one occasion; but the present was the occasion on which the combat commenced.

Eck must have regarded several of Luther's assertions as erroneous; for nothing obliges us to question the sincerity of his convictions. He defended the scholastic opinions with enthusiasm, just as Luther defended the declarations of the Word of God. We may even suppose that he was somewhat pained at seeing himself obliged to oppose his old friend, and yet it would seem, from the mode of attack, that passion and jealousy had some share in his determination.

He gave the name of "Obelisks" to his remarks on the theses of Luther. Wishing at first to save appearances, he did not publish his work, but contented himself with communicating it confidentially to his ordinary, the Bishop of Eichstädt. Soon, however, whether through the indiscretion of the bishop, or of Eck himself, the "Obelisks" were circulated in all quarters. A copy having fallen into the hands of a friend of Luther, Link, preacher at Nuremberg, he lost no time in sending it to the reformer. Eck was a much more formidable opponent than Tetzel, Prierio, and Hochstraten; his work was the more dangerous the more it surpassed theirs in knowledge and subtlety. He affected pity for his "feeble opponent," (knowing well that pity injures more effectually than anger,) and insinuated that the propositions of Luther contained Bohemian poison, and savoured of Bohemia. By these malicious insinuations he threw upon Luther the obloquy and hatred which in Germany attached to the name of Huss and the schismatics of his country.

The malice which shone through this treatise roused Luther's indignation, while the thought that the blow was given by an old friend, was still more distressing. However, he must sacrifice his affections in defending the truth. Luther unbosomed his heart and its sadness in a letter to Egranus, pastor at Zwickau: "I am called in the 'Obelisks' a venomous man, a Bohemian, a heretic, seditious, insolent, and presumptuous. . . . I say nothing of milder epithets, such as sleepy, imbecile, ignorant, contemner of the sovereign pontiff, &c. This book is full of the grossest insults; and yet the author is a distinguished man, alike remarkable for learning and talent; and (it is this that grieves me most) a man with whom I had recently contracted a close friendship,—viz., John Eck, doctor in theology, and chancellor of Ingolstadt, a celebrated and illustrious author. Did I not know the thoughts of Satan, I would be astonished at the furious manner in which this man has broken off a friendship at once so pleasant and so recent; and this without giving me any warning—without writing or saying a single word."

But if Luther's heart be wounded, his courage is not destroyed. On the contrary he girds himself for the combat. "Rejoice, my brother," says he to Egranus, whom a violent enemy had also attacked,—"rejoice, and be not alarmed at all these flying leaves. The more furious my adversaries become, the more I advance. I leave the things which are behind, that they may bark after them, and follow those which are before, that they may, in like manner, bark after them in their turn."

Eck felt how shameful his conduct had been, and endeavoured to justify it in a letter to Carlstadt, in which he calls Luther "their common friend;" and throws all the blame on the Bishop of Eichstädt, at whose instigation he pretended that he had written the work. His intention, he said, was not to publish the "Obelisks;" but for this he would have had more regard for the friendship subsisting between him and Luther; and he requested that Luther, instead of coming to open rupture with him, would turn his arms against the theologians of Frankfort. The Professor of Ingolstadt, who had not feared to strike the first blow, began to be alarmed at the power of the opponent whom he had imprudently attacked, and would willingly have evaded the contest. It was too late.

All these fine words did not persuade Luther, who was, however, disposed to be silent, and said, "I will patiently swallow this morsel, though fit for Cerberus." But his friends were of a different opinion, and urged, or rather constrained him to answer. He, accordingly, replied to the "Obelisks" by his "Asterisks," opposing (as he says, playing upon the word) to the rust and lividity of obelisks the light and dazzling brightness of the stars of heaven. In this work he treats his new opponent less harshly than those whom he had previously combated; but his indignation is seen peeping through his words.

He shewed that in the chaos of the "Obelisks" there was nothing from the Holy Scriptures, nothing from the Fathers of the Church, and nothing from the ecclesiastical canons,—that they contained only scholastic glosses, and opinion after opinion, many of them mere dreams; in a word, contained the very things which Luther had attacked. The "Asterisks" are full of spirit and life. The author's indignation rises at the errors of his friend's book; but he shews pity to the man. He reiterates the fundamental principle which he had laid down in his reply to Prierio: "The sovereign pontiff is a man, and may be led into error; but God is truth, and cannot be deceived." Then, employing the argumentum ad hominem against the scholastic doctor, he says to him, "It is certainly impudent in any one to teach, as the philosophy of Aristotle, any dogma which cannot be proved by his authority. You grant this. Well, then, it is, a fortiori, the most impudent of all things to affirm in the Church, and among Christians, anything that Jesus Christ himself has not taught. Now, in what part of the Bible is it said that the treasure of Christ's merits is in the hands of the pope?"

He adds: "As to the malicious charge of Bohemian heresy, I patiently bear the reproach for the love of Jesus Christ. I live in a celebrated university, a distinguished town, an important bishopric, and a powerful duchy, where all are orthodox, and where, doubtless, no toleration would be given to so wicked a heretic."

Luther did not publish the "Asterisks," he only communicated them to his friends. It was not till a later period that they were given to the public.

This rupture between the doctor of Ingolstadt and the doctor of Wittenberg made a sensation in Germany. They had common friends. Scheurl, in particular, by whose instrumentality their friendship appears to have been originally formed, was exceedingly annoyed. He was one of those who longed to see a reform throughout the whole Germanic Church, produced through the medium of its most distinguished organs. But if in matters of principle the most eminent theologians of the period came to open rupture, and while Luther advanced in a new path, Eck put himself at the head of those who kept to the old path, what disruption must inevitably ensue? Would not numerous adherents gather around each of the two chiefs, and form two hostile camps in the heart of the empire?

Scheurl exerted himself to reconcile Eck and Luther. The latter declared that he was willing to forget everything; that he loved the genius, and admired the erudition of Dr. Eck, and that the proceedings of his old friend had caused him more grief than anger. "I am ready," says he, "either for peace or war; but I prefer peace. Do you then set about it. Grieve with us, that the devil has thrown among us this beginning of strife, and then rejoice that Christ in His mercy hath removed it." About the same time he addressed a most friendly letter to Eck, who, however, not only did not answer it, but did not even send him a verbal message. It was too late for reconciliation; and the breach became wider and wider. The pride of Eck, and his unforgiving temper, soon completely broke any remaining ties of friendship.

CHAPTER X.

Popular Writings—Our Father—Thy Kingdom Come—Thy Will be Done—Our Daily Bread—Sermon on Repentance—Forgiveness through Christ.

SUCH were the struggles which the champion of the Word of God had to maintain at the outset of his career. But these combats with the leaders of society, these academical disputes, are of small account with the Christian. Human doctors imagine they have gained the noblest of triumphs if they succeed in filling some newspapers and some saloons with the noise of their systems. As it is with them more an affair of self-love, or party spirit, than of good to humanity, this worldly success satisfies them. Accordingly, their labours are only a smoke, which, after blinding us, passes off and leaves no trace behind. Neglecting to introduce their fire among the masses of the population, they do nothing more than make it skim along the surface of society.

It is not so with the Christian. His object is not success in a coterie, or an academy, but the salvation of souls. He, therefore, willingly avoids the brilliant skirmishing which he might carry on at his ease with the champions of the world, and prefers the obscure labours which carry life and light into rural cottages, and the lanes of cities. Thus did Luther, or rather, according to the precept of his Master, he did the one, without leaving the other undone. While combating inquisitors, university chancellors, and masters of the sacred palace, he strove to diffuse sound religious knowledge among the multitude. With that view, he at this time published different popular writings, such as his "Discourses on the Ten Commandments," delivered two years before in the church of Wittenberg, and which we have already noticed; and his "Exposition of the Lord's Prayer, for simple and ignorant laymen." Who would not like to know how the reformer then addressed the people?

We will quote some of the words which he sent, as he says, in the preface to the second of these works, "to course the country."

Prayer, that inward act of the heart, will doubtless ever be one of the points with which a reformation in heart and life must commence, and, accordingly, it early engaged the attention of Luther. It is impossible, in a translation, to keep up his energetic style, and the vigour of a language which was formed, so to speak, as it fell from his pen; however, we will try.

"When you pray," says he, "have few words, but many thoughts and affections, and, above all, let these be profound. The less you speak the better you pray. Few words and many thoughts make the Christian; many words and few thoughts, the pagan.

"Seeming and bodily prayer is that muttering of the lips, that external babble, which comes forth without attention, striking the eyes and ears of men; but prayer in spirit and in truth is the inward desire, the emotions, and sighs which proceed from the depths of the heart. The former is the prayer of hypocrites, and of all who trust in themselves; the latter is the prayer of the children of God, who walk in His fear."

Then coming to the first words of our Lord's Prayer, "Our Father," he thus expresses himself:—"Among all the names of God there is none which inclines more toward him than the name of Father. We should not have so much happiness and consolation in calling him Lord, or God, or Judge. . . . By this name of father His bowels of compassion are moved; for there is no voice more lovely or touching than that of a child to its father.

"Who art in heaven.—He who confesses that he has a Father in heaven, owns himself to be, as it were, an orphan on the earth. Hence his heart feels an ardent desire like that of a child living out of its father's country, among strangers, in wretchedness and sorrow. It is as if he said, 'Alas! my Father! thou art in heaven, and I, thy miserable child, am on the earth, far from thee, in all sorts of dangers, necessities, and sorrows.'

"Hallowed be Thy name!—He who is passionate and envious, who curses or slanders, dishonours God, in whose name he was baptized. Applying the vessel which God has consecrated to profane uses, he resembles a priest who should use the holy cup to give drink to a sow, or to gather manure.

"Thy kingdom come.—Those who amass wealth, who erect magnificent buildings, who seek after all that the world can give, and with the lips repeat this prayer, are like the large pipes of a church organ, which sounds and cries at full pitch, and without ceasing, but has neither words, nor sense, nor reason."

Further on, Luther attacks the error of pilgrimages, which was then so general. "One goes to Rome, another to St. James; one builds a chapel, another founds an endowment, in order to reach the kingdom of God; but all neglect the essential point, which is to become themselves His kingdom. Why do you go beyond seas in quest of the kingdom of God? . . . Your heart is the place in which it ought to rise.

"It is a dreadful thing," continues he, "to hear us utter this prayer, 'Thy will be done.' Where in the Church do we see this will done? . . . Bishop rises against bishop, and church against church. Priests, monks, and nuns, quarrel and fight; throughout there is nothing but discord. And yet all parties exclaim that they have a good will and an upright intention; and so to the honour and glory of God they altogether do the work of the devil. . . .

"Why do we say, 'Our bread!'" continues he, explaining these words, "Give us this day our daily bread."

"Because we pray, not for the ordinary bread which pagans eat, and which God gives to all men, but for our bread—bread to us, children of the heavenly Father.

"And what, then, is this bread of God?—It is Jesus Christ our Lord: 'I am the living bread which came down from heaven, and give life to the world.' Wherefore let us not deceive ourselves. Sermons and instructions which do not represent to us, or give us the knowledge of Jesus Christ, cannot be the daily bread and food of our souls. . . .

"What avails it that such a bread is prepared for us, if it is not served out to us, and we cannot taste it?"

. . . It is as if a magnificent feast were prepared, and there were nobody to hand the bread, bring the dishes, and pour out the liquor; so that the guests would be left to feed by the eye and the smell. . . . This is the reason why it is necessary to preach Christ, and Christ alone.

"But what, then, you ask, is it to know Jesus Christ, and what profit is gained by it? Answer: To learn to know Jesus Christ, is to comprehend what the apostle says: 'Christ has of God been made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption.' Now, you comprehend this when you perceive that your wisdom is culpable folly, your righteousness damnable iniquity, your holiness damnable pollution, your redemption miserable condemnation—when you feel that, before God and all the creatures, you are truly a fool, a sinner, an impure and condemned man,—and when you shew, not only by your words, but from the bottom of your heart, and by your works, that there remains to you no comfort and no salvation, save Jesus Christ. To believe is nothing else than to eat this bread of heaven."

Thus Luther faithfully fulfilled his resolution to open the eyes of a people whom priests had blindfolded, and were leading at their pleasure. His writings, which in a short time spread over all Germany, caused new light to arise, and shed the seeds of truth in abundance on a soil well prepared to receive it. But while thinking of those at a distance, he did not forget those who were near.

The Dominicans, from their pulpits, denounced him as an infamous heretic. Luther, the man of the people, and who, had he been so disposed, could with a few sentences have set them in commotion, always disdained such triumphs, and made it his sole aim to instruct his hearers.

His reputation, which was continually extending, and the courage with which he raised the banner of Christ in the midst of an enslaved Church, made his sermons be followed with increasing interest. Never had the confluence been so great. Luther went straight to the point. One day, having mounted the pulpit of Wittenberg, he undertook to establish the doctrine of repentance. The discourse pronounced on this occasion afterwards became very celebrated, and contains several of the fundamental principles of evangelical doctrine.

At first he contrasts the pardon of men with the pardon of heaven. "There are," says he, "two remissions—the remission of the penalty, and the remission of the fault. The former reconciles man externally with the Church; the latter, which is the heavenly indulgence, reconciles man with God. If a man has not within himself that tranquil conscience, that cheerful heart, which God's remission gives, no indulgence can aid him, were he to buy all that ever have been on the earth."

He afterwards continues thus,—“They wish to do good works before their sins are pardoned, whereas sins must be pardoned before good works can be done. Works do not banish sin; but banish sin, and you will have works. Good works should be done with a cheerful heart and a good conscience toward God; in other words, with the forgiveness of sins.”

He then comes to the principal object of his sermon—an object which was identified with that of the whole Reformation. The Church had put herself in the place of God and His Word; he objects to this, and makes everything depend on faith in the Word.

“The remission of the fault,” says he, “is not in the power of the pope, or the bishop, or the priest, or any man whatever; but rests solely on the Word of Christ, and your own faith. For Christ did not choose to build our comfort or our salvation on a word or work of man; but only on himself, on His own work and Word. Your repentance and your works may deceive you, but Christ your God will never deceive, will never waver; and the devil cannot overthrow His words.”

“A pope or a bishop has no more power than the humblest priest, where the remission of the fault is in question. And even where there is no priest, each Christian, were it a woman or a child, can do the same thing. For if a simple Christian says to you, ‘God pardons sin in the name of Jesus Christ,’ and you receive the saying with firm faith, as if God himself had spoken, you are acquitted.

“If you believe not that your sins are pardoned, you make your God a liar, and declare that you put greater confidence in your vain thoughts than in God and His Word.

“Under the Old Testament, neither priest, nor king, nor prophet, had power to proclaim the forgiveness of sins; but under the New Testament every believer has this power. The Church is quite replete with the remission of sins. If a pious Christian comforts your conscience by the word of the cross,—be it man or woman, young or old,—receive the comfort with a faith so firm, that you would sooner submit to many deaths than doubt that it is ratified in the presence of God. . . . Repent, and do all the works that you can do; but let the faith which you have in the pardon of Jesus Christ stand in the front rank, and have sole command on the field of battle.”

Thus spoke Luther to his astonished and enraptured hearers. All the scaffoldings which impudent priests had, for their own profit, reared between God and the soul of man, were thrown down, and man brought face to face with his Maker. The word of pardon came down pure from on high, without passing through a thousand corrupting channels. It was no longer necessary that the testimony of God, in order to be available, should previously be stamped by men with their false seal. The monopoly of the sacerdotal caste was abolished, and the Church emancipated.

Apprehensions of Luther's Friends—Journey to Heidelberg—Eibra—The Palestine Castle—Rupture—The Paradoxes—Dispute—The Hearers—Bucer—Brentz—Snefp—Conversations with Luther—Labours of the Young Doctors—Effects on Luther—The Old Professor—The True Light—Arrival.

MEANWHILE the fire which had been kindled at Wittenberg behaved to be kindled elsewhere. Luther, not contented with announcing the truth in the place of his residence, whether to the academic youth or to the people, was desirous to shed the seeds of sound doctrine in other places. The Augustine order were to hold their general chapter at Heidelberg, in the spring of 1518. Luther, as one of the most distinguished men of the order, was invited to attend; but his friends did all they could to dissuade him from undertaking the journey. In fact, the monks had laboured to render the name of Luther odious in all the places through which he had to pass. To insult they had added threatening; and a small matter might have sufficed to excite a popular tumult, of which he might have been made the victim. “Or even,” said his friends, “what they may not dare to do by violence, they will accomplish by fraud and stratagem.” But in the discharge of a duty, Luther did not allow himself to be arrested by the fear of any danger, however imminent. He therefore turned a deaf ear to the timid suggestions of his friends, and directed them to Him in whom his confidence was placed, and under whose protection he desired to undertake the perilous journey. After the feast of Easter he quietly set out on foot, on the 13th April, 1518.

He had with him a guide named Urban, who carried his small bundle, and was to accompany him as far as Wurzburg. How many thoughts must have occupied the heart of the servant of the Lord during this journey! At Weissenfels, the pastor, though not of his acquaintance, instantly recognized him as the doctor of Wittenberg, and gave him a hearty reception. At Erfurt, he was joined by two other Augustine friars. At Judentbach, the three fell in with Degenhard Pfeffinger, the elector's confidential councillor, who entertained them at the inn. “I have had the pleasure,” wrote Luther to Spalatin, “of making this rich lord some shillings poorer. You know how I like to take every occasion of making a hole in the purses of the rich for the benefit of the poor, especially if the rich are my friends.” He arrived at Coburg worn out with fatigue. "All goes well by the grace of God," wrote he; "only, I confess I have sinned in undertaking the journey on foot. But for this sin I presume I will have no need of the remission of indulgences, for my contrition is perfect, and my satisfaction complete. I am knocked up with fatigue, and all the conveyances are full. Is not this enough, or rather, more than enough of penitence, contrition, and satisfaction?"

The reformer of Germany, not finding a place in the public conveyances, nor any one who was willing to yield him his place, was obliged, next morning, notwithstanding of his fatigue, humbly to resume his journey on foot. He arrived at Wurzburg on the evening of the second Sabbath after Easter, and sent back his guide.

Bishop Bibra, who had received the theses with so much delight, lived in this town, and Luther had a letter for him from the Elector of Saxony. The bishop, overjoyed at the opportunity of becoming personally acquainted with this bold champion of the truth, hastened to invite him to the episcopal palace. He went out to receive him, spoke to him in the kindest terms, and offered to furnish him with a guide as far as Heidelberg. But at Wurzburg Luther had fallen in with his two friends, the vicar-general Staupitz, and Lange, the prior of Erfurt, who offered him a place in their carriage. He therefore thanked Bibra for his offer, and next day the three friends set out from Wurzburg. They travelled thus for three days, conversing together, and on the 21st April arrived at Heidelberg. Luther went to lodge at the Augustine convent.

The Elector of Saxony had given him a letter to Count Palatine Wolfgang, duke of Bavaria. Luther repaired to his magnificent castle, the site of which is still the admiration of strangers. The monk of the plains of Saxony had a heart to admire the position of Heidelberg, where the two lovely valleys of the Rhine and the Neckar unite. He delivered his letter to James Simler, steward of the court. Simler having read it, said, "Truly you have here a valuable letter of credit." The count-palatine received him with much kindness, and often invited him, as well as Lange and Staupitz, to his table. This friendly reception added greatly to Luther's comfort. "We relax and amuse ourselves with an agreeable and pleasant chit-chat," says he, "eating and drinking, and surveying all the magnificence of the palatine palace, admiring its ornaments, its armoury, and cuirasses; in short, everything remarkable in this distinguished and truly royal castle."

However, Luther had other work to do. He behaved to work while it was day. Transported to an university which exercised great influence on the west and south of Germany, he was there to strike a blow which should shake the churches of those countries. He, accordingly, began to write theses which he proposed to maintain in a public discussion. Such discussions were of ordinary occurrence; but Luther felt, that in order to make his useful, it was necessary to give it a peculiar interest. His disposition, moreover, inclined him to present the truth under a paradoxical form. The professors of the university would not allow the discussion to take place in their public hall, and it became necessary to hold it in a hall of the Augustine convent. The 26th of April was the day on which it was to take place.

Heidelberg, at a later period, received the Gospel; and even at this discussion in the convent, an observer might have augured that good would result from it.

The reputation of Luther attracted a large concourse of hearers; professors, courtiers, citizens, and students, crowded to it. The doctor gave the name of "Paradoxes" to his theses; and it is, perhaps, the name which might still be applied to them in the present day. It would be easy, however, to translate them into evident propositions. The following are some of the Paradoxes:—

1. "The law of God is a salutary rule of life. Nevertheless, it cannot aid man in his search after righteousness; on the contrary, it impedes him.

3. "Works of man, how fair and good soever they may be, are, to all appearance, only mortal sins.

4. "Works of God, how deformed and bad soever they may appear, have always an immortal merit.

7. "The works of the just themselves would be mortal sins, did they not, through holy reverence for the Lord, fear that their works would in fact be mortal sins.

9. "To maintain that works done without Christ are dead, but not mortal, is dangerous forgetfulness of the fear of God.

13. "Since the fall of man, free will exists only in name, and when man does all that is possible for him to do, he sins mortally.

16. "A man who expects to attain to grace by doing all that it is possible for him to do, adds sin to sin, and doubles his guilt.

18. "It is certain that man, to become capable of receiving the grace of Christ, must entirely despair of himself.

21. "An honorary theologian calls evil good, and good evil; but a theologian of the cross speaks according to truth.

22. "The wisdom which teaches man to know the invisible perfections of God in His works, inflates, blinds, and hardens him.

23. "The law excites the wrath of God, kills, curses, accuses, judges, and condemns, whatever is not in Christ.

24. "Still this wisdom (§ 22) is not bad; and the law (§ 23) is not to be rejected; but the man who does not study the knowledge of God under the cross, changes its good into evil.

25. "He is not justified who does many works; but he who, without works, believes much in Jesus Christ.

26. "The law says, Do this! And what it commands is never done. Grace says, Believe in Him! and, lo! all things are accomplished.

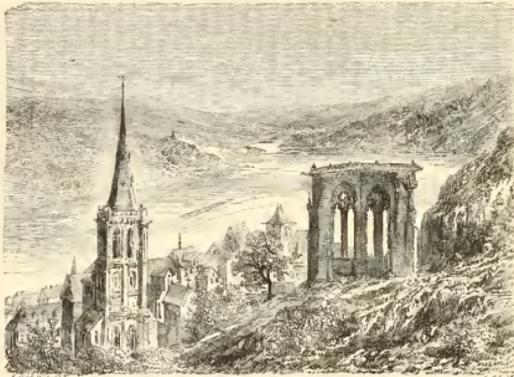

28. "The love of God finds nothing in man, but creates in him what it loves. The love of man proceeds from self-love."

Five doctors of theology attacked these theses. They had read them with the astonishment which novelty excites. The theology seemed to them very strange. Yet, according to Luther's own testimony, they discussed them with a courtesy which he could not but esteem; and, at the same time, with force and discernment.

Luther, on his part, displayed an admirable mildness in his replies, incomparable patience in listening to the objections of his opponents, and all the liveliness of St. Paul in solving the difficulties which were started. His answers, which were short, but replete with the Word of God, filled all the hearers with admiration. "He very much resembles Erasmus," said several; "but in one thing he surpasses him,—he professes openly what Erasmus is contented only to insinuate."

The discussion was drawing to a close. Luther's opponents had retired with honour from the field of battle; the youngest of them, Doctor George Nizer, alone continuing the struggle with the mighty combatant. Amazed at the bold propositions of the Augustine monk, and feeling utterly at a loss for arguments to refute them, he exclaimed, in an agitated tone,—“Were our peasants to hear such things, they would stone you to death.” At these words there was a general laugh throughout the audience.

Never had hearers listened more attentively to a theological disputation. The first words of the reformer had awakened men's minds; and questions which shortly before had met with indifference, were now full of interest. Several countenances gave visible expression to the new ideas which the bold assertions of the Saxon doctor had suggested to their minds.

Three youths in particular were strongly moved. One of them, named Martin Bucer, was a Dominican, of about twenty-seven years of age, who, notwithstanding the prejudices of his order, seemed unwilling to lose a single word which fell from the doctor. Born in a little town of Alsace, he had entered a convent at sixteen, and soon displayed such talents that the monks entertained the highest hopes of him. "He will one day be an ornament to our order," said they. His superiors had sent him to Heidelberg, that he might devote himself to the study of philosophy, theology, Greek, and Hebrew. At this period, Erasmus having published several of his works, Bucer read them with avidity.

Shortly after, the first works of Luther appeared, and the Alsatian student hastened to compare the reformer's doctrine with the Holy Scriptures. Some doubt as to the truth of the popish religion arose in his mind. This was the way in which light was diffused in those days. The elector-palatine took notice of the young man. His strong and sonorous voice, his pleasing address, his eloquence, and the freedom with which he attacked prevailing vices, made him a distinguished preacher. He was appointed chaplain to the court, and was acting in this capacity when Luther's journey to Heidelberg was announced. Bucer was greatly delighted; nobody repaired with greater eagerness to the hall of the Augustine convent. He had provided himself with paper, pens, and ink, wishing to write down whatever the doctor should say. But while his hand was rapidly tracing the words of Luther, the hand of God was writing the great truths which he heard in more ineffaceable characters on his heart. The rays of the doctrine of grace beamed upon his soul on this memorable occasion. The Dominican was gained over to Christ.

Not far from Bucer sat John Brentz or Brentius, then about nineteen years of age. Brentz, who was the son of a magistrate of a town in Swabia, had, at thirteen, been enrolled among the students of Heidelberg. None of them shewed such application. As soon as the hour of midnight struck, Brentz rose and commenced his labours. This practice became so habitual to him, that, during the rest of his life, he could never sleep beyond that hour. At a later period he devoted these still moments to meditation on the Scriptures. Brentz was one of the first to perceive the new light which then rose on Germany, and he received it into his soul in the full love of it. He read the writings of Luther with avidity, and must have been overjoyed at the prospect of hearing him personally at Heidelberg.

Young Brentz was particularly struck with one of the doctor's propositions, viz., "Not he who does many works is justified before God, but he who, without works, believes much in Jesus Christ."

A pious woman of Heilbronn, on the Neckar, wife of a councillor of that town, named Susepi, had, after the example of Hannah, dedicated her first-born to the Lord, earnestly desiring to see him devote himself to theology. The young man, who was born in 1495, made rapid progress in literature; but whether from taste or ambition, or compliance with his father's wishes, he devoted himself to the study of law. The pious mother was grieved when she saw her son Ehrhard following another course than that to which she had dedicated him. She warned and urged him, and always concluded by reminding him of the vow which she had made at his birth. At length, overcome by his mother's perseverance, Ehrhard Susepi yielded, and soon felt such delight in his new studies, that nothing in the world could have diverted him from them.

He was in terms of intimacy with Bucer and Brentz, and they remained friends all their lives; "for," says one of their biographers, "friendships founded on the love of literature and virtue are never extinguished." He was present with his two friends at the Heidelberg discussion. The Paradoxes and the bold struggle of the Wittemberg doctor gave Snepf a new impulse. Rejecting the vain dogma of human merit, he embraced the doctrine of free justification.

The next day Bucer paid a visit to Luther. "I conversed with him," says he, "and without witnesses, and had a most exquisite repast, not from the viands, but from the truths which were set before me. Whatever objections I stated, were readily answered by the doctor, who explained everything with the utmost clearness. Oh! that I had time to write you more about it." Luther himself was touched with the sentiments of Bucer. "He is the only friar of his order," wrote he to Spalatin, "who is in good faith. He is a young man of great promise; he received me with simplicity, and conversed with me with earnestness; he is deserving of our confidence and our love."

Brentz, Snepf, and others also, urged by the new truths which began to dawn upon their minds, in like manner visited Luther, speaking and conferring with him, and asking explanations of anything which they might not have comprehended. The reformer, in his answers, founded upon the Bible. At every word that fell from him fresh light arose, and his visitors saw a new world opening before them.

After Luther's departure these noble-minded men began to teach at Heidelberg. It was necessary to follow out what the man of God had begun, and not allow the torch which he had kindled to be extinguished. The scholars will speak should the masters be silent. Brentz, although he was still so youthful, explained St. Matthew, at first in his own room, and afterwards, when it could not contain his hearers, in the hall of philosophy. The theologians, filled with envy at seeing the great concourse which he drew together, were much offended.

Brentz next took orders, and transferred his lectures to the college of the Canons of the Holy Spirit. In this way the fire which had already been kindled in Saxony was kindled also in Heidelberg. The light radiated from numerous foci. This period has been designated the seed-time of the Palatinate.

But the fruits of the Heidelberg discussion were not confined to the Palatinate. These bold friends of the truth soon became luminaries in the Church. They all occupied eminent stations, and took part in the numerous discussions to which the Reformation gave rise. Strasburg, and at a later period England, were indebted to the labours of Bucer for a purer knowledge of the truth. Snepf taught first at Marburg, then at Stuttgard, Tubingen, and Jena. Brentz, after teaching at Heidelberg, long continued to labour at Halle, in Swabia, and at Tubingen. These three individuals will again come before us.

This discussion caused Luther himself to advance. He grew daily in the knowledge of the truth. "I am one of those," said he, "who have made progress by writing and by instructing others; and not one of those who, from nothing, become all at once great and learned doctors."

He was delighted at seeing the avidity with which youth in schools received the growing truth; and this consoled him when he saw how deeply the old doctors were rooted in their opinions. "I have the glorious hope," said he, "that, in like manner as Christ, when rejected by the Jews, went to the Gentiles, we will now see true theology, though rejected by these old men of vain and fantastical opinions, welcomed by the rising generation."

The chapter being closed, Luther thought of returning to Wittemberg. The count-palatine gave him a letter to the elector, in which he said that "Luther had displayed so much ability in the discussion as to reflect great glory on the university of Wittemberg." He was not permitted to return on foot. The Augustines of Nuremberg conducted him as far as Wurzburg, and from thence he proceeded to Erfurt with the friars belonging to it. As soon as he arrived, he called on his old master, Jodocus. The venerable professor, who had been much concerned and shocked at the career which his pupil had followed, was accustomed to put a theta (θ) before all Luther's sentences,—that being the letter which the Greeks used to express condemnation. He had written to the young doctor, censuring his conduct, and he was anxious to answer by word of mouth. Not having been received, he wrote Jodocus: "The whole university, with the exception of a single licentiate, thinks as I do. Nay, more, the prince, the bishop, several other prelates, and all our enlightened citizens, declare, with one voice, that hitherto they have neither known nor understood Jesus Christ and His Gospel. I am ready to receive your correction; and though it should be harsh, I will think it pleasant. Unbosom your heart, then, without fear, disburden yourself of your anger. I have no wish, I am not able to be angry with you. God and my conscience bear witness."

The aged doctor was touched by the sentiments of his old pupil, and wished to see if there was no means of removing the condemnatory theta. They had an explanation; but nothing resulted from it. "I have at least," said Luther, "made him understand, that all their sentences are like the beast which is said to eat itself. But it is vain to speak to the deaf. The doctors cling obstinately to their petty distinctions, although they confess that they have nothing to support them but what they term the light of natural reason—a dark chaos to us who proclaim no other light than Jesus Christ, the only true light."

Luther quitted Erfurt in the carriage of the convent. He was thus brought to Eisleben, and from thence the Augustines of the place, proud of a doctor who threw so much lustre on their order and on their town which had given him birth, caused him to be conveyed to Wittemberg with their own horses, and at their own expense. All were desirous to testify affection and esteem for the extraordinary man who was rising at every step.

He arrived on Saturday after the Ascension. The journey had done him good. His friends found him stronger and healthier looking than before his departure, and were delighted with all he told them. Luther repose for some time from the fatigues of his campaign and the discussion at Heidelberg; but this repose was only a preparation for more severe exertions.

BOOK IV.

LUTHER BEFORE THE LEGATE—MAY TO DECEMBER, 1518.

CHAPTER I.

Repentance—The Pope—Leo X.—Luther to his Bishop—Luther to the Pope—Luther to the Vicar-General—Rovers to the Elector—Discourse on Excommunication—Influence and Power of Luther.

TRUTH had at length raised her head in the bosom of Christendom. Victorious over the inferior organs of the papacy, she behoved to have a struggle with its chief. We are going to see Luther at close quarters with Rome.

This step was taken on his return from Heidelberg. His first theses on indulgences had been misunderstood, and he determined to explain their meaning with greater clearness. The outcry raised by the blind hatred of his enemies had convinced him how important it was to gain the most enlightened part of the nation in favour of truth, and he resolved to appeal to its judgment by calling attention to the foundation on which his convictions rested. It was, indeed, necessary for once to appeal to the decision of Rome; and he hesitates not to send all his explanations. Presenting them with one hand to the enlightened and impartial among his countrymen, he with the other lays them before the throne of the sovereign pontiff.

These explanations of his theses, which he denominated "Solutions," were written with great moderation. Luther tried to soften the passages which had caused most irritation, and gave proof of genuine modesty. At the same time he shewed that his convictions were immovable; and he courageously defended all the propositions which truth obliged him to maintain. He again repeated, that every Christian who truly repents possesses the remission of sins without indulgence; that the pope, like the humblest of priests, can only declare simply what God has already pardoned; that the treasure of the merits of the saints administered by the pope was a chimera; and that Holy Scripture was the only rule of faith. Let us hear himself on some of these points.

He begins with establishing the nature of true penitence, and contrasts the divine act, which renews man, with the ceremony of the Romish Church. "The Greek word μετανοεω," says he, "signifies—be clothed with a new spirit and new feelings; have a new nature; so that, ceasing to be earthly, you may become heavenly. . . . Christ is a teacher of the spirit and not of the letter, and His words are spirit and life." He, therefore, inculcates, not those external penances which the proudest sinners can perform without being humbled, but a repentance according to spirit and truth,—a repentance which may be fulfilled in all the situations of life, under the purple of kings, the cassock of priests, and the coronet of princes; amid the magnificence of Babylon, where a Daniel lived, as well as under a monk's frock and a beggar's tatters.

Further on we meet with these bold words; "I give myself no trouble as to what pleases or displeases the pope. He is a man like other men. There have been several popes who loved not only errors and vices, but even things still more extraordinary. I listen to the pope as pope; that is, when he speaks in the canons, according to the canons, or when he decides some article with a council; but not when he speaks out of his own head. If I did otherwise, would I not be bound to say with those who know not Jesus Christ, that the horrible massacres of Christians of which Julius II. was guilty, were the kind acts of an affectionate shepherd towards the Lord's sheep?"

"I cannot but be astonished," continues he, "at the simplicity of those who have said that the two swords of the Gospel represent,—the one the spiritual power, and the other the temporal. Yes, the pope holds a sword of steel, and so exhibits himself to Christendom, not as a tender father, but as a formidable tyrant. Ah! God in His anger has given us the sword we wished, and withdrawn that which we despised. In no quarter of the world have there been more dreadful wars than among Christians. . . . Why did the ingenious intellect which discovered this fine commentary, not with equal subtlety interpret the history of the two keys committed to St. Peter, and in that way make it an established dogma of the Church, that the one serves to open the treasures of heaven, and the other the treasures of the world?"

"It is impossible," he again says, "that a man can be a Christian without having Christ; and if he has Christ, he at the same time has all that belongs to Christ. The thing which gives peace to our conscience is, that by faith our sins are no longer ours, but Christ's, on whom God has laid them; and that, on the other hand, all the righteousness of Christ is ours, to whom God has given it. Christ puts His hand upon us and we are cured. He throws His mantle over us and we are covered; for He is the glorious Saviour, blessed for ever and ever."

With such views of the riches of salvation by Jesus Christ, there was no need of indulgences.

Luther, while attacking the papacy, speaks honourably of Leo X. "The times in which we live are so bad," says he, "that even the greatest personages cannot come to the help of the Church. We have now a very good pope in Leo X. His sincerity and knowledge fill us with joy. But what can one man, though amiable and agreeable, do by himself alone? He certainly deserved to be pope in better times. We, in our day, deserve only such popes as Julius II. and Alexander VI."

He afterwards comes to the crowning point: "I wish to say the thing in a few words and boldly. The Church stands in need of a reformation; and this cannot be the work either of a single man, like the pope, or of many men, like the cardinals, and fathers of councils; but it must be that of the whole world, or rather, it is a work which belongs to God only. As to the time in which such a reformation ought to begin, He alone who created time can tell. . . . The embankment is broken down, and it is no longer in our power to arrest the torrents which are rushing impetuously along."

Such are some of the thoughts and declarations which Luther addressed to the enlightened among his countrymen. The feast of Pentecost was at hand; and at this period, when the apostles rendered the first testimony of their faith to the risen Saviour, Luther, a new apostle, published this enlivening book, in which he expressed his earnest longings for a resurrection of the Church. Saturday, 22d May, 1518, being Pentecost eve, he sent his work to his ordinary, the bishop of Brandenburg, with the following letter:—

"MOST WORTHY FATHER IN GOD.—Some time ago, when a novel and unheard-of doctrine, touching the apostolic indulgences, began to make a noise in these countries, both learned and ignorant felt concerned; and many persons, some of them known to me, and others whom I did not even know by face, urged me to publish, by word of mouth, or by writing, what I thought of the novelty, I am unwilling to say, the impudence of this doctrine. At first I was silent, and kept back. But at length matters came to such a point, that the holiness of the pope was compromised.

"What was I to do? I thought it best neither to approve nor to condemn these doctrines; but to establish a discussion on this important point, until the holy Church should decide.

"Nobody having come forward to this combat, to which I had invited all the world, and my theses having been considered not as materials for discussion, but positive assertions, I feel myself obliged to publish an explanation of them. Deign, then, most gracious bishop, to receive these trifles at my hand. And that all the world may see I am not acting presumptuously, I supplicate your reverence to take pen and ink, and blot out, or even throw into the fire and burn, whatever in them displeases you. I know that Jesus Christ has no need of my labours and my services, and that He can very well, without me, publish good tidings to His Church. Not that the bulls and menaces of my enemies deter me,—very much the contrary. If they were not so impudent and so shameless, nobody would hear a word from me. I would shut myself up in a corner, and there study by myself for myself. If this affair is not of God, it certainly cannot be my affair, nor that of any man, but a thing of nought. Let the glory and honour be ascribed to Him to whom alone they belong."

Luther had still the greatest respect for the head of the Church. He supposed that there was justice in Leo X., and a sincere love of truth. He resolved, therefore, to apply to him also; and eight days after, on Trinity Sunday, 30th May, 1518, addressed him in a letter, of which we give the following extracts:—

"To the Most Blessed Father, LEO X., Sovereign Bishop,

"Friar Martin Luther, Augustine, wishes eternal salvation!

"I learn, most holy Father, that evil reports are current with regard to me, and that my name is brought into bad odour with your holiness. I am called heretic, apostate, traitor, and a thousand other opprobrious epithets. What I see astonishes; what I hear amazes me. But the only foundation of my tranquillity remains, and that is a pure and peaceful conscience. Be pleased to listen to me, most holy Father,—to me, who am only an ignorant child."

Luther relates the origin of the whole affair, and continues thus:—

"In all taverns nothing was heard but complaints of the avarice of priests, and attacks on the power of the keys and the sovereign pontiff. This all Germany can testify. On hearing these things, my zeal for the glory of Christ was moved, (so I thought,) or if they will explain it otherwise, my young and boiling blood was inflamed.

"I warned several of the princes of the Church; but some mocked me, and others turned a deaf ear. All seemed paralyzed by the terror of your name. Then I published the discussion.

"And this, most holy Father! this is the fire which is said to have set the whole world in flames!

"Now, what must I do? I cannot retract, and I see that this publication is subjecting me to inconceivable hatred in all quarters. I love not to stand forth in the midst of the world; for I am without knowledge, without talent, and far too feeble for such great things, especially in this illustrious age, in which Cicero himself, were he alive, would be obliged to hide in some obscure corner.

"But in order to appease my adversaries, and respond to numerous solicitations, I here publish my thoughts. I publish them, holy Father, that I may place myself in safety under the shadow of your wings. All who are willing will thus be able to understand with what simplicity of heart I have asked the ecclesiastical authority to instruct me, and what respect I have shewn for the power of the keys. If I had not managed the affair in a becoming manner, it is impossible that the most serene lord Frederick, duke and elector of Saxony, who shines among the friends of apostolical and Christian truth, would ever have tolerated, in his university of Wittenberg, a man so dangerous as I am represented to be.

"Wherefore, most holy Father, I throw myself at the feet of your holiness, and submit to you with all I have, and all I am. Destroy my cause, or embrace it; decide for me, or decide against me; take my life, or restore it to me, just as you please. I will recognise your voice as the voice of Jesus Christ, who presides and speaks by you. If I have deserved death, I refuse not to die. The earth belongs unto the Lord, and all that it contains. Let Him be praised to all eternity. Amen. May He sustain you for ever and ever. Amen.

"On the day of the Holy Trinity, in the year 1518.

"FRIAR MARTIN LUTHER, Augustine."

What humility and truth in this fear, or rather in this confession of Luther, that his young and boiling blood had, perhaps, been too quickly inflamed! We here recognise the man of sincerity, who, not presuming on himself, fears the influence of passion even in those of his actions which are most conformable to the Word of God. There is a wide difference between this language and that of a proud fanatic. We see in Luther an earnest desire to gain over Leo to the cause of truth, to prevent all disruption, and make this reformation, the necessity of which he proclaims, come from the very pinnacle of the Church. Assuredly he is not the person who ought to be charged with destroying in the West that unity, the loss of which was afterwards so much regretted. He sacrificed everything in order to maintain it.—everything but truth. It was not he, but his adversaries, who, by refusing to acknowledge the fulness and sufficiency of the salvation wrought out by Jesus Christ, are chargeable with having rent the Saviour's robe at the foot of the cross.

After writing this letter, Luther, the very same day, addressed his friend Staupitz, vicar-general of his order. It was through him he wished his "Solutions" and his epistle to reach Leo.

"I pray you," says he to him, "kindly to accept the miserable things which I send you, and transmit them to the excellent pope, Leo X. Not that I would thereby drag you into the perils to which I am exposed. I wish to take all the danger to myself. Jesus Christ will see whether what I have said comes from Him or comes from me—Jesus Christ, without whose will neither the tongue of the pope can move, nor the hearts of kings resolve.

"To those who threaten me I have no answer to give, unless it be the remark of Reuchlin: 'The poor man has nothing to fear, for he has nothing to lose.' I have neither money nor goods, and I ask none. If I once possessed some honour and some reputation, let him that has begun to strip me of them finish his work. I have nothing left but this miserable body, enfeebled by so many trials; let them kill it by force or fraud, to the glory of God. In this way they will, perhaps, shorten my life an hour or two. Enough for me to have a precious Redeemer, a powerful Priest, Jesus Christ the Lord!—I will praise Him while I have a breath of life; and if none will praise Him with me, how can I help it?"

These words enable us to read Luther's heart.

While he was thus looking with confidence towards Rome, Rome had thoughts of vengeance towards him. On the 3d of April, Cardinal Raphael de Rovere had written to the Elector Frederick, in the pope's name, stating that suspicions were entertained of his faith, and that he ought to beware of protecting Luther.

"Cardinal Raphael," says Luther, "would have had great pleasure in seeing me burned by Duke Frederick." Thus Rome began to whet her arms against Luther, and the first blow which she aimed at him was through the mind of his protector. If she succeeded in destroying the shelter under which the monk of Wittenberg was reposing, he would become an easy prey.

The German princes attached much importance to their reputation as Christian princes. The slightest suspicion of heresy filled them with alarm, and the court of Rome had shrewdly availed itself of this feeling. Frederick, moreover, had always been attached to the religion of his fathers, and Raphael's letter made a very strong impression on his mind. But it was a principle with the elector not to act hastily in anything. He knew that truth was not always on the side of the strongest. The transactions of the empire with Rome had taught him to distrust the selfish views of that court; and he was aware that in order to be a Christian prince, it was not necessary to be the pope's slave.

"He was not," says Melancthon, "one of those profane spirits who wish to stifle all changes in their first beginnings. Frederick resigned himself to God. He carefully read the writings which were published, and what he judged true he allowed no one to destroy." He had power to do so. Supreme in his own states, he was respected in the empire, at least as highly as the emperor himself.

It is probable that Luther learned something of this letter of Cardinal Raphael, which was sent to the elector on the 7th of July. Perhaps it was the prospect of excommunication which this Roman missive seemed to presage, that led him to mount the pulpit of Wittenberg on the 15th of the same month, and on this subject deliver a discourse which made a profound impression. He distinguished between internal and external excommunication,—the former excluding from communion with God, and the latter excluding only from the ceremonies of the Church. "Nobody," says he, "can reconcile a lapsed soul with God save God himself. Nobody can separate man from communion with God unless it be man himself by his own sins! Happy he who dies unjustly excommunicated! While for righteousness's sake he endures a heavy infliction on the part of man, he receives the crown of eternal felicity from the hand of God."

Some highly applauded this bold language, while others were more irritated by it. But Luther was no longer alone; and although his faith needed no other support than that of God, a phalanx of defence against his enemies was formed around him. The Germans had heard the voice of the reformer. His discourses and his writings sent forth flashes which awoke and illumined his contemporaries. The energy of his faith fell in torrents of fire on slumbering hearts. The life which God had infused into this extraordinary soul was imparted to the dead body of the Church; and Christendom, which had for so many ages been motionless, was animated with a religious enthusiasm. The devotedness of the people to the superstitions of Rome diminished every day, and the number of hands which offered money for the purchase of pardon became fewer and fewer, while at the same time Luther's fame continued to increase. People turned towards him, and hailed him with love and respect, as the intrepid defender of truth and liberty. No doubt the full depth of the doctrines which he announced was not perceived. It was enough for the greater number to know that the new doctor withstood the pope, and that the empire of priests and monks was shaken by his powerful word. To them the attack of Luther was like one of those fires which are kindled on mountain tops, as the signal for a whole nation to rise and burst its chains. Before the reformer suspected what he had done, all the generous hearted among his countrymen had already acknowledged him for their leader. To many, however, the appearance of Luther was something more. The Word of God, which he wielded with so much power, pierced their minds like a sharp two-edged sword; and their hearts were inflamed with an ardent desire to obtain the assurance of pardon and eternal life. Since primitive times, the Church had not known such hungering and thirsting after righteousness. If the preaching of Peter the Hermit and Bernard so aroused the population of the Middle Ages as to make them take up a perishable cross, the preaching of Luther disposed those of his time to embrace the true cross,—the truth which saves. The framework which then lay with all its weight on the Church had smothered everything; the form had destroyed the life. But the powerful word given to Luther caused a quickening breath to circulate over the soil of Christendom. At the first glance, the writings of Luther were equally captivating to believers and unbelievers,—to unbelievers, because the positive doctrines afterwards to be established were not yet fully developed in them; and to believers, because they contained the germ of that living faith which they so powerfully express. Hence the influence of these writings was immense. They spread almost instantaneously over Germany and the world. The prevailing impression of men everywhere was, that they were assisting, not at the establishment of a sect, but at a new birth of the Church and of Society. Those who were born of the Spirit of God ranged themselves around him who was its organ. Christendom was divided into two camps,—the one leagued with the spirit against the form, and the other with the form against the spirit. It is true that on the side of the form were all the appearances of strength and grandeur, and on the side of the spirit those of feebleness and insignificance. But the form, devoid of the spirit, is a lifeless body, which the first breath may upset. Its appearance of power only provokes hostility, and accelerates its downfall. In this way the simple truth had placed Luther at the head of a mighty army.

CHAPTER II.

Diet at Augsburg—The Emperor to the Pope—The Elector to Rovere—Luther cited to Rome—Luther's Peace—Intercession of the University—Papal Brief—Luther's Indignation—The Pope to the Elector.

This army was needed, for the great began to move. Both the empire and the Church were uniting their efforts to rid themselves of this troublesome monk. Had the imperial throne been occupied by a brave and energetic prince, he might have profited by these religious agitations; and, throwing himself on God and the nation, given new force to the former opposition to the papacy. But Maximilian was too old, and was determined, moreover, to sacrifice everything to what he regarded as the end of his existence,—the aggrandisement of his house, and through it the exaltation of his grandson.

The Emperor Maximilian at this time held a diet at Augsburg. Six electors attended in person; and all the Germanic states were represented at it; while the kings of France, Hungary, and Poland sent their ambassadors. All these princes and envoys appeared in great splendour. The war against the Turks was one of the subjects for which the diet had assembled. The legate of Leo X. strongly urged the prosecution of it; but the states, instructed by the bad use which had formerly been made of their contributions, and sagely counselled by the Elector Frederick, contented themselves with declaring that they would take the matter into consideration, and, at the same time, produced new grievances against Rome. A Latin discourse, published during the diet, boldly called the attention of the German princes to the true danger. "You wish," said the author, "to put the Turk to flight. This is well; but I am much afraid that you are mistaken as to his person. It is not in Asia, but in Italy, that you ought to seek him."

Another affair of no less importance was to occupy the diet. Maximilian was desirous that his grandson Charles, already king of Spain and Naples, should be proclaimed king of the Romans, and his successors in the imperial dignity. The pope knew his interest too well to wish the imperial throne to be occupied by a prince whose power in Italy might prove formidable to him. The emperor thought he had already gained the greater part of the electors and states; but he found a strenuous opponent in Frederick. In vain did he solicit him, and in vain did the ministers and best friends of the elector join their entreaties to those of the emperor. Frederick was immovable, and proved the truth of what has been said of him, that when once satisfied of the justice of a resolution, he had firmness of soul never to abandon it. The emperor's design failed.

From this time the emperor sought to gain the goodwill of the pope, in order to render him favourable to his plans; and, as a special proof of his devotedness, on the 5th August, wrote him the following letter:—"Most holy Father, we learned, some days ago, that a friar of the Augustine order, named Martin Luther, has begun to maintain divers propositions as to the commerce in indulgences. Our displeasure is the greater because the said friar finds many protectors, among whom are powerful personages. If your holiness and the very reverend fathers of the Church (the cardinals) do not forthwith employ their authority, to put an end to these scandals, not only will these pernicious doctors seduce the simple, but they will involve great princes in their ruin. We will take care that whatever your holiness may decide on this matter, for the glory of Almighty God, shall be observed by all in our empire."

This letter must have been written after some rather keen discussion between Maximilian and Frederick. The same day the elector wrote to Raphael de Rovere. He had, doubtless, learned that the emperor was addressing the Roman pontiff, and to parry the blow, he put himself in communication with Rome.

"I can have no other wish," said he, "than to shew myself submissive to the universal Church. Accordingly, I have never defended the writings and sermons of Doctor Martin Luther. I understand, moreover, that he has always offered to appear with a safe-conduct before impartial, learned, and Christian judges, in order to defend his doctrine, and submit, in the event of being convinced by Scripture itself."

Leo X., who had hitherto allowed the affair to take its course, aroused by the cries of theologians and monks, instituted an ecclesiastical court, which was to try Luther at Rome, and in which Sylvester Priore, the great enemy of the reformer, was at once accuser and judge. The charge was soon drawn up, and Luther was summoned by the court to appear personally in sixty days.

Luther was at Wittenberg, calmly awaiting the good effect which his humble letter to the pope was, as he imagined, to produce, when, on the 7th of August, only two days after the despatch of the letters of Maximilian and Frederick, he received the citation from the Roman tribunal. "At the moment," says he, "when I was expecting the benediction, I saw the thunder burst upon me. I was the lamb troubling the water to the wolf. Tetzels escapes, and I must allow myself to be eaten."

This citation threw Wittenberg into consternation; for whatever course Luther might adopt, he could not avert the danger. If he repaired to Rome, he must there become the victim of his enemies. If he refused to go, he would, as a matter of course, be condemned for contumacy, without being able to escape; for it was known that the legate had received orders from the pope to do everything he could do to irritate the emperor and the German princes against him. His friends were in dismay. Must the teacher of truth go with his life in his hand to that great city, drunk with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus! Is it sufficient to ensure any man's destruction that he has raised his head from the bosom of enslaved Christendom? Must this man, whom God appears to have formed for resisting a power which hitherto nothing has been able to resist, be also overthrown? Luther himself saw no one who could save him, unless it were the elector; but he would rather die than endanger his prince. His friends at last fell on an expedient which would not compromise Frederick. Let him refuse a safe-conduct, and Luther will have a legitimate cause for refusing to appear at Rome.

On the 8th of August, Luther wrote to Spalatin, praying that the elector would employ his influence to have him cited in Germany. He also wrote to Staupitz: "See what ambuscades they use to ensnare me, and how I am surrounded with thorns. But Christ lives and reigns, to-day, yesterday, and for ever. My conscience assures me that what I have taught is the truth, though it becomes still more odious when I teach it. The Church is like the womb of Rebecca. The children must struggle together so as even to endanger the life of the mother. As to what remains, entreat the Lord that I may not have too much joy in this trial. May God not lay the sin to their charge."

The friends of Luther did not confine themselves to consultation and complaint. Spalatin, on the part of the elector, wrote to Renner, the emperor's secretary: "Dr. Martin is very willing that his judges shall be all the universities of Germany, with the exception of those of Erfurt, Leipsic, and Frankfort-on-the-Oder, which he has ground to suspect. It is impossible for him to appear personally at Rome."

The university of Wittenberg wrote a letter of intercession to the pope himself, and thus spoke of Luther: "The feebleness of his body, and the dangers of the journey, make it difficult, and even impossible for him to obey the order of your holiness. His distress and his prayers dispose us to have compassion on him. We, then, as obedient sons, entreat you, most holy Father, to be pleased to regard him as a man who has never taught doctrines in opposition to the sentiments of the Roman Church." On the same day the university, in its anxiety, addressed Charles de Miltitz, a Saxon gentleman,—the chamberlain, and a great favourite of the pope,—and bore testimony to Luther in terms still stronger than those which it had ventured to insert in the former letter. "The worthy father, Martin Luther, Augustine, is the noblest and most honourable man of our university. For several years we have seen and known his ability, his knowledge, his high attainments in arts and literature, his irreplicable manners, and his altogether Christian conduct."

This active charity on the part of all who were about Luther, is his finest eulogium.

While the issue was anxiously waited for, the affair terminated more easily than might have been supposed. The Legate de Vio, chagrined at not having succeeded in the commission which he had received to prepare a general war against the Turks, was desirous to give lustre to his embassy in Germany by some other brilliant exploit; and thinking that if he extinguished heresy he would reappear at Rome with glory, he asked the pope to remit the affair to him. Leo felt himself under obligation to Frederick, for having so strenuously opposed the election of young Charles, and was aware that he might still want his assistance. Accordingly, without adverting to the citation, he charged his legate by a brief, dated 23d of August, to examine the affair in Germany. The pope lost nothing by this mode of proceeding; and, at the same time, if Luther could be brought to a retraction, the noise and scandal which his appearance at Rome might have occasioned were avoided.

"We charge you," said he, "to bring personally before you, to pursue and constrain without delay, and as soon as you receive this our letter, the said Luther, who has already been declared heretic by our dear brother, Jerome, bishop of Asculan."

Then the pope prescribes the severest measures against Luther.

"For this purpose invoke the arm and assistance of our very dear son in Christ, Maximilian, the other princes of Germany, and all its commonalities, universities, and powers ecclesiastical or secular; and if you apprehend him, keep him in safe custody, in order that he may be brought before us."

We see that this indulgent concession of the pope was little else than a surer method of dragging Luther to Rome. Next follow the gentle measures:—

"If he returns to himself, and asks pardon for his great crime, asks it of himself, and without being urged to do it, we give you power to receive him into the unity of Holy Mother Church."

The pope soon returns to malediction.

"If he persists in his obstinacy, and you cannot make yourself master of his person, we give you power to proscribe him in all parts of Germany; to banish, curse, and excommunicate all who are attached to him, and to order all Christians to shun their presence."

Still, this is not enough. The pope continues:—

"And in order that this contagion may be the more easily extirpated, you will excommunicate all prelates, religious orders, communities, counts, dukes, and grandees, except the Emperor Maximilian, who shall refuse to seize the said Martin Luther and his adherents, and send them to you, under due and sufficient guard. And if (which God forbid) the said princes, communities, universities, grandees, or any one belonging to them, offer an asylum to the said Martin and his adherents, in any way, and give him, publicly or in secret, by themselves or others, aid and counsel, we lay under interdict these princes, communities, and grandees, with their towns, burghs, fields, and villages, whither said Martin may flee, as long as he shall remain there, and for three days after he shall have left."

This audacious chair, which pretends to be the representative on earth of Him who has said, God sent not His Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through Him might be saved, continues its anathemas; and, after having denounced penalties against ecclesiastics, proceeds:—

"In regard to the laity, if they do not obey your orders instantly, and without any opposition, we declare them infamous, (with the exception of the most worthy emperor,) incapable of performing any lawful act, deprived of Christian burial, and stript of alliefs which they may hold, whether of the apostolic see, or of any other superior whatsoever."

Such was the fate which awaited Luther. The monarch of Rome has legued for his destruction; and to effect it, spared nothing,—not even the peace of the tomb. His ruin seems inevitable. How will he escape this immense conspiracy? But Rome had miscalculated. A movement produced by the Spirit of God was not to be quelled by the decrees of its chancery.

Even the forms of a just and impartial inquest had not been observed. Luther had been declared heretic, not only without having been heard, but even before the expiry of the period named for his appearance. The passions (and nowhere do they shew themselves stronger than in religious discussions) overleap all the forms of justice. Strange proceedings, in this respect, occur, not only in the Church of Rome, but in Protestant churches also which have turned aside from the Gospel; in other words, in all places where the truth is not, every thing done against the Gospel is deemed lawful. We often see men who, in any other case, would scruple to commit the smallest injustice, not hesitating to trample under foot all forms and all rights when the matter in question is Christianity, and the testimony born to it.

When Luther was afterwards made acquainted with this brief, he expressed his indignation. "Here," says he, "is the most remarkable part of the whole affair. The brief is dated on the 23rd of August, and I was cited for the 7th of August; so that between the citation and the brief there is an interval of sixteen days. Now, make the calculation, and you will find that my Lord Jerome, bishop of Ascoli, has proceeded against me, given judgment, condemned, and declared me heretic, before the citation could have reached me, or at most sixteen days after it had been despatched to me. Now, I ask, where are the sixty days given me in the citation? They commenced on the 7th August, and were to end on the 7th October. Is it the style and fashion of the court of Rome to cite, admonish, accuse, judge, and pronounce sentence of condemnation, all in one day, against a man who is at such a distance from Rome, that he knows nothing at all of the proceedings? What answer would they give to this? Doubtless, they forgot to purge themselves with helebore before proceeding to such falsehoods."

But at the same time that Rome was secretly depositing her thunders in the hands of her legate, she was endeavouring, by smooth and flattering words, to detach the prince whose power she most dreaded from Luther's cause. The same day, 25th August, 1518, the pope wrote the Elector of Saxony. Recurring to those wiles of ancient policy which we have already pointed out, he endeavoured to flatter the prince's self-love.

"Dear son," said the Roman pontiff, "when we think on your noble and honourable race, and on yourself, its head and ornament; when we recollect how you and your ancestors have always desired to maintain Christian faith, and the honour and dignity of the holy see, we cannot believe that a man who abandons the faith can trust to the favour of your highness, in giving loose reins to his wickedness. And yet it is told us from all quarters that a certain friar, Martin Luther, hermit of the order of St. Augustine, has, like a child of malice, and a contemner of God, forgotten his habit and his order, which consist in humility and obedience, and is boasting that he fears neither the authority nor the punishment of any man, because assured of your favour and protection.

"But, as we know that he is mistaken, we have thought good to write to your highness, and exhort you, according to the Lord, to be vigilant for the honour of your name as a Christian prince, and to defend yourself from these calumnies,—yourself the ornament, the glory, and sweet savour of your noble race,—and to guard, not only against a fault so grave as that which is imputed to you, but also against even the suspicion which the insensate hardness of this friar tends to excite against you."

Leo X., at the same time, announced to Frederick that he had charged Cardinal Saint Sixtus to examine the affair, and he enjoined him to put Luther into the hands of the legate, "lest," added he, returning again to his favourite argument,—“lest the pious people of our time, and of future times, may one day lament and say, The most pernicious heresy with which the Church of God has been afflicted, was excited by the favour and support of this high and honourable house."

Thus Rome had taken all her measures. With one hand she diffused the perfume of praise, which is always so intoxicating, while the other held terrors and vengeance.

All the powers of the earth—emperor, pope, princes, and legates—began to move against this humble friar of Erfurt, whose internal combats we have already traced. The kings of the earth stood up, and the rulers took counsel together against the Lord, and against His anointed.

CHAPTER III.

The Armourer Schwarzerd—His Wife—Philip—His Genius—His Studies—
The Bible—Call to Wittenberg—Melancthon's Departure and Journey
—Leipsic—Mistake—Luther's Joy—Parallel—Revolution in Education —Study of Greek.

THE letter and brief had not reached Germany, and Luther was still fearing that he would be obliged to appear at Rome, when a happy event gave comfort to his heart. He needed a friend to whom he could unbosom his sorrows, and whose faithful love would solace him in his hours of depression. All this God gave him in Melancthon.

On the 14th February, 1497, George Schwarzerd, a skilful armour-master of Bretten, a small town in the palatinate, had a son born to him, who was named Philip, and who afterwards distinguished himself under the name of Melancthon. Patronized by the palatine princes, and those of Bavaria and Saxony, George was a man of unimpeachable integrity. He often refused the price which purchasers offered him; and on learning that they were poor, insisted on returning their money. He rose regularly at midnight, and on his knees offered up a prayer. If on any occasion morning arrived without his having done it, he felt dissatisfied with himself the whole day. Barbara, Schwarzerd's wife, was daughter of an honourable magistrate named John Reuter. She was of a gentle temper, somewhat inclined to superstition, but otherwise remarkable for wisdom and prudence. From her we have the old well-known German rhymes,—

"The giving of alms impoverisheth not;
Attendance at church impedeeth not;
Greasing the wheel retardeth not;
Ill-gotten gear enricheth not;
The Book of God deceiveth not."

And again,—

"Those who are pleased more to expend
Than their fields can render,
Must come to ruin in the end,—
It may be to a halter."

Young Philip was not eleven when his father died. Two days before, George called his son to his bedside, and exhorted him to have the thought of God always present. "I foresee," said the dying armourer, "that dreadful storms are coming to shake the world. I have seen great things, but greater are in preparation. May God guide and direct you!" Philip, after receiving his father's blessing, was sent to Spire, that he might not be present at his death. He departed crying bitterly.

The young boy's grandfather, the worthy bailie Reuter, who had also a son, acted as a father to him, and took him, together with his brother, George, under his own roof. Shortly after, he gave the three boys for tutor John Hungarus, an excellent man, who afterwards, and at a very advanced age, became a powerful preacher of the Gospel. He let nothing pass in the young man, punishing him for every fault, yet with discretion. "In this way," says Melancthon, in 1554, "he made me a grammarian. He loved me as a son, I loved him as a father; and we will meet, I trust, in eternal life."

Philip was remarkable for the excellence of his understanding, and for his facility in learning, and expounding what he had learned. He could not endure idleness, and always sought out some one with whom he might discuss what he had heard. It often happened that educated strangers passed through Bretten, and visited Reuter. The bailie's grandson instantly accosted them, entered into conversation with them, and so pressed them in discussion as to excite the wonder of those present. To a powerful genius he joined great sweetness of temper, and was hence a general favourite. He had a stammer; but, like the celebrated orator of the Greeks, made such exertions to overcome it, that it afterwards completely disappeared.

His grandfather having died, Philip was sent with his brother and his young uncle, John, to the school of Pforzheim. The boys resided with one of their relatives, the sister of the famous Reuchlin. Eager for knowledge, Philip, under the tuition of George Simler, made rapid progress in science, and especially in the study of Greek, for which he had a real passion. Reuchlin often came to Pforzheim; and having become acquainted with his sister's young boarders, was soon struck with Philip's answers, and gave him a Greek grammar and a Bible. These two books were to be the study of his whole life.

When Reuchlin returned from his second journey into Italy, his young relative, then twelve years of age, with some friends, performed a Latin comedy of his own composition before him, in honour of his arrival. Reuchlin, in raptures with the talents of the youth, embraced him tenderly, called him his dear son, and jocularly gave him the red bonnet which he had received on being made doctor. It was at this time that Reuchlin changed his name of Schwarzerd into that of Melancthon. Both words, the one German and the other Greek, mean black earth. It was a general custom with the learned thus to change their names into Greek or Latin.

Melancthon, at twelve, repaired to the university of Heidelberg, and began to gratify his eager thirst for knowledge. He was admitted bachelor at fourteen. In 1512 Reuchlin invited him to Tubingen, which contained a great number of distinguished literary men. Here he attended at the same time lectures on theology, medicine, and jurisprudence. There was no branch of knowledge which he did not think it his duty to study. His object was not praise, but the possession of science and the benefits of it.

The Holy Scriptures particularly occupied him. Those who frequented the church of Tubingen had often observed a book in his hands, which he studied between the services. This unknown volume seemed larger than the common prayer books; and the report spread that Philip, when in church, read profane books. It turned out that the object of their suspicion was a copy of the Holy Scriptures, printed a short time before at Basle by John Frobenius. This volume he studied through life with unwearied application. He had it always with him, carrying it to all the public meetings to which he was invited. Rejecting the vain system of the schoolmen, he devoted himself to the simple word of the Gospel. Erasmus at this time wrote to Ecolampadius: "Of Melancthon I have the highest opinion, and the highest hopes. Jesus grant that this young man may have a long life! He will completely eclipse Erasmus." Melancthon, nevertheless, shared in the errors of his age. "I shudder," says he, in advanced life, "when I think of the honour which I paid to images when I was still in the papacy."

In 1514 he was made doctor in philosophy, and began to teach. His age was seventeen. The grace and attractiveness which he gave to his lectures formed a striking contrast to the insipid method which the doctors, and especially the monks, had hitherto pursued. He took an active part in the combat in which Reuchlin was engaged with the Obscurants of his age. His agreeable conversation, his gentle and elegant manners, gaining him the love of all who knew him, he soon acquired great authority, and a solid reputation in the world.

At this time, the Elector Frederick having conceived the idea of inviting some distinguished professor of ancient languages to his university of Wittemberg, applied to Reuchlin, who suggested Melancthon. Frederick saw all the lustre which this young Hellenist might shed on an institution which was so dear to him; and Reuchlin, delighted at seeing so fine a field opened to his young friend, addressed him in the words of Jehovah to Abraham: "Come out from thy country, and thy kindred, and thy father's house, and I will render thy name great, and thou shalt be blessed." Yes," continues the old man, "I hope it will be so with thee, my dear Philip, my work and my comfort." In this invitation Melancthon saw a call from God. The university was grieved to part with him, and yet he was not without envious rivals and enemies. He left his native country, exclaiming, "The will of the Lord be done." He was then twenty-one years of age.

Melancthon made the journey on horseback, in company with some Saxon merchants, in the same way in which caravans travel in the desert; for, says Reuchlin, he knew neither the towns nor the roads. At Augsburg he did homage to the elector, who happened to be there. At Nuremberg he saw the excellent Pirckheimer, whom he already knew; and at Leipsic formed an intimacy with the learned Hellenist, Mosellanus. In this last town the university gave a fête in honour of him. It was a truly academic repast. The dishes were numerous; and as each made its appearance, a professor rose and addressed Melancthon in a Latin discourse previously prepared. He immediately gave an extempore reply. At length, worn out with so much eloquence, "Most illustrious friends," said he, "allow me to reply once for all to your addresses; for not being prepared, I cannot put as much variety into my replies as you into your addresses." Thereafter the dishes arrived without the accompaniment of a discourse.

Reuchlin's young relative arrived at Wittemberg, 25th August, 1518, two days after Leo X. had signed the brief addressed to Cajetan, and the letter to the elector.

The professors of Wittemberg did not receive Melancthon with so much favour as those of Leipsic had done. The first impression which he made upon them did not correspond to their expectations. They saw a young man who seemed still younger than he really was, of small stature, and a feeble, timid air. Is this the illustrious doctor whom the greatest men of the age, Erasmus and Reuchlin, extol so loudly? . . . Neither Luther, with whom he first was made acquainted, nor his colleagues, conceived high hopes of him, when they saw his youth, his embarrassment, and whole appearance.

MELANCTHON.

(From the original by Albert Durer, in the British Portrait Gallery.)

Four days after his arrival (29th August) he delivered his inaugural address. The whole university was assembled. The boy, as Luther calls him, spoke such elegant Latin, and displayed so much knowledge, a mind so cultivated, and a judgment so sound, that all his hearers were filled with admiration.

At the termination of the address all pressed forward to congratulate him; but none felt more joy than Luther, who hastened to communicate to his friends the feelings with which his heart was overflowing. Writing Spalatin, 31st August, he says: "Melancthon, four days after his arrival, delivered an address so beautiful and so learned, that it was listened to with universal approbation and astonishment. We have soon got the better of the prejudices which his stature and personal appearance had produced. We praise and admire his eloquence; we thank the prince and you for the service you have done us. I ask no other Greek master. But I fear that his delicate body will not be able to digest our food, and that, on account of the smallness of his salary, we shall not keep him long. I hear that the Leipzig folks are already boasting of being able to carry him off from us. Oh, my dear Spalatin, beware of despising his age and personal appearance. He is a man worthy of all honour."

Melancthon immediately began to explain Homer and St. Paul's Epistle to Titus. He was full of ardour. "I will do my utmost," wrote he to Spalatin, "to bring Wittenberg into favour with all who love literature and virtue." Four days after the inauguration, Luther again wrote to Spalatin: "I recommend to you most particularly the very learned and very amiable Greek, Philip. His class-room is always full. All the theologians, in particular, attend him. He sets all classes, from the highest to the lowest, to the learning of Greek."

Melancthon was able to return the affection of Luther, in whom he soon discovered a goodness of heart, a strength of intellect, a courage and a wisdom, which he had not previously found in any man. He venerated and loved him. "If there is any one," said he, "whom I love strongly, and whom my whole soul embraces, it is Martin Luther."

Thus met Luther and Melancthon, and they were friends till death. We cannot sufficiently admire the goodness and wisdom of God in uniting two men so different, and yet so necessary to each other. What Luther had in warmth, elasticity, and force, Melancthon had in perspicuity, wisdom, and gentleness. Luther animated Melancthon; Melancthon moderated Luther. They were like the two forms of electric matter—the positive and the negative—which modify each other. Had Luther been without Melancthon, the stream had, perhaps, overflowed its banks; and, on the other hand, Melancthon, when without Luther, hesitated, and even yielded, where he ought to have stood firm.¹ Luther did much by vigour, and Melancthon, perhaps, did not less by pursuing a slower and calmer course. Both were upright, open, and generous, and both, smitten with the love of the Word of eternal life, served it with a fidelity and devotedness which formed the distinguishing feature of their lives.

The arrival of Melancthon produced a revolution, not only at Wittenberg, but throughout Germany and the learned world. His study of the Greek and Latin classics, and of philosophy, had given him an order, perspicuity, and precision of thought, which shed new light and inexpressible beauty on all the subjects which he discussed. The mild spirit of the Gospel fertilized and enlivened his meditations; and the driest subjects, when he expounded them, were invested with a grace which fascinated all his hearers. The sterility which scholasticism had spread over education ceased, and a new mode of instruction and study commenced. "Thanks to Melancthon," says a distinguished German historian, "Wittenberg became the national school."

It was, indeed, of great importance that a man thoroughly versed in Greek should teach in this university, where the new developments of theology called masters and scholars to study the primitive documents of the Christian faith in the original languages. Thenceforth Luther set himself zealously to this task. Often did the meaning of a Greek term, which had previously been unknown to him, throw sudden light on his theological views. For example, how great his satisfaction and delight when he saw that the Greek word which, according to the Latin Church, meant a penance, a satisfaction enacted by the Church, meant in Greek a transformation or conversion of heart. A thick mist all at once disappeared from before his eyes. The two meanings given to this word are sufficient to characterize the two churches.

The impulse which Melancthon gave to Luther, in regard to the translation of the Bible, is one of the most remarkable circumstances in the friendship of these two great men. As early as 1517, Luther had made some attempts at translation, and procured as many Greek and Latin books as he could. Now, aided by his dear Philip, his task received a new impetus. Luther obliged Melancthon to take part in his researches, by consulting him on difficult passages; and the work, destined to be one of the greatest works of the reformer, advanced more surely and more rapidly.

Melancthon, on his part, became acquainted with a new theology. The beautiful and profound doctrine of justification by faith filled him with astonishment and joy. Still, in receiving the system Luther professed, he acted independently, moulding it according to the particular form of his own intellect; for, although he was only twenty-one years of age, he was one of those precocious minds which enter early into possession of all their powers, and are themselves from the very outset.

The zeal of the masters was soon transfused into the scholars. It was proposed to reform the course of study. With the concurrence of the elector, certain branches, only of scholastic importance, were suppressed, and at the same time a new impulse was given to classic pursuits. The school of Wittenberg underwent a transformation, and the contrast between it and other universities became still more prominent. Still, however, the landmarks of the Church were observed, though all felt that they were on the eve of a great battle with the pope.

CHAPTER IV.

Sentiments of Luther and Staupitz—Order to Appear—Alarms and Courage—The Elector with the Legate—Departure for Augsburg—Sojourn at Weimar—Nuremberg.

THE arrival of Melancthon, doubtless, gave a pleasant turn to Luther's thoughts at this very critical moment; and doubtless, in the sweet intercourse of growing friendship, and amid the biblical labours to which he devoted himself with new zeal, he sometimes forgot Priorio, Leo, and the ecclesiastical court before which he behaved to plead. Still, these were only fleeting moments, and his thoughts were ever recurring to the formidable tribunal before which implacable enemies had summoned him to appear. What terrors would not this thought have thrown into a mind which was seeking aught else than the truth! But Luther trembled not! Confiding fully in the faithfulness and power of God, he remained firm; and was quite ready to expose himself, single-handed, to the rage of enemies mightier than those who had lighted the fire for John Huss.

A few days after the arrival of Melancthon, and before the pope's resolution transferring the citation of Luther from Rome to Augsburg could be known, Luther wrote Spalatin: "I ask not our sovereign to do anything whatever for the defence of my theses. I am willing to be delivered up and thrown single into the hands of my adversaries. Let him allow the whole storm to burst upon me. What I have undertaken to defend, I hope I shall be able, with the assistance of Christ, to maintain. Violence, indeed, must be submitted to; but still without abandoning the truth."

The courage of Luther communicated itself to others. Men of the greatest gentleness and timidity, on seeing the danger which threatened the witness for the truth, found words full of energy and indignation. The prudent and pacific Staupitz, on the 7th September, wrote to Spalatin: "Cease not to exhort the prince, your master and mine, not to be alarmed at the roaring of the lions. Let him defend the truth without troubling himself about Luther, or Staupitz, or the order. Let there be a place where men can speak freely and without fear. I know that the plague of Babylon (I had almost said of Rome) breaks forth against all who attack the abuses of those traffickers in Jesus Christ. I have myself seen a preacher of the truth thrown headlong from the pulpit; I have seen him, though on a festival, bound and dragged to a dungeon. Others have seen still greater cruelties. Therefore, my dear friend, strive to make his highness persevere in his sentiments."

The order to appear at Augsburg before the cardinal legate at length arrived. Luther had now to do with one of the princes of the Church. All his friends entreated him not to go. They feared that on the journey snares might be laid for him, and an attempt made on his life. Some employed themselves in looking out for an asylum to him. Staupitz himself, the timid Staupitz, felt moved at the thought of the dangers which threatened that friar Martin whom he had drawn from the obscurity of the cloister, and placed on the troubled stage where his life was now in peril. Ah! would it not have been better if the poor friar had remained for ever unknown? It was too late. Still, at least, he would do everything to save him. Accordingly, on the 15th September, he wrote him from his convent of Salzboung, urging him to flee, and seek an asylum beside himself. "It seems to me," said he, "that the whole world is enraged, and in coalition against the truth. In the same way crucified Jesus was hated. I see not that you have anything to expect but persecution. Shortly, no man will be able, without the permission of the pope, to sound the Scriptures, and search for Jesus Christ in them, though this Christ himself enjoins. You have only a few friends; and would to God that the fear of your adversaries did not prevent those few from declaring in your favour. The wisest course is to quit Wittenberg for a time, and come to me. Thus we will live and die together. This is also the prince's opinion," adds Staupitz.

From different quarters Luther received the most alarming notices. Count Albert, of Mansfeld, sent a message to him to beware of setting out, for some great barons had sworn to make themselves masters of his person, and to strangle or drown him. But nothing could deter him. He never thought of availing himself of the vicar-general's offer. He will not go and hide himself in the obscurity of the convent of Salzboung, but will faithfully remain on the stormy scene on which the hand of God has placed him. It is by persevering in the face of adversaries, and proclaiming the truth with loud voice in the midst of the world, that the reign of truth advances. Why, then, should he flee? He is not one of "those who draw back to perdition; but of those who believe to the saving of the soul." The words of the Master whom he serves, and loves better than life, are incessantly echoing in his heart: Whosoever will confess me before men, him will I also confess before my Father who is in heaven. In Luther and in the Reformation we uniformly meet with that intrepid courage, that high-toned morality, that boundless charity, which the first preaching of Christianity manifested to the world. "I am like Jeremiah," says Luther, at the period of which we are now speaking,—"Jeremiah, the man of quarrel and discord; but the more they multiply their menaces the more they increase my joy. My wife and children are well provided, [of course, meaning he had none;] my fields, my houses, and all my goods, are in order. They have already torn my honour and my reputation to shreds. The only thing left me is my poor body, and let them take it; they will only shorten my life some few hours. My soul they cannot take from me. He who would publish the word of Christ in the world must expect death every hour; for our bridegroom is a bridegroom of blood."

The elector was then at Augsburg. A short time before quitting that town after the diet, he had, of his own accord, paid a visit to the legate. The cardinal, greatly flattered by this mark of respect from so illustrious a prince, promised that if the monk presented himself he would listen to him like a father, and kindly dismiss him. Spalatin, on the part of the prince, wrote to his friend that the pope had named a commission to try him in Germany; that the elector would not allow him to be dragged to Rome; and that he must prepare to set out for Augsburg. Luther resolved to obey; but the warning which he had received from Count Mansfeld made him apply to Frederick for a safe-conduct. Frederick replied that it was unnecessary, and merely gave him recommendations to some of the leading counsellors of Augsburg. He also sent him some money for the journey. The reformer, poor and defenceless, set out on foot to place himself in the hands of his adversaries.

What must have been his feelings on quitting Wittenberg, and directing his steps towards Augsburg, where the legate of the pope was waiting for him! The object of this journey was not like that of Heidelberg, a friendly meeting. He was going to appear in presence of the legate of Rome without a safe-conduct; perhaps he was going to death. But in him faith was not a mere matter of show. Being a reality, it gave him peace; and, in the name of the Lord of Hosts, he could advance without fear to bear testimony to the Gospel.

He arrived at Weimar on the 28th of September, and lodged in the convent of the Cordeliers. One of the monks was unable to withdraw his eyes from him. It was Myconius. This was the first time he had seen whole desire was to labour with him. But Myconius, being closely watched by his superiors, was not permitted to speak to Luther.

WEIMAR.

The Elector of Saxony was then holding his court at Weimar, and this is probably the reason why the Cordeliers gave admittance to the doctor. The day after his arrival, the feast of St. Michael was celebrated. Luther said mass, and was even invited to preach in the church of the castle. It was a mark of favour which the prince wished to give him. He, accordingly, in presence of the court, preached a long sermon, on the text of the day, which is taken from the Gospel of St. Matthew, (chap. xviii. 1-11.) He spoke forcibly against hypocrites, and those who boast of their own righteousness; but he did not speak of the angels, though this was the customary topic on St. Michael's day.

The courage of the doctor of Wittemberg, in calmly setting out on foot to obey a summons, which, in the case of so many before him, had issued in death, astonished those who saw him. Interest, admiration, and compassion, succeeded each other in their minds. John Kestner, superintendent to the Cordeliers, alarmed at the idea of the dangers which awaited his guest, said to him, "Brother, you will find at Augsburg Italians, men of learning, and subtle antagonists, who will give you much to do. I fear you will not be able to defend your cause against them. They will cast you into the fire, and with their flames consume you." Luther replied gravely: "Dear friend, pray to our Lord God, who is in heaven, and present a pater noster for me, and His dear child, Jesus, whose cause my cause is, that He may be gracious toward me. If He maintain His cause, mine is maintained. But if He pleases not to maintain it, assuredly it is not I who can maintain it; and it is He who will bear the affront."

Luther continued his journey on foot, and arrived at Nuremberg. He was going to present himself before a prince of the Church, and wished his dress to be suitable; but his clothes were old, and, besides, had suffered much by the journey. He borrowed a frock from his faithful friend, Wincelcius Link, preacher at Nuremberg.

Luther, doubtless, did not confine his visit to Link; but also saw his other friends in Nuremberg, secretary Schuurl, the celebrated painter, Albert Durer, to whom Nuremberg is now erecting a statue, and many others. He strengthened himself by intercourse with the excellent of the earth, while many monks and laymen expressed alarm, and endeavoured to shake him by repre-

Luther; and he longed to approach him, and tell that he owed the peace of his soul to him, and that his sending the difficulties he wrote from this town shew the spirit by which he was animated. "I have met," says he, "with pusillanimous men, who would persuade me not to go to Augsburg; but I have determined on going. The will of the Lord be done. Even at Augsburg, even in the midst of His enemies, Jesus Christ reigns. Let Christ live; let Luther and every sinner die. According as it is written: "Let the God of my salvation be exalted! Behave well, persevere, stand firm; for we must not be reproved either by men or by God; God is true, and man a liar."

Link and an Augustine monk could not consent to allow Luther to travel alone and meet the dangers which threatened him. They were acquainted with his bold and fearless character, and suspected he would fail in due precaution. They, therefore, accompanied him. When they were about five leagues from Augsburg, Luther, exhausted, no doubt, by the fatigue of travelling, and the varied emotions of his heart, was seized with violent pains in the stomach. He thought he was dying; and his friends, becoming very uneasy, hired a car to transport him. They arrived at Augsburg on the evening of Friday, the 7th of October, and lighted at the Augustine convent. Luther was greatly fatigued, but soon recovered,—his faith and mental energy speedily recruiting his exhausted body.

CHAPTER V.

Arrival at Augsburg—De Vio—His Character—Serra-Longa—Preliminary Conversation—Visit of the Councillors—Return of Serra-Longa—The Prior—Luther's Wisdom—Luther and Serra-Longa—The Safe-Conduct—Luther to Melancthon.

THE instant he was at Augsburg, and before he had seen any one, Luther, wishing to pay all due respect to the legate, begged Wincelshaus Link to go and announce his arrival. Link did so, and humbly declared to the cardinal, on the part of the doctor of Wittenberg, that he was ready to appear at his order. The legate was delighted with the news. At last he had a hold of this boisterous heretic, who, he assured himself, would not quit the walls of Augsburg as he had entered. At the same time, when Link went to the legate, the monk Leonard set out to announce Luther's arrival to Staupitz. The vicar-general had written the doctor, that he would certainly come as soon as he should know of his being in the town, and Luther was unwilling to lose an instant in giving him intimation.

The diet was closed, and the emperor and the electors had already separated. The emperor, it is true, had not left, but was hunting in the neighbourhood. The ambassador of Rome was thus at Augsburg alone. Had Luther come during the diet, he would have found powerful protectors; but now it seemed that everything must bend under the weight of papal authority.

The name of the judge before whom Luther had to appear was not fitted to increase his confidence. Thomas de Vio, surnamed Cajetan, from the town of Gaeta, in the kingdom of Naples, where he was born, had, from his youth, given great hopes. Having at sixteen entered the Dominican order, against the express wish of his parents, he afterwards became general of his order, and a cardinal of the Roman Church. But what was worse for Luther, this learned doctor was one of the most zealous defenders of the scholastic theology, which the reformer had always treated so unmercifully. His mother was said to have dreamt during her pregnancy, that St. Thomas would in person educate the child to which she was to give birth, and introduce him to heaven. Hence De Vio, on becoming Dominican, had changed his name from James to Thomas. He had zealously defended the prerogatives of the papacy, and the doctrines of Thomas Aquinas, whom he regarded as the most perfect of theologians. A lover of pomp and show, he almost gave a literal meaning to the Roman maxim, that legates are above kings, and surrounded himself with great state. On the 1st of August, he had celebrated a solemn mass in the cathedral of Augsburg, and in presence of all the princes of the empire, had placed the cardinal's hat on the head of the Archbishop of Mentz while kneeling before the altar, and had delivered to the emperor himself the hat and sword consecrated by the pope. Such was the man before whom the monk of Wittenberg was going to appear, clothed in a frock which was not even his own. Besides, the acquirements of the legate, the austerity of his disposition, and the purity of his morals, gave him in Germany an influence and authority which other Roman courtiers would not have easily obtained. To this reputation for sanctity he doubtless owed his mission. Rome saw that he would serve her purposes admirably. Thus the personal qualities of Cajetan made him still more formidable. Moreover, the business entrusted to him was not complicated. Luther had already been declared a heretic. If he refused to retract, the duty of the legate was to put him in prison; or, if he escaped, to launch excommunication at every one who should dare to give him an asylum. This was all that Rome required to be done by the legate before whom Luther was cited.

Luther had recovered strength during the night, and on Saturday morning, 8th October, being somewhat rested from his journey, began to consider his strange situation. He felt resigned, and waited till the will of God should be manifested by the event. He had not long to wait. A personage who was unknown to him sent in a message, as if he had been entirely devoted to his service, to say that he was coming to wait upon him; and that Luther must take good care not to appear before the legate without having seen him. This message came from an Italian named Urban, of Serra-Longa, who had often been in Germany as envoy of the Margrave of Montferrat. He was known to the Elector of Saxony, to whom he had been accredited, and after the death of the margrave, had attached himself to Cardinal de Vio.

The finesse and manners of this man formed a very striking contrast to the noble frankness and generous integrity of Luther. The Italian shortly after arrived at the Augustine convent. The cardinal had sent him to sound the reformer, and prepare him for the retraction which he was expected to make. Serra-Longa imagined that his residence in Germany gave him great advantages over the other courtiers in the suite of the legate, and he hoped to have good sport with the German monk.

He arrived attended by two servants, and pretended to have come of his own accord, because of the friendship which he felt for a favourite of the Elector of Saxony, and because of his attachment to the holy Church. After paying his respects to Luther in the warmest terms, the diplomatist added, in an affectionate manner:

"I come to give you sage and good advice. Retract yourself to the Church. Submit unreservedly to the cardinal. Retract your injurious expressions. Remember the Abbot Joachim of Florence. He, you know, had said heretical things, and yet was declared not heretical, because he retracted his errors."

Luther spoke of defending himself.

Serra-Longa.—"Beware of doing so! . . . Would you pretend to fight with the legate of his holiness, as if you were tilting at a tourney?"

Luther.—"When it is proved that I have taught anything contrary to the Roman Church, I will pass judgment on myself, and retract instantly. The whole question will be, whether the legate leans more upon St. Thomas than the faith authorizes him to do? If he does, I will not yield to him."

Serra-Longa.—"Ah! ah! Do you pretend, then, to break lances?"

Then the Italian began to say things which Luther designates horrible. He pretended that false propositions might be maintained, provided they produced money and filled the strong box; that the universities must take good care not to dispute on the authority of the pope; that their duty, on the contrary, was to maintain that the pope can, at his beck, alter or suppress articles of faith,—adding other things of the same nature. But the wily Italian soon perceived that he was forgetting himself. Returning to soft words, he strove to persuade Luther to submit to the legate in everything, and retract his doctrines, his oaths, and his theses.

The doctor, who, at the outset, had given some credit to the fine protestations of orator Urban, (as he designates him in his account of the interview,) was now convinced that they were of very little value, and that Serra-Longa was much more on the legate's side than on his. He, therefore, became less communicative, and contented himself with saying that he was quite disposed to exercise humility, give proof of obedience, and make satisfaction in whatever matters he had been mistaken. At these words Serra-Longa, overjoyed, exclaimed: "I am off to the legate, and you will follow me; everything will go off most admirably; it will be soon finished. . . ."

He went off. The Saxon monk, who had more discernment than the Roman courtier, thought within himself: "This wily Sinon has come along ill prepared and ill instructed by his Greeks." Luther was suspended between hope and fear; hope, however, predominating. The visit and the strange assertions of Serra-Longa, whom, at a later period, he calls an inept mediator, made him resume courage.

The councillors and other inhabitants of Augsburg, to whom the elector had recommended Luther, hastened to visit the monk, whose name was now resounding throughout all Germany. Pentinger, councillor of the empire, who was one of the most distinguished patricians of the town, and often invited Luther to his table, councillor Langemantel, Dr. Auerbach of Leipsic, the two brothers Adelmann, both canons, and several others besides, repaired to the convent of the Augustines, and gave a cordial welcome to the extraordinary man, who had journeyed so far to come and place himself in the hands of the creatures of Rome. "Have you a safe-conduct?" they asked.—"No!" replied the intrepid monk. "What hardihood!" exclaimed they.—"It was, indeed," says Luther, "a fit term to designate my rash folly." All with one voice entreated him not to go to the legate until he had obtained a safe-conduct from the emperor himself. It is probable that the public had already heard of the papal brief of which the legate was the bearer.

"But," replied Luther, "I came to Augsburg without a safe-conduct, and have arrived in good health."

"The elector having recommended you to us, you ought to obey us, and do what we tell you," rejoined Langemantel, kindly but firmly. Dr. Auerbach seconded his remonstrances. "We know," says he, "that the cardinal, at the bottom of his heart, is in the highest degree incensed against you. No trust can be put in the Italians."

Canon Adelmann likewise insisted: "You have been sent defenceless, and it has been forgotten to furnish you with the precise thing which you required." These friends engaged to obtain the necessary safe-conduct from the emperor. They afterwards told Luther how many persons, even of elevated rank, were inclined in his favour. "Even the minister of France, who quitted Augsburg a few days ago, spoke of you in the most honourable terms." This statement struck Luther, and he afterwards remembered it. Thus, the most respectable citizens in one of the first cities of the empire were already gained to the reformation.

They were still conversing when Serra-Longa reappeared. "Come," said he to Luther, "the cardinal is waiting for you, and I myself am going to conduct you to his presence. Listen while I tell you how you are to appear. When you enter the hall where he is, you will prostrate yourself before him with your face on the ground; when he tells you to rise, you will get up on your knees, and not stand erect, but wait till he bids you. Recollect that it is before a prince of the Church that you are going to appear. For the rest, fear nothing; the whole will be finished soon, and without difficulty."

Luther, who had promised this Italian that he would be ready to follow at his call, felt embarrassed. Yet he hesitated not to inform him of the advice which he had received from his Augsburg friends, and spoke to him of a safe-conduct.

"Beware of asking one," immediately replied Serra-Longa; "you have no need of it. The legate is well disposed, and quite ready to finish the thing amicably. If you ask a safe-conduct, you will totally spoil your affair."

"My gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony," replied Luther, "has recommended me to several honourable men of this town, who counsel me to undertake nothing without a safe-conduct. I must follow their advice; for, were I not to do so, and were anything to happen, they would write to the elector, my master, that I had refused to listen to them."

Luther persisted in his resolution, and Serra-Longa saw himself obliged to return to his chief, to announce the obstacle which his mission had encountered at the moment when he was flattering himself with seeing it crowned with success.

Thus terminated the conferences of that day with the orator of Montferrat.

Another invitation was given to Luther. John Frosch, the prior of the Carmelites, who was an old friend of his, and two years before, as a licentiate of theology, had maintained theses under the presidency of Luther, paid him a visit, and earnestly begged he would come and reside with him. He claimed the honour of having the doctor of Germany for his guest. Men at length feared not to do homage to him in presence of Rome; the feeble had already become strong. Luther accepted, and left the Augustine convent for that of the Carmelites. The day did not close without serious reflection. The eagerness of Serra-Longa, and the fears of the councillors, equally served to acquaint him with the difficulty of his position. Nevertheless, God in heaven was his protector, and under His guardianship he could sleep without fear.

The next day, being Sunday, gave him somewhat more repose. He had, however, to endure a different kind of fatigue. The whole talk of the town was about Dr. Luther; and, as Melancthon expresses it, everybody was desirous to see "this new Erostratus, who had kindled so immense a conflagration." The people pressed around him, and the good doctor, no doubt, smiled at their eagerness.

But he had to submit to another kind of importunity. If the people were desirous to see him, they were still more so to hear him; and he was requested on all hands to preach. Luther had no greater delight than in proclaiming the Word, and would have been happy to preach Jesus Christ in this great city, in the solemn circumstances in which he was placed. But on this occasion, as on many others, he shewed a strong sense of propriety, and profound respect for his superiors, and refused to preach, lest the legate might suppose that he did it in order to give him pain, and by way of defiance. This moderation and wisdom were undoubtedly of as much value as a sermon.

The cardinal's creatures, however, did not leave him in tranquillity, but returned to the charge. "The cardinal," said they, "assures you of his entire grace and favour. What do you fear?" They alleged a thousand reasons in order to induce him to go. "He is a father full of mercy," said one of these envoys; but another, approaching, whispered in his ear, "Don't believe what is told you—he does not keep his word." Luther adhered to his resolution.

On Monday morning, 10th October, Serra-Longa returned to the charge. The courier had made it a point of honour to succeed in his negotiation. As soon as he entered, he exclaimed in Latin, "Why do you not come to the cardinal? He is waiting for you with the most indulgent feelings. The whole matter may be summed up in six letters: REVOCA, retract. Come, you have nothing to fear."

Luther thought within himself, these six are important letters; but, without entering into discussion on the subject, said: "As soon as I have obtained the safe-conduct I will appear."

Serra-Longa broke out on hearing these words. He insisted, and remonstrated; but found Luther immovable. Becoming more and more irritated, he exclaimed: "You imagine, doubtless, that the elector will take up arms in your behalf, and for your sake run the risk of losing the territories handed down to him from his fathers."

Luther.—"God forbid."

Serra-Longa.—"Abandoned by all, where will your refuge be?"

Luther, (looking upwards with the eye of faith).—
"Under heaven."

Serra-Longa, struck with this sublime reply, for which he was not prepared, remained a moment silent, and then continued:—

"What would you do if you had the pope, the legate, and all the cardinals in your hands, as they have you in theirs?"

Luther.—"I would pay them all honour and respect. But in my view, the Word of God takes precedence of all."

Serra-Longa, (laughing, and wagging one of his fingers, as the Italians do).—"Hem! hem! all honour. . . . I don't believe a word of it. . . ."

He then went out, leapt into his saddle, and disappeared.

Serra-Longa returned no more to Luther; but he long remembered both the resistance which he had met with from the reformer, and that which his master also was soon to experience. At a later period, we shall see him with loud cries demanding Luther's blood.

Serra-Longa had not long left the doctor when the safe-conduct arrived. His friends had obtained it from the councillor of the empire, who, it is probable, had previously consulted with the emperor, as he was not far from Augsburg. It would even seem, from a remark afterwards made by the cardinals, that, to avoid offending him, his consent had been asked. This may have been his reason for employing Serra-Longa to work upon Luther; for to have openly opposed the giving of a safe-conduct, would have been to reveal intentions which he was desirous to conceal. It was safer to induce Luther himself to desist from his demand. It was soon seen, however, that the Saxon monk was not made of pliable materials.

Luther is going to appear. While demanding a safe-conduct, he did not trust to a carnal arm; for he knew very well that a safe-conduct did not save John Huss from the flames. He only wished to do his duty by submitting to the advice of his master's friends. Jehovah will decide. If He requires him to give back his life, he is ready to give it joyfully. At this solemn moment he feels a longing for converse with his friends, especially with Melancthon, now so dear to his heart, and avails himself of a moment of retirement to write him.

"Comport yourself like a man," says he to him, "as you always do. Teach our dear youth what is right and agreeable to God. For me, I am ready to be sacrificed for you and for them, if it is the Lord's will. Sooner than retract what I was bound to teach, I would die, and even (what would be to me the greatest misfortune) be deprived for ever of your delightful society, thus losing (perhaps by my fault) the excellent studies to which we are now devoted.

"Italy, like Egypt of old, is plunged in darkness, so thick that it may be felt. Nobody knows anything of Christ, or of what relates to Him; and yet these people are our lords and masters in faith and manners. Thus the wrath of God is fulfilled upon us, as the prophet speaks: I will give them youths for governors, and babes will rule over them. Conduct yourself as in presence of the Lord, my dear Philip, and avert the divine wrath by pure and fervent prayer."

The legate, informed that Luther was next day to appear before him, assembled the Italians and Germans in whom he had the greatest confidence, in order to consider what was necessary to be done with the Saxon monk. Opinions were divided. "He must," says one, "be compelled to retract." "He must be seized," says another, "and imprisoned." A third thought that it was better to get quit of him; and a fourth, that an attempt should be made to gain him by kindness and lenity. This last advice the cardinal seems at first to have determined to adopt.

CHAPTER VI.

First Appearance—First Words—Conditions of Rome—Propositions to Retract—Luther's Reply—He Withdraws—Impressions on both sides—Arrival of Staupitz.

THE day of conference at length arrived.¹ The legate, knowing that Luther had declared his readiness to retract what could be proved contrary to the truth, had great hopes of success. He doubted not that it would be easy for a man of his rank and knowledge to bring back this monk to the obedience of the Church.

Luther repaired to the legate, accompanied by the prior of the Carmelites, (his host and friend,) two friars of the convent, Dr. Link, and an Augustine, probably the one who had come with him from Nuremberg. Scarcely had he entered the palace of the legate, than all the Italians in the suite of the prince of the Church rushed forward. Every one wished to see the famous doctor, and pressed so upon him that he could scarcely advance. Luther found the apostolical nuncio and Serra-Longa in the hall where the cardinal was waiting. The reception was cold, but polite, and conformable to Roman etiquette. Luther, following the instructions which Serra-Longa had given him, prostrated himself before the cardinal; when told to rise, he put himself on his knees; and on a new order from the legate, stood erect. Several of the most distinguished Italians in the service of the legate pushed forward into the hall to be present at the interview. They desired, above all, to see the German monk humbling himself before the representative of the pope.

The legate remained silent. Hating Luther as an adversary of the theological supremacy of St. Thomas, and as the head of an active opposition in a rising university, whose very first steps had greatly disquieted the Thomists, he was pleased at seeing him lying before him, and thought, says a contemporary, that Luther was going to sing a psalm. Luther, on his part, waited till the prince should address him; but seeing he did not, he took his silence for an invitation to begin, and spoke as follows:—

"MOST WORTHY FATHER,—On the citation of his papal holiness, and at the request of my gracious lord, the Elector of Saxony, I appear before you as a submissive and obedient son of the holy Christian Church, and I acknowledge that I published the propositions and theses in question. I am ready to listen, in all obedience, to the charge brought against me, and to allow myself, if I am mistaken, to be instructed in the way of truth."

The cardinal, who had resolved to assume the air of a tender father, full of compassion for an erring child, now spoke in the most friendly tone, praised the humility of Luther, expressed all the joy it gave him, and said: "My dear son, you have stirred up all Germany by your dispute on indulgences. I am told that you are a very learned doctor in the Scriptures, and have many disciples. Wherefore, if you would be a member of the Church, and find in the pope a most gracious lord, listen to me."

After this exordium, the legate did not hesitate to disclose to him at once all that he expected of him—so confident was he of his submission. "Here," said he, "are three articles which, by the order of our most holy Father, Leo. X., I have to lay before you:—First, You must retrace your steps, acknowledge your faults, and retract your errors, propositions, and discourses; secondly, You must promise to abstain in future from circulating your opinions; and, thirdly, You must engage to be more moderate, and to avoid everything that might grieve or upset the Church."

Luther.—"I request, most worthy father, that you will communicate to me the brief of the pope, in virtue of which you have received full power to dispose of this affair."

Serra-Longa and the other Italians in the cardinal's suite stared on hearing this request; and although the German monk had already appeared to them a very odd man, they could scarcely recover from the astonishment produced by so bold a speech. Christians, accustomed to ideas of justice, desire just procedure in the case of others, as well as of themselves; but those who act habitually in an arbitrary manner, are quite surprised when they are told to proceed in regular form, according to law.

De Vio.—"This request, my dear son, cannot be granted. You must acknowledge your errors, take care of your words in future, and not return to your vomit, so that we may be able to sleep without trouble and anxiety; thereafter, conformably to the order and authority of our most holy Father, the pope, I will arrange the affair."

Luther.—"Have the goodness, then, to tell me in what I have erred."

At this new request the Italian courtiers, who had expected to see the poor German on his knees crying mercy, were struck with still greater astonishment. Not one of them would have thought of condescending so far as to answer so impertinent a question. But De Vio, who considered it ungenerous to crush the captive monk with the whole weight of his authority, and who, besides, was confident that his superior knowledge would give him an easy victory, consented to tell Luther of what he was accused, and even to enter into discussion with him. In justice to this general of the Dominicans, it must be admitted that he had more equity, a better sense of propriety, and less passion, than have been shewn on many occasions since in similar affairs. He assumed a tone of condescension, and said,—

"Very dear son!—Here are two propositions which you have advanced, and which you must, first of all, retract:—First, The treasury of indulgences does not consist of the merits and sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ; second, The man who receives the holy sacrament must have faith in the grace which is offered to him."

In fact, both of these propositions gave a mortal blow to the Roman traffic. If the pope had not the power to dispose at pleasure of the merits of the Saviour,—if those who received the bills which the courtiers of the Church were negotiating, did not receive part of this infinite righteousness, the paper lost all its value, and was worth no more than if it had been blank. It was the same with the sacraments. Indulgences were, to some extent, an extraordinary branch of the commerce of Rome, whereas the sacraments were of the nature of an ordinary branch. The returns which they yielded were far from being insignificant. To maintain that faith was necessary before the sacraments could confer a real benefit on a Christian soul, was to deprive them of all interest in the eyes of the people; faith being a thing which the pope did not give, which was beyond his power, and came from God only. To declare it necessary, was to wrest out of the hands of Rome both speculation and profit. Luther, in attacking these two dogmas, had imitated Jesus Christ, when, at the commencement of His ministry, He overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and drove the buyers and sellers out of the temple, saying, Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise.

"I will not, in order to combat these errors," continued Cajetan, "invoke the authority of St. Thomas, and the other scholastic doctors; I will found only on the authority of Holy Scripture, and speak with you in all friendship."

But scarcely had De Vio begun to unfold his proofs than he deviated from the rule which he had declared his intention to follow. He combated Luther's first proposition by an "Extravagance" of Pope Clement, and the second by all sorts of scholastic dogmas. The discussion commenced on this constitution of the pope in favour of indulgences. Luther, indignant at the authority which the legate ascribed to a decree of Rome, exclaimed,—

"I cannot receive such constitutions as sufficient proofs in so important matters. For they wrest the Holy Scripture, and never quote it appositely."

¹ The name given to certain papal constitutions, collected and added to the body of the canon law.

De Vio.—"The pope has authority and power over all things."

Luther, (heavily).—"Save Scripture."

De Vio, (ironically).—"Save Scripture! . . . The pope, know you not, is above councils? Even recently he condemned and punished the Council of Basle."

Luther.—"The university of Paris appealed."

De Vio.—"These Parisian gentry will pay the penalty."

The discussion between the cardinal and Luther afterwards turned on the second point,—viz., on faith. This Luther declared to be necessary, in order to receive benefit from the sacraments; and, according to his custom, quoted several passages of Scripture in favour of the opinion which he maintained; but the legate received them with loud laughter. "It is of general faith you speak, then," said he.—"No," replied Luther. One of the Italians, master of the ceremonies to the legate, out of all patience at Luther's opposition and his answers, was burning with eagerness to speak. He was constantly trying to break in, but the legate enjoined silence, and at last was obliged to reprimand him so sharply, that the master of the ceremonies left the hall in confusion.

"As to indulgences," said Luther, "if it can be shewn that I am mistaken, I am quite willing to be instructed. One may pass over that point without being a bad Christian; but on the article of faith, were I to yield a whit, I should be denying Jesus Christ. With regard to it, then, I am neither able nor willing to yield, and by the grace of God never shall."

De Vio, (beginning to lose temper).—"Whether you will or not, you must this very day retract that article; otherwise, for that article alone, I will reject and condemn all your doctrine."

Luther.—"I have no will apart from that of the Lord; He will do with me what pleases Him. But had I five heads, I would lose them all sooner than retract the testimony which I have borne to holy Christian faith."

De Vio.—"I did not come here to reason with you. Retract, or prepare to suffer the pains which you have deserved."

Luther saw plainly that it was impossible to settle the matter by a conference. His opponent sat before him as if he were the pope himself, and insisted on his receiving humbly, and with submission, whatever he said; while his answers, even when founded on the Holy Scriptures, were received with a shrug of his shoulders, and all sorts of irony and contempt. He thought the wisest course would be to answer the cardinal in writing. This method, thought he, leaves at least some consolation to the oppressed. Others will be able to form a judgment of the affair; and the unjust adversary, who, by clamour, remains master of the field of battle, may be deterred by it.

Luther having signified his intention to withdraw, the legate said to him, "Do you wish me to give you a safe-conduct to Rome?"

Nothing would have been more agreeable to Cajetan than the acceptance of this offer, as it would have disencumbered him of a task, the difficulties of which he began to comprehend. But the reformer, who saw all the difficulties with which he was surrounded even at Augsburg, took good care not to accept a proposal the effect of which could only have been to give him over, bound hand and foot, to the vengeance of his enemies. He rejected it as often as De Vio was pleased to renew it, and this was frequently. The legate disguised the pain which he felt at Luther's refusal, and, wrapping himself up in his dignity, dismissed the monk with a smile of compassion, under which he tried to conceal his disappointment, and at the same time the politeness of one who hopes he may succeed better another time.

No sooner was Luther in the court of the palace, than the talkative Italian, the master of the ceremonies, whom his master's reprimands had obliged to quit the hall of conference, delighted at being able to speak out of sight of Cajetan, and burning with eagerness to confound the abominable heretic by his luminous reasons, ran after him, and, continuing to walk, began to retail his sophisms. But Luther, weary of this foolish personage, answered him with one of those cutting expressions which he had so much at command, and the poor master of the ceremonies left off, and returned in confusion to the cardinal's palace.

Luther did not carry away a very high opinion of his opponent. He had heard from him, as he afterwards wrote to Spalatin, propositions which were quite at variance with theology, and in the mouth of any other person would have been regarded as arch-heretical. And yet De Vio was considered the most learned of the Dominicans. Second to him was Prierio. "From this," says Luther, "we may infer what those must have been who were tenth or hundredth."

On the other hand, the noble and resolute bearing of the Wittenberg doctor had greatly surprised the cardinal and his courtiers. Instead of a poor monk humbly begging pardon, they had found a free man, a decided Christian, an enlightened teacher, who insisted that unjust accusations should be supported by proof, and who defended his doctrine triumphantly. All the inmates of Cajetan's palace inveighed against the pride, obstinacy, and effrontery of this heretic. Luther and De Vio had mutually learned to know each other, and both prepared for their second interview.

A very agreeable surprise awaited Luther on his return to the convent of the Carmelites. The vicar-general of the Augustine order, his friend, his father Staupitz, had arrived at Augsburg. Not having been able to prevent Luther from coming to this city, Staupitz gave his friend a new and touching proof of his attachment by coming personally, in the hope of being useful to him. This excellent man foresaw that the conference with the legate would lead to very serious consequences. He was equally agitated by his fears and his friendship for Luther, who, after his painful sedentary, felt it refreshing to clasp so valuable a friend in his arms. Having told him that it had been impossible for him to get an answer worth anything, and how the legate had been contented to demand a retraction without trying to convince him—"It is absolutely necessary," said Staupitz, "to give the legate a written answer."

After what he had heard of the first interview,

Staupitz hoped nothing from the others, and therefore determined on a proceeding which he deemed necessary. He resolved to loose Luther from obedience to his order. By this Staupitz hoped to gain two ends. If, as all anticipated, Luther fell in the struggle, the disgrace of his condemnation would not fall on the whole order; or if the cardinal ordered Staupitz to oblige Luther to silence or retraction, he would have an excuse for not doing it. The ceremony, which took place in the usual form, made Luther aware of all that he had thenceforth to expect. He felt exceedingly at seeing the ties which he had formed in the enthusiasm of his youth thus broken. The order of his choice rejects him. His natural protectors stand aloof, and he becomes a stranger to his brethren. But though his heart is filled with sadness at the thought, he recovers all his joy on turning to the promises of a faithful God, who has said, I will never leave you nor forsake you.

The councillors of the empire having intimated to the legate, through the Bishop of Trent, that Luther was provided with an imperial safe-conduct, and having caused it to be declared at the same time, that nothing was to be attempted against the doctor's person, De Vio became angry, and sharply replied in words characteristically Roman, "Very well; but I will do what the pope commands." We know what this was.

CHAPTER VII.

Communication to the Legate—Second Appearance—Luther's Declaration—The Legate's Reply—The Legate's Volubility—Luther's Request.

THE next day both parties prepared for the second interview, which promised to be decisive. The friends of Luther, who had resolved to accompany him to the legate, repaired to the convent of the Carmelites. The Dean of Trent and Peutingier, both councillors of the emperor, and Staupitz, arrived in succession. Shortly after, the doctor had the pleasure to see them joined by the Chevalier Philip von Feilitzsch, and Doctor Ruhel, councillors of the elector, who had been ordered by their master to attend the conferences, and protect the liberty of Luther. They had arrived the previous evening, and were, says Mathesius, to stand at his side, as at Constance the Chevalier de Chlum stood at the side of John Hess. The doctor, moreover, took a notary, and, accompanied with all these friends, proceeded to the legate.

At this moment Staupitz came up to him; he thoroughly comprehended Luther's situation, and knew that if he did not fix his eye solely on the Lord, who is the deliverer of His people, he must succumb. "My dear brother," said he to him seriously, "constantly remember that you have begun these things in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ." Thus God surrounded His humble servant with consolation and encouragement.

Luther, on arriving at the cardinal's, found a new opponent. This was the prior of the Dominicans of Angsburg, who was seated at the side of his chief. Luther, agreeably to the resolution which he had formed, had written his reply; and, after the usual salutations, with a firm voice read the following declaration:—

“I declare that I honour the holy Roman Church, and that I will continue to honour it. I have sought the truth in public discussions; and all that I have said I regard, even at this hour, as just, true, and Christian. Still I am a man, and may be mistaken. I am, therefore, disposed to receive instruction and correction in the things in which I may have erred. I declare myself ready to reply, by word of mouth or by writing, to all the objections and all the charges which my lord the legate may bring against me. I declare myself ready to submit my theses to the four universities of Basle, Fribourg in Brisgau, Louvain, and Paris; and to retract what they declare to be erroneous. In a word, I am ready to do all that may be demanded of a Christian. But I protest solemnly against the course which is sought to be given to this affair, and against the strange pretension of constraining me to retract without having refuted me.”

Undoubtedly nothing could be more equitable than these proposals of Luther; and yet they must have been very embarrassing to a judge whose decision had been prescribed to him beforehand. The legate, who had not expected this protestation, sought to conceal his uneasiness by pretending to laugh at it; and, assuming an exterior of gentleness, said to Luther, smiling: “This protestation is unnecessary. I will not dispute with you either in public or in private; but I purpose to arrange the affair kindly, and like a father.” The whole policy of the cardinal consisted in putting aside the strict forms of justice, which afford protection to those who are prosecuted, and in treating the affair only as one of administration between superior and inferior,—a commodious method, inasmuch as it opens up a wide field for arbitrary procedure.

Still maintaining the most affectionate manner,—“My dear friend,” said De Vio, “abandon, I pray you, a useless design. Rather return to yourself, acknowledge the truth, and I am ready to reconcile you with the Church and the sovereign bishop. Whether you will or not, it matters little. It will be hard for you to kick against the pricks. . . .”

Luther, who saw himself treated as if he were already proved a rebellious child, rejected of the Church, exclaimed: “I cannot retract; but I offer to answer, and in writing. We had enough of debating yesterday.”

De Vio was irritated at this expression, which reminded him that he had not acted with sufficient prudence; but he recovered himself, and said with a smile: “Debating, my dear son!—I did not debate with you. I have no wish to debate; but in order to please the most serene Elector Frederick, I am willing to hear you, and exhort you amicably and paternally.”

Luther did not comprehend why the legate should have been so much offended at the expression which he had used; for, thought he, if I had not wished to speak politely, I would have said, not debated, but disputed, and verangled,—for that was truly what we did.

Still, De Vio, who felt that before the respectable witnesses who were present at the conference, it was, at least, necessary to seem to try to convince Luther to return to the two propositions, which he had singled out as fundamental errors, thoroughly resolved to let the reformer speak as little as possible. Strong in his Italian volubility, he overwhelms him with objections, to which he does not wait for a reply. Sometimes he jests, sometimes he scolds; he declaims with impassioned heat; mixes up the most heterogeneous subjects; quotes St. Thomas and Aristotle; cries, and gets into a passion with all who differ with him in opinion; and then apostrophizes Luther. Luther, more than ten times, tries to speak; but the legate instantly interrupts him, and showers down menaces upon him. Retraction! retraction! is the whole sum of his demand; he thunders, and domineers, and insists on having all the talk to himself. Staupitz interferes to stop the legate. “Have the goodness,” says he, “to give Doctor Martin time to answer.” But the legate recommences his discourse, quotes the “Extravagances” and the opinions of St. Thomas, determined to harangue during the whole interview. If he cannot convince, and if he dares not strike, he at least can stun.

Luther and Staupitz saw clearly that they must abandon the hope, not only of enlightening De Vio by discussion, but also of making a useful profession of faith. Luther, therefore, resumed the request which he had made at the commencement, and which the cardinal had then evaded. Since he was not permitted to speak, he asked that he might, at least, be allowed to write, and send his written reply to the legate. Staupitz supported him; several others, who were present, joined their entreaties; and Cajetan, notwithstanding of all his repugnance for what was written, (for he remembered that what is written remains,) at last consented. The meeting broke up. The hope of terminating the affair at this interview was adjourned; and it became necessary to await the result of a subsequent conference.

The permission which the general of the Dominicans gave Luther to prepare an answer, and to answer in writing the two distinct and articulate accusations which he had made, touching indulgences and faith, was nothing more than justice demanded, and yet we are obliged to De Vio for it, as a mark of moderation and impartiality.

Luther left the cardinal's palace delighted that his request had been granted. In going and returning he was the object of public attention. All enlightened men were interested in his case, as if it had been their own; for it was felt that the cause then pleaded at Angsburg was the cause of the Gospel, justice, and liberty. The lowest of the people alone were with Cajetan; and of this he, doubtless, gave some significant hints to the reformer, who afterwards spoke of them.

It became more and more evident that the legate had no wish to hear any more from Luther than the words, “I retract;” and these Luther was resolved not to pronounce. What will be the issue of this unequal struggle? How can it be imagined that the whole power of Rome, brought to bear on a single man, will not succeed in crushing him? Luther sees this. Feeling the weight of the terrible hand under which he is placed, he gives up the hope of ever returning to Wittenberg, revisiting his dear Philip, and again flinging himself in the midst of the generous youths into whose hearts he loved so much to shed the seeds of life. He sees excommunication hanging over his head, and has no doubt that it must shortly fall upon him. These prospects afflict his soul, but do not overwhelm it. His confidence in God is not shaken. God may break the instrument which He has been pleased till now to employ, but the truth will be maintained. Whatever happens, Luther must defend it to the last. He accordingly begins to prepare the protestation which he is to present to the legate. It appears that he devoted to it part of the 13th October.

CHAPTER VIII.

Third Appearance—Treasury of Indulgences—Faith—Humble Request—Legate's Reply—Luther's Reply—Legate's Rage—Luther Retires—First Defection.

On Friday, the 14th October, Luther returned to the cardinal, accompanied by the councillors of the elector. The Italians pressed around him as usual, and were present at the conference in great numbers. Luther advanced, and presented his protestation to the legate. The cardinal's people looked with astonishment at a writing which, in their eyes, was so audacious. The following is the doctor of Wittenberg's declaration to their master:—

"You attack me on two points. First, you oppose to me the Constitution of Pope Clement VI., in which it is said, that the treasury of indulgences is the merit of Jesus Christ and the saints; whereas I deny this in my theses.

"Panormitaus (Luther thus designates Ives, author of the famous collection of ecclesiastical law, entitled 'Panormia,' and Bishop of Chartres at the end of the eleventh century) declares, in his first book, that in regard to holy faith, not only a general council, but every believer, is superior to the pope, if he produces declarations of Scripture, and better arguments than the pope.

"The voice of our Lord Jesus Christ rises far above all the voices of men, whatever be the names they bear.

"What gives me the greatest pain and uneasiness is, that this Constitution contains doctrines quite opposed to the truth. It declares that the merits of the saints is a treasure, while all Scripture testifies that God recompenses far more richly than we deserve. The prophet exclaims: Lord, enter not into judgment with thy servant; for in thy sight can no living man be justified. 'Woe to men, however honourable and laudable their life may be,' says St. Augustine, 'were judgment passed upon it without mercy.'

"Hence the saints are not saved by their merits, but only by the mercy of God, as I have declared. I maintain this, and adhere firmly to it. The words of holy Scripture, which declare that the saints have not enough of merit, must take precedence of the words of men, who affirm that they have too much; for the pope is not above, but beneath the Word of God."

Luther does not stop here, but shews that if indulgences cannot be the merit of saints, no more are they the merit of Christ. He observes, that indulgences are barren and without fruit, since they have no other effect than to exempt men from doing good works, such as prayers and alms. "No," exclaims he, "the merit of Christ is not a treasure of indulgences, which exempts from well-doing; but a treasure of grace, which gives life. The merit of Christ is applied to believers without indulgences, without keys, by the Holy Spirit only, and not by the pope. If any one has a better founded opinion than mine," adds he, "in concluding this first point, 'let him shew it, and then I will retract.'"

"I have affirmed," says he, in coming to the second article, "that no man can be justified before God unless it be by faith, and hence that it is necessary for man to believe with full assurance that he has obtained grace. To doubt of this grace is to reject it. The righteousness and life of the righteous is his faith."

Luther proves his proposition by a multitude of quotations from Scripture.

"Be pleased, then, to intercede for me with our most holy lord, Pope Leo X.," adds he, "in order that he may not treat me with so much disfavour. . . . My soul seeks the light of truth. I am not so proud, so desirous of vain-glory, as to be ashamed to retract if I have taught what is false. My greatest joy will be to see the triumph of whatever accords with the will of God. Only let them not force me to do anything which is contrary to the cry of my conscience."

The legate had taken the declaration from Luther's hands, and after having perused it, said to him coldly: "You have here useless verbiage; you have written many vain words; you have answered the two articles foolishly, and blotted your paper with a number of passages of holy Scripture which have no reference to the subject." Then, with a disdainful air, De Vio threw down the protestation, as setting no value upon it, and resuming the tone which he had found tolerably successful at the last interview, began to cry at full pitch that Luther must retract. Luther was immovable. "Friar! friar!" exclaims De Vio in Italian, "last time you were very good, but to-day you are very naughty." Then the cardinal begins a long discourse, drawn from the writings of St. Thomas, again loudly extols the Constitution of Clement VI., and persists in maintaining, that, in virtue of this Constitution, the very merits of Jesus Christ are distributed to the faithful by means of indulgences. He thinks he has silenced Luther, who sometimes begins to speak; but De Vio scolds, thunders away without ceasing, and insists on having the whole field of battle to himself.

This method might have had some success a first time, but Luther was not the man to suffer it a second. His indignation at length burst forth,—it is his turn to astonish the spectators, who deem him already vanquished by the volubility of the prelate. He raises his powerful voice, seizes the favourite objection of the cardinal, and makes him pay dear for his temerity in having entered the lists with him. "Retract! retract!" repeated De Vio, shewing the Constitution of the pope.—“Well,” replied Luther, “if it can be proved by this Constitution that the treasure of indulgences is the merit of Jesus Christ, I consent to retract according to the will and good pleasure of your eminence.”

The Italians, who expected nothing of the kind, stared at these words, and could scarcely contain their joy at seeing the enemy at length caught in the net. The cardinal was, as it were, out of himself; he laughed outright, but with a laugh in which anger and indignation mingled; darting forward, he lays hold of the volume containing the famous Constitution, looks it out, pounces upon it, and, quite proud of his victory, reads it aloud, with boiling and heaving breast. The Italians exult; the elector’s councillors are uneasy and embarrassed; Luther is waiting for his opponent. At length, when the cardinal comes to the words, “The Lord Jesus Christ has acquired this treasure by His sufferings,” Luther stops him,—“Most worthy father,” says he, “be so good as consider and carefully meditate this expression, ‘has acquired.’ Christ has acquired a treasure by His merits; the merits, therefore, are not the treasure; for, to speak philosophically, cause and effect are different things. The merits of Christ have acquired authority to the pope to grant such indulgences to the people; but what the hand of the pope distributes is not the merits themselves. Thus, then, my conclusion is true; and the Constitution, which you invoke with so much noise, bears testimony with me to the truth which I proclaim.”

De Vio still holds the book in his hand; his eyes are still rivetted on the fatal passage; but he has nothing to reply. Thus he is taken in the net which he himself had laid, and Luther, with strong hand, keeps him in, to the inexpressible astonishment of the Italian courtiers around him. The legate would have evaded the difficulty, but could not. He had long abandoned the testimony of Scripture and the authority of the Fathers; he had taken refuge in this “Extravagance” of Clement VI., and there he is caught. Still, he has too much finesse to let his embarrassment appear. Wishing to hide his shame, the prince of the Church suddenly changes the subject, and rushes violently to other articles. Luther, who perceives the adroit manoeuvre, allows him not to escape; he grasps and completely closes the net which he has thrown over the cardinal, and makes evasion impossible. “Most reverend father!” says he, with an irony clothed in the form of respect, “your eminence cannot surely think that we Germans do not know grammar; to be a treasure, and to acquire a treasure, are very different things.”

“Retract!” says De Vio; “retract! or if you don’t, I send you to Rome, to appear there before the judges entrusted with the cognizance of your cause. I excommunicate you,—you, all your partizans, all who are or may become favourable to you; and I reject them from the Church. Full authority, in this respect, has been given me by the holy apostolic see. Think you your protectors can stop me? Do you imagine that the pope cares for Germany? The little finger of the pope is stronger than all the German princes.”

“Deign,” replied Luther, “to send the written reply which I handed you to Pope Leo X., with my very humble prayers.”

At these words, the legate, glad to find a moment’s respite, again wraps himself up in a feeling of his dignity, and proudly and passionately says to Luther: “Retract! or return not.”

Luther is struck with the expression. This time he gives no verbal answer, but bows and takes his leave, followed by the elector’s councillors. The cardinal and his Italians, left alone, stare at each other, confounded at the issue of the debate.

Thus the Dominican system, clad in the Roman purple, had proudly dismissed its humble opponent. But Luther felt that there is a power,—viz., Christian truth,—truth, which no authority, secular or spiritual, can ever subdue. Of the two combatants, he who withdrew was master of the field.

This is the first step by which the Church detached herself from the papacy.

Luther and De Vio never saw each other again; but the reformer had made a powerful impression on the legate—an impression which was never entirely effaced. What Luther had said on faith, and what De Vio read in the subsequent writings of the doctor of Wittemberg, greatly modified the cardinal’s views. The theologians of Rome were surprised and displeased at his statements on justification in his commentary on the Epistle to the Romans. The reformer did not recoil—did not retract; but his judge, he who never ceased exclaiming, Retract! changed his views, and indirectly retracted his errors. In this way was the reformer’s unshaken fidelity rewarded.

Luther returned to the convent where he had met with hospitality. He had stood firm, had borne testimony to the truth, and done his part. God will do the rest. His heart was filled with peace and joy.

CHAPTER IX.

De Vio and Staupitz—Staupitz and Luther—Luther and Spalatin—Luther to Carlstadt—Communion—Link and De Vio—Departure of Staupitz and Link—Luther to Cajetan—The Cardinal’s Silence—Luther’s farewell—Departure—Appeal to the Pope.

STILL the news brought to him were not at all satisfactory. The rumour in the town was, that if he would not retract, he was to be seized and immured in a dungeon. The vicar-general of the order, Staupitz himself, it was confidently said, had been obliged to consent to it. Luther cannot believe what is told him of his friend. No! Staupitz will not betray him. As to the designs of the cardinal, judging by his own words, it is difficult to doubt. Still he is unwilling to flee before the danger; his life, like truth herself, is in mighty hands; and, notwithstanding of the danger which threatens him, he resolves not to quit Augsburg.

The legate soon repented of his violence. He felt that he had gone out of his course, and he was desirous to return to it. Scarcely had Staupitz finished dinner, (it was the morning when the interview had taken place, and the dinner-hour was mid-day,) when he received a message from the cardinal to wait upon him. Staupitz was accompanied by Wineslaus Link.

The vicar-general found the legate alone with Serralonga. De Vio immediately went up to Staupitz, and, in the mildest accents, said to him: "Try, then, to persuade your monk, and induce him to make a retraction. Of a truth I am otherwise satisfied with him, and he has not a better friend than I."

Staupitz.—"I have done so already, and will still counsel him to submit to the Church in all humility."

De Vio.—"You must answer the arguments which he draws from holy Scripture."

Staupitz.—"I must confess to you, my lord, that that is beyond my strength; for Dr. Martin is my superior both in talent and in knowledge of the Holy Scriptures."

The cardinal, doubtless, smiled at the vicar-general's frankness. He himself knew, besides, wherein lay the difficulty of convincing Luther. He continued, and said to Link:—

"Are you aware that, as partizans of a heretical doctrine, you are yourselves liable to the pains of the Church?"

Staupitz.—"Deign to resume the conference with Luther. Appoint a public discussion of the controverted points."

De Vio, (terrified at the very idea).—"I wout have any further discussion with that beast. For it has in its head piercing eyes and strange speculations."

Staupitz at last obtained the cardinal's promise to give Luther a written statement of what he was to retract.

The vicar-general went immediately to Luther, and, shaken by the cardinal's representations, tried to bring about some arrangement. "Refute, then," says Luther, "the passages of Scripture which I have brought forward." "It is above my power," said Staupitz. "Well," said Luther, "it is against my conscience to retract, so long as no other explanation can be given of these passages." "What!" continued he, "the cardinal pretends, as you assure me, that he is desirous to arrange the affair without shame or disadvantage to me. Ah! these are Roman words, and signify in good German that it would be my disgrace and eternal ruin. What else has he to expect, who, from fear of man and against the voice of his conscience, abjures the truth?"

Staupitz did not insist; he merely intimated that the cardinal had consented to give him a written statement of the points of which he demanded a retraction. Then, doubtless, he informed him of his resolution to leave Augsburg, where he had nothing more to do, and Luther imparted to him a design which he had formed with a view to comfort and strengthen their souls.

Staupitz promised to return, and they separated for a short time.

Luther, left alone in his cell, turned his thoughts towards friends who were dear to his heart. He transported himself to Weimar and Wittenberg. He was desirous to inform the elector of what was passing; and, afraid of compromising the prince by addressing him directly, wrote to Spalatin, and begged him to inform his master how matters stood. He related the whole affair, even to the promise of the legate to give him a written statement of the controverted points, and concluded: "Thus matters are; but I have neither hope nor confidence in the legate. I will not retract a single syllable. I will publish the reply which I have sent him, in order that, if he proceeds to violence, his shame may extend over all Christendom."

The doctor next availed himself of some moments still left him to communicate with his friends at Wittenberg.

"Peace and felicity!" wrote he to Doctor Carlstadt. "Accept these few lines as if they were a long letter; for time and events are pressing on me. Another time I will write you and others at greater length. For three days my affair has been under discussion, and things are now come to this, that I have no hope of returning to you, and expect nothing but excommunication. The legate is absolutely determined that I shall have no discussion, either public or private. He says, he wishes not to be my judge, but my father; and yet the only words he will hear from me are, 'I retract, and own that I have been mistaken.' These, again, are words which I won't say.

"My cause is in so much the greater peril, that its judges are not only implacable enemies, but, moreover, men incapable of comprehending it. However, the Lord God lives and reigns; to His care I commend myself, and I doubt not that, in answer to the prayers of some pious souls, He will send me assistance; methinks I feel that I am prayed for.

"Either I shall return to you without having suffered harm, or, struck with excommunication, will be obliged to seek an asylum elsewhere.

"Be this as it may, comport yourself valiantly, stand firm, exalt Christ intrepidly and joyfully. . . .

"The cardinal always calls me his dear son. I know what this amounts to. Nevertheless, I am persuaded I would be to him the dearest and most agreeable of men, if I would only pronounce the single word Revoca, I retract. But I will not become a heretic by retracting the faith which made me become a Christian. Better be hunted, cursed, burnt, and put to death. . . .

"Take care of yourself, my dear doctor, and shew this letter to our theologians, to Amsdorff, Philip, Otten, and others, in order that you may pray for me, and also for yourselves; for the affair which is here discussed is yours also. It is that of faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and of divine grace."

Delightful thought! which ever gives full peace and consolation to those who have borne testimony to Jesus Christ, to His divinity and grace, when the world from all quarters showers down its censures, ejections, and frowns. "Our cause is that of faith in our Lord!" And how sweet also the conviction expressed by the reformer, "I feel that I am prayed for." The Reformation was the work of prayer and piety. The struggle between Luther and De Vio was a struggle between the religious element re-appearing in full life, and the expiring remains of the quibbling dialectics of the Middle Ages.

Such was Luther's converse with his absent friends. Staupitz soon returned; Doctor Ruhel and the Chevalier de Ferlitzoch, the elector's envoys, also arrived after they had taken leave of the cardinal. Some other friends of the Gospel joined them; and Luther, seeing the generous men thus assembled on the point of separating, perhaps separating from himself for ever, proposed that they should join in celebrating the Lord's Supper. The proposal was accepted, and this little flock of believer's communicated in the body and blood of Jesus Christ. What feelings must have filled the hearts of these friends of the reformer at this moment when celebrating the Eucharist with him, and thinking that it was, perhaps, the last time he would be permitted to do so! What joy and love must have animated Luther's heart at seeing himself so graciously received by his Master at an hour when men were repulsing him! How solemn must that supper have been—how sacred that evening!

The next day Luther waited for the articles which the legate was to send him; but no message arriving, he begged his friend, Dr. Wincelans Link, to go to the cardinal. De Vio received Link with the greatest affability, and assured him that he would act only as a friend. "I no longer," says he, "regard Doctor Martin Luther as a heretic. I will not excommunicate him at this time, at least if I do not receive other orders from Rome. I have sent his reply to the pope by an express." Then, to give a proof of his good intentions, he added: "Would Doctor Martin Luther only retract what relates to the indulgences, the affair would soon be ended; for, with regard to faith in the sacrament, it is an article which every one may interpret and understand in his own way." Spalatin, who relates these words, adds the sarcastic, but just remark: "It clearly follows, that Rome has more regard for money than for the purity of the faith and the salvation of souls."

Link returned to Luther. He found Staupitz with him, and gave an account of his visit. When he mentioned the legate's unlooked for concession, "It had been worth while," said Staupitz, "for Dr. Wincelans to have had a notary and witnesses with him to take down the words, for if such a proposal was known it would greatly prejudice the cause of the Romans."

Meanwhile, the smoother the prelate's words became, the less the honest Germans trusted him. Several of the worthy men to whom Luther had been recommended consulted together. "The legate," said they, "is plotting some mischief by the courier of whom he speaks; there is good ground to fear that you will all be seized and cast into prison."

Staupitz and Wincelans, therefore, determined to quit the town. Embracing Luther, who persisted in remaining at Augsburg, they set out in all haste by different roads for Nuremberg, not without a feeling of great uneasiness as to the fate of the intrepid witness whom they left behind.

Sunday passed quietly enough. Luther waited in vain for a message from the legate. But as he did not send him a word, Luther at last resolved to write him. Staupitz and Link, before their departure, had begged him to make all possible submission to the cardinal. Luther was yet without experience in Rome and its envoys; but if submission did not succeed, he would be able to regard it as a warning. Now he must at least make the attempt. In so far as concerns himself, not a day passes in which he does not condemn himself, does not mourn over the facility with which he allows himself to be hurried into expressions which exceed the bounds of propriety. Why should he not confess to the cardinal that which he daily confesses to God? Luther, moreover, had a heart which was easily touched, and which suspected no evil. He therefore took up the pen, and, under a feeling of respect and good will, wrote to the cardinal as follows:—

"MOST WORTHY FATHER IN GOD,—I come once more, not with my voice, but by writing, to supplicate your paternal goodness to give me a favourable hearing. The reverend Doctor Staupitz, my very dear father in Christ, has asked me to humble myself, to renounce my own opinion, and submit it to the judgment of pious and impartial men. He also has lauded your paternal goodness, and convinced me of the favourable sentiments with which you are animated towards me. The tidings filled me with joy.

"Now, then, most worthy father, I confess, as I have already done, that I have not shewn enough of modesty, enough of meekness, enough of respect for the name of the sovereign pontiff; and although I have been greatly provoked, I perceive it would have been far better for me to have treated the affair with more humility, good nature, and reverence, not answering a fool according to his folly, for fear of being like unto him. (Prov. xxvi. 4.)

"This grieves me very much; I ask pardon for it; and I am willing to announce it to the people from the pulpit, as indeed I have already often done. I will endeavour, by the grace of God, to speak differently. Moreover, I am ready to promise, that, unless I am asked, I will not say a single word on the subject of indulgences after this affair is arranged. But, in like manner, let those who led me to begin it, be obliged hereafter to be moderate in their discourses, or to be silent.

"As regards the truth of my doctrine, the authority of St. Thomas and other doctors cannot satisfy me. If I am worthy of it, I must hear the voice of the spouse, who is the Church. For it is certain that she hears the voice of the Bridegroom, who is Christ.

"With all humility and submission, therefore, I pray your paternal love to refer the whole of this matter, which to this hour is so uncertain, to our most holy lord, Leo X., in order that the Church may decide, pronounce, and ordain, thereby enabling me to retract with a good conscience, or to believe in sincerity."

The reading of this letter suggests a reflection. It shews us that Luther was not acting on a premeditated system, but only in virtue of convictions which were successively impressed on his mind and his heart.

So far from having adopted a fixed system, or calculated opposition, he was sometimes, without suspecting it, at variance with himself. Old convictions still prevailed in his mind, even after contrary convictions had taken root. And yet, in these evidences of sincerity and truth men have searched for weapons to assail the Reformation; because it followed the obligatory law of progress invariably imposed on the human mind, they have written the history of its variations; in the very traits which attest its sincerity, and consequently do it honour, one of the greatest geniuses of Christendom has found his strongest objections to it. Inconceivable is the waywardness of the human mind!

Luther received no answer to his letter. Cajetan and his courtiers, from being violently agitated, became all at once motionless. What could the reason be? Might it not be the calm which precedes the storm? Some are of the opinion of Pallavicini, who observes, that "the cardinal expected that the proud monk would, like inflated bellows, gradually lose the wind with which he was filled, and become quite humble." Others, who thought themselves better acquainted with the ways of Rome, felt assured that the legate was preparing to seize Luther; but not daring, of his own accord, to proceed to such extremities in defiance of the imperial safe-conduct, was waiting for an answer from Rome. Others, again, could not admit that the cardinal would consent to wait so long. The Emperor Maximilian, they said, (and this may indeed have been true,) would have no more scruple in delivering up Luther to the judgment of the Church, in spite of the safe-conduct, than Sigismund had in delivering up John Huss to the Council of Constance. Their conjecture, therefore, was, that the legate was negotiating with the emperor. The sanction of Maximilian might arrive at any hour. The greater the opposition he had formerly shewed to the pope, the more disposed he now seemed to flatter him, until he should succeed in encircling the head of his grandson with the imperial crown. There was not an instant to be lost, "and, therefore," said the generous men around Luther, "prepare an appeal to the pope, and quit Augsburg without delay."

Luther, whose presence in the town had for four days been quite useless, and who, by remaining these four days after the departure of the Saxon councillors whom the elector had sent to watch over his safety, had sufficiently demonstrated that he feared nothing, and was ready to answer every charge, at length yielded to the urgent entreaties of his friends. Wishing to leave a notification to De Vio, he wrote him on Tuesday, the evening before his departure. This second letter is firmer in its tone than the former. It would seem that Luther, in perceiving that all his advances were vain, began to hold up his head, and shew that he had a due sense both of his own rights and of the injustice of his enemies.

"Most worthy Father in God," wrote he to De Vio, "your paternal goodness has seen,—yes, I say, seen and distinctly recognized my obedience. I have undertaken a distant journey, in the midst of great dangers, in much bodily weakness, and notwithstanding of my extreme poverty, on the order of our most holy lord, Leo X. I have appeared personally before your eminence; in fine, I have thrown myself at the feet of his holiness, and am now waiting his pleasure, prepared to acquiesce in his judgment, whether he condemn or acquit me. I thus feel that I have omitted nothing which becomes an obedient son of the Church.

"Hence, I cannot see it to be my duty uselessly to prolong my sojourn here; indeed, it is impossible for me to do so. I want means, and your paternal goodness has commanded me, in peremptory terms, not again to shew myself in your presence, unless I am willing to retract.

"I depart, therefore, in the name of the Lord, desiring, if it be possible, to repair to some spot where I may be able to live in peace. Several personages, of greater weight than I am, have urged me to appeal from your paternal goodness, and even from our most holy lord, Leo X., ill informed, to himself better informed. Although I know that such an appeal will be much more agreeable to our most serene elector than a retraction, nevertheless, if I had only had myself to consult, I would not have taken it. Having committed no fault, I ought to have nothing to fear."

Luther, having written this letter, which was not sent to the legate till after his departure, prepared to quit Augsburg. God had kept him till this hour, and his heart praised Him for it; but he must not tempt God. He took leave of his friends, Peutingier, Langemantel, the Adelmans, Auerbach, and the prior of the Carmelites, who had shewn him so much Christian hospitality. On Wednesday before daybreak he got up, and was ready to depart. His friends had advised him to use great precaution, lest his intention should be observed and frustrated; and he followed their counsels as much as he could. A pony, which Staupitz had left him, was brought to the gate of the convent, and once more bidding adieu to his brethren, he mounted and set off, without bridle, boots, or spurs, and unarmed. The magistrates had sent one of their officers on horseback, who was to accompany him, and who knew the roads perfectly. The servant led him, in the darkness, through the silent streets of Augsburg, towards a small gate which was pierced in the city wall, and which councillor Langemantel had given orders should be opened to him. He is still in the power of the legate, and the hand of Rome may still reach him. Doubtless, did the Italians know that their prey was escaping, they would sally forth in fury with hue and cry. Who knows if the intrepid opponent of Rome will not yet be seized and immured in a dungeon? . . . At length Luther and his guide arrive at the little gate, and, passing through it, are out of Augsburg. Then, putting their horses to the gallop, they make off in all haste.

Luther, on departing, had left his appeal to the pope in the hands of the prior of Pomesaw. His friends were of opinion that it should not be sent to the legate, and the prior was therefore charged to see to its being fixed up, two or three days after the doctor's departure, on the gate of the cathedral, in presence of a notary and witnesses. This was accordingly done.

In this document Luther declares that he appeals from the most holy father the pope, ill formed, to the most holy lord and father in Christ, by name Leo X., by the grace of God, when better informed. This appeal had been regularly drawn up and executed in due form by Gall de Herbrachtingen, the imperial notary, in presence of two Augustine monks, Bartholomew Utzmair and Wenzel Steinbies. It was dated 16th October.

When the cardinal was informed of Luther's departure, he was astonished, and even, as he declares in a letter to the elector, was frightened and amazed. In fact he had grounds for irritation. This departure, which put so abrupt a termination to negotiation, disappointed the hopes which had so long flattered him. His ambition was to cure the wounds of the Church, and re-establish the pope's influence in Germany; and, lo! the heretic has escaped not only without having been punished, but even without having been humbled. The conference had only served to bring more prominently into view, on the one hand, the simplicity, uprightness, and firmness of Luther; and, on the other, the imperiousness and unreasonable conduct of the pope and his ambassador. Rome having gained nothing, must have lost: her authority not having been strengthened, had, of necessity, experienced a new check. What will be said at the Vatican? What tidings will arrive at Rome? The difficulties of his situation will be forgotten, and the failure imputed to his want of skill. Serra-Longa and the Italians are furious at seeing persons of their ability outwitted by a German monk. De Vio is scarcely able to conceal his irritation. The affront cries for vengeance, and we shall soon see him giving vent to his wrath in a letter to the elector.

CHAPTER X.

Luther's Flight—Admiration—Luther's Wish—The Legate to the Elector—Elector to the Legate—Prosperity of the University.

LUTHER continued with his guide to flee from Augsburg. He urged his steed to the utmost speed that the poor animal's strength would permit. He thought of the real or supposed flight of John Huss, the manner in which he was laid hold of, and the assertion of his adversaries, who pretended that the flight annulled the emperor's safe-conduct, and entided them to condemn him to the flames. These uneasy thoughts merely crossed Luther's mind. Escaped from the town where he had passed ten days under the terrible hand of Rome, which had already crushed so many thousand witnesses of the truth, and drenched herself with blood,—now that he is free, now that he breathes the pure air of the field, and traverses the villages and plains—now that he sees himself wonderfully delivered,—his whole soul magnifies the Lord. Truly he may now say: Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers: the snare is broken, and we are escaped. Our help is in the name of the Lord, who made heaven and earth. Luther's heart is thus filled with joy. But his thoughts also revert to De Vio. "The cardinal," says he, "would have liked to have me in his hands to send me to Rome. No doubt he is chagrined at my escape. He imagined that he was master of me at Augsburg,—he thought he was sure of me; but he had an eel by the tail. Is it not a shame in these people to set so high a price upon me? They would give many crowns to have me, whereas our Lord Jesus Christ was sold for thirty pieces of silver."

The first day Luther travelled fourteen leagues. In the evening, on arriving at the inn where he was to pass the night, he was so fatigued ("his horse," says one of his biographers, "had a very hard trot") that, on dismounting, he could not stand erect, and stretched himself out upon the straw. He, nevertheless, enjoyed some sleep, and the next day continued his journey. At Nuremberg he found Staupitz on a visit to the convents of his order, and, for the first time, saw the brief which the pope had sent to Cajetan respecting him. He was indignant at it. In all probability, if he had read it before his departure from Wittenberg, he would never have appeared before the cardinal. "It is impossible to believe," says he, "that anything so monstrous could emanate from a sovereign pontiff."

Throughout the journey Luther was an object of general interest. He had not yielded a whit. Such a victory, gained by a mendicant monk over a representative of Rome, excited universal admiration. Germany seemed avenged for the contempt of Italy. The eternal Word had been more honoured than the word of the pope; and that vast power which had domineered over the world for so many ages, had received an important check. Luther's journey was a triumph. People were delighted with the obstinacy of Rome, hoping that it would hasten her downfall. Had she not chosen to keep fast hold of dishonest gains,—had she been wise enough not to despise the Germans,—had she reformed clamant abuses,—perhaps, according to human views, things might have returned to the state of death out of which Luther had aroused them. But the papacy chooses not to yield, and the doctor will see himself constrained to bring many other errors to light, and to advance in the knowledge and the manifestation of the truth.

On the 26th October Luther arrived at Grafenthal, situated at the extremity of the forests of Thuringia. Here he fell in with Count Albert of Mansfeld, who had so strongly dissuaded him from going to Augsburg. The count laughed heartily on seeing his singular equipage; and, laying hands on him, obliged him to become his guest. Shortly after Luther resumed his journey.

He made haste to be at Wittenberg by the 31st October, expecting that the elector would be there at the feast of All Saints, and that he would be able to see him. The brief which he had read at Nuremberg had made him fully aware of the danger of his situation. In fact, being already condemned at Rome, he could not hope either to remain at Wittenberg, or to obtain an asylum in a convent, or to be in peace and safety anywhere else. The protection of the elector might, perhaps, defend him; but he was far from being able to calculate upon it. He could not expect any help from the two friends whom he had formerly had at the court. Staupitz, having lost the favour he long enjoyed, had quitted Saxony; Spalatin was loved by Frederiek, but had no great influence over him. The elector himself was not so well acquainted with the Gospel as to encounter manifest perils on account of it. However, Luther saw nothing better which he could do than return to Wittenberg, and there await the decision of an almighty and merciful God. If, as several thought, he were left at liberty, his wish was to devote himself entirely to study and to the education of youth.

Luther did arrive at Wittenberg by the 30th October; but his haste had been to no purpose, for neither the elector nor Spalatin came to the festival. His friends were overjoyed on seeing him again among them. The very day of his arrival he hastened to announce it to Spalatin: "I came back to Wittenberg to-day, safe and sound, by the grace of God; but how long I shall remain, is more than I know. . . . I am filled with joy and peace; so much so, that I cannot help wondering how the trial which I endure appears so great to so many great personages."

De Vio did not wait long, after Luther's departure, to vent all his indignation to the elector. His letter breathes vengeance. In an assuming tone he gives Frederick an account of the conference. "Since friar Martin," says he, in conclusion, "cannot be brought by paternal methods to acknowledge his error, and remain faithful to the Catholic Church, I pray your highness to send him to Rome, or banish him from your states. Be assured that this difficult, naughty, and venomous affair, cannot last longer; for, when I shall have acquainted our most holy lord with all the craft and malice, there will soon be an end of it." In a postscript, in his own hand, the cardinal entreats the elector not to sully his own honour, and that of his illustrious ancestors, for a miserable paltry friar.

Never, perhaps, was the soul of Luther filled with nobler indignation than on reading the copy of this letter which the elector sent him. The thought of the sufferings which he is destined to endure, the value of the truth for which he is combating, the contempt he feels for the conduct of the legate of Rome, at once fill his heart. His reply, written under the influence of those feelings, is full of the courage, dignity, and faith, which he always manifested in the most difficult crisis of his life. He, in his turn, gives an account of the conference of Augsburg, and then, after exposing the conduct of the cardinal, continues:—

"I should like to answer the legate in the elector's stead.

"Prove that you speak with knowledge," I would say to him; 'let the whole affair be committed to writing, then I will send friar Martin to Rome; or rather, I myself will cause him to be seized and put to death. I will take care of my conscience and my honour, and allow no stain to sully my fame. But as long as your certain knowledge shuns the light, and manifests itself only by clamour, I cannot give credit to darkness.'

"This, most excellent prince, would be my answer.

"Let the reverend legate, or the pope himself, give a written specification of my errors; let them explain their reasons; let them instruct me who desire, who ask, and wish, and wait for instruction, inasmuch that even a Turk would not refuse to give it. If I retract not, and condemn myself after they shall have proved to me that the passages which I have cited ought to be understood differently from what I have done, then, O most excellent elector, let your highness be the first to pursue and chase me, let the university discard me and load me with its anger. Nay, more, (and I call heaven and earth to witness,) let the Lord Jesus Christ reject and condemn me! The words which I speak are not dictated by vain presumption, but by immoveable conviction. I am willing that the Lord God withdraw His grace from me, and that every creature of God refuse to countenance me, if, when a better doctrine shall have been shewn to me, I embrace it not.

"If, on account of the humbleness of my condition, they despise me, a poor paltry mendicant friar, and if they refuse to instruct me in the way of truth, let your highness pray the legate to point out to you in writing wherein I have erred; and if they refuse this favour even to your highness, let them write their views either to his imperial majesty, or to some archbishop of Germany. What ought I—what can I say more?

"Let your highness listen to the voice of your honour and your conscience, and not send me to Rome. No man can command you to do it, for it is impossible I can be in safety at Rome. The pope himself is not in safety there. It would be to order you to betray Christian blood. They have paper, pens, and ink, and they have also notaries without number. It is easy for them to write, and shew wherein and how I have erred. It will cost less to instruct me by writing while I am absent, than while present to accomplish my death by stratagem.

"I resign myself to exile. My enemies are so ensnaring me on all sides, that I can nowhere live in safety. In order that no evil may befall you on my account, I, in the name of God, abandon your territories. I will go wherever an almighty and merciful God wishes me to be. Let Him do with me as seemeth to Him good!

"Thus, then, most serene elector, with veneration I bid you farewell. I commend you to Almighty God, and give you immortal thanks for all your kindness towards me. Whatever be the people among whom I shall live in future, I will always remember you, and gratefully pray, without ceasing, for the happiness of you and yours. . . . I am still, thank God, full of joy, and I bless Him that Christ His Son counts me worthy of suffering in so holy a cause. May He eternally guard your illustrious highness! Amen!"

This letter, so replete with truth, made a profound impression on the elector. "He was shaken by a very eloquent letter," says Maimbourg. He never would have thought of delivering an innocent man into the hands of Rome. Perhaps he would have asked Luther to remain for some time in concealment, but not even in appearance would he have yielded, in any way, to the menaces of the legate. He wrote to his councillor Pffeffinger, who happened to be with the emperor, to make him acquainted with the real state of matters, and beg him to request Rome either to put an end to the affair, or at least leave it to be decided in Germany by impartial judges.

Some days after the elector replied to the legate: "Since Doctor Martin appeared before you at Augsburg, you ought to be satisfied. We did not expect that without having convicted him you would have thought of constraining him to retract. None of the learned in our dominions have told us that the doctrine of Martin is impious, antichristian, and heretical." The prince then refuses to send Luther to Rome, or banish him from his states.

This letter, which was communicated to Luther, filled him with joy. "Good God!" wrote he to Spalatin, "with what joy I have read it and re-read it. I know what confidence may be put in these words, so admirable at once for vigour and moderation. I fear the Romans will not comprehend all that is meant by them; but they will at least comprehend that what they thought already finished is not even begun. Have the goodness to present my thanks to the prince. It is strange that he (De Vio) who, not long ago, was a mendicant monk like me, is not afraid to accost the most powerful princes without respect, to interpell, threaten, and command them, and treat them with inconceivable pride. Let him learn that the temporal power is of God, and that it is not permitted him to trample its glory under foot."

Frederick, in answering the legate in a tone which he had not expected, had doubtless been encouraged by an address which he had received from the university of Wittenberg. This university had good reason for declaring in the doctor's favour, inasmuch as it was flourishing more and more, and eclipsing all the other schools. Crowds of students flocked from all parts of Germany to hear the extraordinary man whose lessons seemed to open a new era to religion and science. These youths who came from all the provinces, stopped at the moment when they perceived the steeples of Wittenberg in the distance, and, raising their hands to heaven, thanked God for making the light of truth shine on this town as formerly on Zion, and send its rays even to the remotest countries. A life and activity hitherto unknown animated the university. "They ply their studies here like ants," wrote Luther.

CHAPTER XI.

Thoughts of Departure—Allies to the Cause—Critical Moment—Deliverance—Luther's Courage—Discontentment at Rome—Bull—Appeal to a Council.

LUTHER, thinking that he might soon be banished from Germany, employed himself in preparing the "Acts of the Conference of Augsburg" for publication. He wished these acts to remain as evidence of the struggle which he had maintained with Rome. He saw the storm ready to burst, but feared it not. Day after day he expected the anathemas of Rome, and arranged and set everything in order, that he might be ready when they arrived. "Having tucked up my coat, and girt my reins," said he, "I am ready to depart like Abraham; not knowing whither I shall go, or rather knowing well, since God is everywhere." He intended to leave a farewell letter behind him. "Have the boldness, then," wrote he to Spalatin, "to read the letter of a man cursed and excommunicated."

His friends were in great fear and anxiety on his account, and begged him to enter himself prisoner in the hands of the elector, in order that that prince might somewhere keep him in safe custody.

His enemies could not understand what it was that gave him so much confidence. One day they were talking of him at the court of the Bishop of Brandenburg, and asking on what prop he could be leaning. "It must be in Erasmus," said they, "or Capito, or some other of the learned, that he confides." "No! no!" replied the bishop, "the pope would give himself very little trouble with such folks as these. His trust is in the university of Wittenberg and the Duke of Saxony." Thus both were ignorant of the fortress in which the reformer had taken refuge.

Thoughts of departure flitted across Luther's mind. They arose, not from fear, but from the foresight of continually recurring obstacles which the free profession of the truth must encounter in Germany. "If I remain here," said he, "the liberty of speaking and writing will, as to many things, be wrested from me. If I depart, I will freely unbosom the thoughts of my heart, and offer my life to Jesus Christ."

France was the country in which Luther hoped he would be able, untrammelled, to announce the truth. The liberty which the doctors and university of Paris enjoyed seemed to him worthy of envy. He was, besides, agreed with them on many points. What would have happened had he been transported from Wittenberg to France? Would the Reformation have taken place there as it did in Germany? Would the power of Rome have been dethroned?—and would France, which was destined to see the hierarchical principles of Rome, and the destructive principles of an infidel philosophy, long warring in its bosom, have become one great focus of Gospel light? It is useless to indulge in vain conjectures on this subject; but, perhaps, Luther at Paris might have somewhat changed the destinies of Europe and France.

Luther's soul was powerfully agitated. As he often preached at the town church in place of Simon Heyens Pontanus, pastor of Wittenberg, who was almost always sick, he thought it his duty, at all events, to take leave of a people to whom he had so often preached salvation. "I am," said he one day in the pulpit,—"I am a precarious and uncertain preacher. How often already have I set out suddenly without bidding you farewell. . . . In case the same thing should happen again, and I not return, here receive my adiens." After adding a few words more, he thus meekly and modestly ended: "I warn you, in fine, not to be alarmed though the papal censures let loose all their fury on me. Impute it not to the pope, and wish no ill either to him or any other mortal whatsoever; but commit the whole matter to God."

The moment seemed to have at length arrived. The prince gave Luther to understand he was desirous of his removal to a distance from Wittenberg; and the wishes of the elector were too sacred for him not to hasten to comply with them. He accordingly made preparations for his departure, without well knowing whither he should direct his steps. He wished, however, to have a last meeting with his friends, and for this purpose invited them to a farewell repast. Seated at table with them, he was still enjoying their delightful conversation, their tender and anxious friendship. A letter is brought to him. . . . It comes from the court. He opens and reads, and his heart sinks: it is a new order to depart. The prince asks why he is so long of setting out. His soul was filled with sadness. Still, however, he took courage, and raising his head, and looking around on his guests, said firmly and joyfully: "Father and mother forsake me, but the Lord will take me up." There was nothing for it but to depart. His friends were deeply moved. What is to become of him? If Luther's protector rejects him.

who will receive him? And the Gospel, and the truth, and this admirable work . . . ; all, doubtless, must fall with their illustrious witness. The Reformation apparently is hanging by a thread; and at the moment when Luther quits the walls of Wittenberg, will not the thread break? Luther and his friends spoke little. Stunned with the blow which was directed against their brother, they melt into tears. But some moments after a second message arrives, and Luther opens the letter, not doubting he is to find a renewal of the summons to depart. But, O powerful hand of the Lord! for this time he is saved. The whole aspect is changed. "As the new envoy of the pope hopes that everything may be arranged by means of a conference, remain still." So says the letter. How important an hour this was; and who can say what might have happened if Luther, who was always in haste to obey the will of his prince, had quitted Wittenberg immediately after the first message? Never were Luther and the work of the Reformation at a lower ebb than at this moment. Their destinies seemed to be decided; but an instant sufficed to change them. Arrived at the lowest point in his career, the doctor of Wittenberg rapidly reascended; and thenceforward his influence ceased not to increase. In the language of a prophet, The Eternal commands, and His servants descend into the depths; again they mount up to heaven.

Spalatin having, by order of Frederick, invited Luther to Lichtenberg to have an interview with him, they had a long conversation on the situation of affairs. "If the censures of Rome arrive," said Luther, "I certainly will not remain at Wittenberg." "Beware of being too precipitate with your journey to France," replied Spalatin, who left, telling him to wait till he heard from him. "Only recommend my soul to Christ," said Luther to his friends. "I see that my adversaries are strong in their resolution to destroy me; but at the same time Christ strengthens me in my resolution not to yield to them."

Luther at this time published the "Acts of the Conference at Augsburg." Spalatin, on the part of the elector, had written him not to do it; but it was too late. After the publication had taken place, the prince approved of it. "Great God!" said Luther in the preface, "what new—what astonishing crime, to seek light and truth! And more especially to seek them in the Church, in other words, in the kingdom of truth." In a letter to Link, he says: "I send you my Acts. They are more cutting, doubtless, than the legate expected; but my pen is ready to give birth to far greater things. I know not myself whence those thoughts come. In my opinion the affair is not even commenced; so far are the grandees of Rome from being entitled to hope it is ended. I will send you what I have written, in order that you may see whether I have divined well in thinking that the Antichrist of whom the Apostle Paul speaks is now reigning in the court of Rome. I believe I am able to demonstrate that it is at this day worse than the very Turks."

Ominous rumours reached Luther from all quarters. One of his friends wrote to him, that the new envoy of Rome had received orders to seize him, and deliver him up to the pope. Another told him, that in travelling he had fallen in with a courier, and the conversation having turned on the affairs of Germany, the courier declared that he had come under an obligation to deliver Luther into the hands of the sovereign pontiff. "But," wrote the reformer, "the more their fury and violence increase, the less I tremble."

At Rome there was great dissatisfaction with Cajetan. The chagrin which they felt at the failure of the affair, at first turned upon him. The Roman courtiers thought themselves entitled to reproach him with a want of that prudence and finesse which, if they are to be believed, constitute the first quality of a legate, and with having failed, on so important an occasion, to give pliancy to his scholastic theology. He is wholly to blame, said they. His lumbering pedantry has spoiled all. Of what use was it to irritate Luther by insults and menaces, instead of gaining him over by the promise of a good bishopric, or even of a cardinal's hat. These hirelings judged the reformer by themselves. However, it was necessary to repair this blunder. On the one hand, Rome must give her decision, and, on the other, due court must be paid to the elector, who might be of great use in the election of an emperor,—an event which must shortly take place.

As it was impossible for Roman ecclesiastics to suspect what constituted the strength and courage of Luther, they imagined that the elector was much more implicated in the affair than he really was. The pope, therefore, resolved to follow another line of conduct. He caused his legate in Germany to publish a bull, confirming the doctrine of indulgences on the very points in which they were attacked, but without mentioning either the elector or Luther. As the reformer had always expressed his readiness to submit to the decision of the Roman Church, the pope thought that he must now either keep his word, or stand openly convicted as a disturber of the peace of the Church, and a contemner of the holy apostolic see. In either case it seemed that the pope must gain. But nothing is gained by obstinately opposing the truth. In vain had the pope threatened to excommunicate every man who should teach otherwise than he ordered; the light was not arrested by such orders. The wise plan would have been to curb the pretensions of the venders of indulgences. This decree of Rome was therefore a new blunder. By legalizing clamant errors, it irritated all the wise, and made it impossible for Luther to return. "It was thought," says a Roman Catholic historian, a great enemy of the Reformation, "that this bull had been made solely for the interest of the pope and the mendicants, who began to find that nobody would give anything for their indulgences."

The Cardinal De Vio published the bull at Lintz, in Austria, on the 13th December, 1518; but Luther had already placed himself beyond its reach. On the 28th November, in the chapel of Corpus Christi at Wittemberg, he had appealed from the pope to a general council of the Church. He foresaw the storm which was gathering around him, and he knew that God alone could avert it. Still he did as duty called him. He must, no doubt, quit Wittemberg (were it only for the sake of the elector) as soon as the Roman anathema should arrive; but he was unwilling to quit Saxony and Germany without a strong protestation. This he accordingly drew up; and, in order that it might be ready for circulation the moment the furies of Rome, as he expresses it, should reach him, he caused it to be printed, under the express condition that the bookseller should deposit all the copies in his custody. But the bookseller, in his eagerness for gain, sold almost the whole, while Luther was quietly waiting to receive them. He felt annoyed, but the thing was done. This bold protestation spread everywhere. In it Luther declared anew that he had no intention to say anything against the holy Church, or the authority of the Apostolic See, or the pope well advised. "But," continues he, "considering that the pope, who is the vicar of God upon earth, may, like any other vicar, err, sin, or lie, and that the appeal to a general council is the only safeguard against unjust proceedings which it is impossible to resist, I feel myself obliged to have recourse to it."

Here, then, we see the Reformation launched on a new course. It is no longer made to depend on the pope and his decisions, but on an universal council. Luther addresses the whole Church, and the voice which proceeds from the chapel of Corpus Christi must reach the whole members of Christ's flock. There is no want of courage in the reformer, and here he gives a new proof of it. Will God fail him? The answer will be found in the different phases of the Reformation which are still to be exhibited to our view.

DANGERS had gathered round Luther and the Reformation. The doctor of Wittemberg's appeal to a general council was a new attack on papal authority. By a bull of Pius II, the greater excommunication had been denounced even against emperors who should dare to incur the guilt of such a revolt. Frederick of Saxony, as yet imperfectly confirmed in evangelical doctrine, was prepared to send Luther away from his states; and hence a new message from Leo might have thrown the reformer among strangers, who would be afraid to compromise themselves by receiving a monk whom Rome had anathematized. And even should the sword of some noble be drawn in his defence, mere knights, unable to cope with the powerful princes of Germany, must soon have succumbed in the perilous enterprise.

But at the moment when all the courtiers of Leo X. were urging him to rigorous measures, and when one blow more might have placed his adversary in his hands, the pope suddenly changed his course to one of conciliation and apparent mildness. It may be said, no doubt, that he was under a delusion as to the elector's feelings, and deemed them more decided in Luther's favour than they really were. It may also be admitted that the public voice, and the spirit of the age—powers which, at this time, were altogether new—seemed to throw an impregnable barrier around the reformer. It may even be supposed, with one of Leo's biographers,¹ that he followed the promptings of his mind and heart which inclined to gentleness and moderation. Still, this new mode of action, on the part of Rome, at such a moment, is so extraordinary that it is impossible not to recognise in it a higher and mightier hand.

There was then at the court of Rome a Saxon noble who was chamberlain to the pope and canon of Mentz, Trèves, and Meissen. He had turned his talents to advantage. As he boasted of being, in some degree, allied to the Saxon princes, the Roman courtiers sometimes designated him by the title of Duke of Saxony. In Italy he made an absurd display of his German nobility, while in Germany he adaped the manners and polish of the Italians. He was given to wine—a vice which his residence at the court of Rome had increased.

Still the Roman courtiers hoped great things from him. His German extraction—his insinuating address—and his ability in negotiation, all led them to expect that Charles de Miltitz (this was his name) would, by his prudence, succeed in arresting the mighty revolution which was threatening to shake the world.

It was of importance to conceal the true object of the chamberlain's mission; and in this there was no difficulty. Four years before, the pious elector had applied to the pope for the golden rose. This rose, the fairest of flowers, was emblematic of the body of Jesus Christ; and being annually consecrated by the sovereign pontiff, was presented to one of the first princes in Europe. On this occasion it was resolved to send it to the elector. Miltitz set out with a commission to examine into the state of affairs, and to gain over the elector's councillors, Spalatin and Pfeffinger, for whom he had special letters. Rome hoped that, by securing the favour of the persons about the prince, she would soon become mistress of her formidable adversary.

The new legate, who arrived in Germany in December, 1518, was careful, as he came along, to ascertain the state of public opinion. To his great astonishment he observed, at every place where he stopped, that the majority of the inhabitants were friendly to the Reformation, and spoke of Luther with enthusiasm. For one person favourable to the pope, there were three favourable to the reformer. Luther has preserved an anecdote of the journey: "What think you of the see (seat) of Rome?" frequently asked the legate at the mistresses of the inns and their maidservants. One day, one of these poor women, with great simplicity, replied: "How can we know what kind of seats you have at Rome, and whether they are of wood or stone?"

The mere rumour of the new legate's arrival filled the elector's court, the university, the town of Wittemberg, and all Saxony, with suspicion and distrust. "Thank God," wrote Melancthon, in alarm, "Martin still breathes." It was confidently stated that the Roman chamberlain had received orders to possess himself of Luther's person, by force or fraud; and the doctor was advised, on all hands, to be on his guard against the stratagems of Miltitz. "His object in coming," said they, "is to seize you and give you up to the pope. Persons worthy of credit have seen the briefs of which he is the bearer." "I await the will of God," replied Luther.

In fact, Miltitz brought letters addressed to the elector, and his councillors, to the bishops, and to the burgomaster of Wittemberg. He was also provided with seventy apostolic briefs. Should the flattery and the favours of Rome attain their object, and Frederick deliver Luther into her hands, these seventy briefs were to serve as a kind of passports. He was to produce and post up one of them in each of the towns through which he had to pass, and hope he might thus succeed in dragging his prisoner, without opposition, all the way to Rome.

The pope seemed to have taken every precaution. The electoral court knew not well what course to take. Violence would have been resisted; but the difficulty was to oppose the chief of Christianity, when speaking with so much mildness, and apparently with so much reason. Would it not be the best plan, it was said, to place Luther somewhere in concealment until the storm was over? . . . An unexpected event relieved Luther, the elector, and the Reformation, from this difficult situation. The aspect of affairs suddenly changed.

On the 12th of January, 1519, Maximilian, the emperor of Germany, died; and Frederick of Saxony, agreeably to the Germanic constitution, became regent of the empire. From this time the elector feared not the schemes of nuncios, while new interests began to engross the court of Rome—interests which, obliging her to be chary of giving offence to Frederick, arrested the blow which Miltitz and De Vio were undoubtedly meditating.

The pope earnestly desired to prevent Charles of Austria, already king of Naples, from ascending the imperial throne. A neighbouring king appeared to him more formidable than a German monk; and in his anxiety to secure the elector, who might be of essential service to him in the matter, he resolved to give some respite to the monk, that he might be the better able to oppose the king. Both, however, advanced in spite of him.

In addition to the change thus produced in Leo, there was another circumstance which tended to avert the storm impending over the Reformation. The death of the emperor was immediately followed by political commotions. In the south of the empire the Swabian confederation sought to punish Ulric of Wurtemberg for his infidelity to it; while in the south, the Bishop of Hildesheim proceeded, sword in hand, to invade the bishopric of Minden, and the territories of the Duke of Brunswick. How could men in power, amid such disturbances, attach any importance to a dispute relating to the remission of sins? But, above all, the reputation for wisdom enjoyed by the elector, now regent of the empire, and the protection which he gave to the new teachers, were made subservient by Providence to the progress of the Reformation. "The tempest," says Luther, "intermitted its fury, and papal excommunication began to fall into contempt. The Gospel, under the shade of the elector's regency, spread far and wide; and in this way great damage was sustained by the papacy."

Moreover, the severest prohibitions were naturally mitigated during an interregnum. In everything there was more freedom and greater facility of action. Liberty, which began to shed its rays on the infant Reformation, rapidly developed the still tender plant; and any one might have been able to predict how favourable political freedom would prove to the progress of evangelical Christianity.

Miltitz, having arrived in Saxony before the death of Maximilian, lost no time in visiting his old friend Spalatin; but no sooner did he begin his complaint against Luther, than the chaplain made an attack upon Tetzel, acquainting the nuncio with the lies and blasphemies of the vendor of indulgences, and assuring him that all Germany blamed the Dominican for the division which was rending the Church.

Miltitz was taken by surprise. Instead of accuser, he had become the accused. Turning all his wrath upon Tetzel, he summoned him to appear at Altenburg, and give an account of his conduct.

The Dominican—as great a coward as a bully, and afraid of the people whom he had provoked by his impostures—had ceased his peregrinations over town and country, and was living in retirement in the college of St. Paul. He grew pale on receiving the letter of Miltitz. Even Rome is abandoning, threatening, and condemning him,—is insisting on dragging him from the only asylum in which he feels himself in safety, and exposing him to the fury of his enemies. . . . Tetzel refused to obey the nuncio's summons. "Assuredly," wrote he to Miltitz, on the 31st of December, 1518, "I would not regard the fatigues of the journey if I could leave Leipsic without endangering my life; but the Augustine, Martin Luther, has so stirred up men in power, and incensed them against me, that I am not in safety anywhere. A great number of Luther's partizans have conspired my death, and therefore I cannot possibly come to you." There was a striking contrast between the two men,—the one of whom was then living in the college of St. Paul at Leipsic, and the other in the cloister of the Augustines at Wittemberg. In presence of danger the servant of God displayed intrepid courage—the servant of men despicable cowardice.

Miltitz had orders, in the first instance, to employ the arms of persuasion; and it was only in the event of failure that he was to produce his seventy briefs, and at the same time endeavour, by all the favours of Rome, to induce the elector to put down Luther. He accordingly expressed a desire to have an interview with the reformer. Their common friend, Spalatin, offered his house for this purpose, and Luther left Wittemberg on the 2d or 3d of January to repair to Altenburg.

At this interview Miltitz exhausted all the address of a diplomatist and a Roman courtier. The moment Luther arrived the nuncio approached him with great demonstrations of friendship. "Oh!" thought Luther, "how completely his violence is turned into gentleness! This new Saul came into Germany provided with more than seventy apostolic briefs, to carry me alive and in chains to murderous Rome; but the Lord has cast him down on the way."

"Dear Martin," said the pope's chamberlain to him in a coaxing tone, "I thought you were an old theologian, sitting quietly behind your stove, and stuffed with theological crotchets; but I see that you are still young, and in the full vigour of life. Do you know," continued he in a more serious tone, "that you have stirred up the whole world against the pope, and attached it to yourself?" Miltitz was aware that to flatter men's pride is the most effectual mode of seduc-

ing them; but he knew not the man with whom he had to do. "Had I an army of twenty-five thousand men," added he, "assuredly I would not undertake to seize you and carry you off to Rome." Rome, notwithstanding of her power, felt herself feeble in presence of a poor monk, and the monk felt strong in presence of Rome. "God," said Luther, "arrests the billows of the ocean at the shore, and arrests them . . . by the sand."

The nuncio, thinking he had thus prepared the mind of his opponent, continued as follows:—"Do you yourself bind up the wound which you have inflicted on the Church, and which you alone can cure." "Beware," added he, letting a few tears fall.—"beware of raising a tempest, which would bring ruin on Christendom." He then began gradually to insinuate that a recantation was the only remedy for the evil; but he, at the same time, softened the offensiveness of the term, by giving Luther to understand that he had the highest esteem for him, and by expressing his indignation at Tetzelt. The net was laid by a skilful hand, and how was it possible to avoid being taken in it? "Had the Archbishop of Mentz spoken thus to me at the outset," said the reformer afterwards, "this affair would not have made so much noise."

Luther then replied. With calmness, but also with dignity and force, he stated the just grievances of the Church; expressed all the indignation he felt at the Archbishop of Mentz; and nobly complained of the unworthy treatment he had received from Rome, notwithstanding of the purity of his intentions. Miltitz, though he had not expected this firm language, was able, however, to conceal his wrath.

Luther resumed: "I offer to be silent in future as to these matters, and let the affair die out of itself, provided my opponents also are silent; but if they continue to attack me, a petty quarrel will soon beget a serious combat. My armour is quite ready. I will do still more," added he, after a momentary pause; "I will write his holiness, acknowledging that I have been somewhat too violent, and declaring that it was as a faithful child of the Church I combated harangues which subjected her to mockery and insult from the people. I even consent to publish a document in which I will request all who read my books not to see anything in them adverse to the Roman Church, but to remain subject to her. Yes; I am disposed to do everything and bear everything; but as to retractation, never expect it from me."

Luther's decided tone convinced Miltitz that the wisest course was to appear satisfied with the promise which the reformer had just made; and he merely proposed that an archbishop should be appointed arbiter, to decide certain points which might come under discussion. "Be it so," said Luther; "but I am much afraid that the pope will not consent to have a judge. In that case no more will I accept the judgment of the pope—and then the strife will begin anew. The pope will give out the text, and I will make the commentary."

Thus terminated the first interview between Luther and Miltitz. They had a second, in which the truce, or rather peace, was signed. Luther immediately informed the elector of what had passed. "Most serene prince and very gracious lord," wrote he, "I hasten very humbly to inform your electoral highness, that Charles de Miltitz and I have at length agreed, and have terminated the affair by means of the two following articles:—

"1st, Both parties are forbidden to preach or write, or to do anything further in reference to the dispute which has arisen.

"2dly, Miltitz will immediately acquaint the holy father with the state of matters. His holiness will order an enlightened bishop to inquire into the affair, and specify the erroneous articles which I am required to retract. If I am found to be in error, I will retract willingly, and never more do anything that may be prejudicial to the honour or the authority of the holy Roman Church."

The agreement being thus made, Miltitz appeared quite delighted. "For a hundred years," exclaimed he, "no affair has given the cardinals and Roman courtiers more anxiety than this. They would have given ten thousand ducats sooner than consent to its longer continuance."

The chamberlain of the pope made a great shew of feeling before the monk of Wittenberg. Sometimes he expressed joy, at other times shed tears. This display of sensibility made little impression on the reformer; but he refrained from shewing what he thought of it. "I looked as if I did not understand what was meant by these crocodile tears," said he. The crocodile is said to weep when it cannot seize its prey.

Luther having accepted an invitation to supper from Miltitz, the host laid aside the stiffness attributed to his office, while Luther gave full scope to his natural gaiety. It was a joyous repast; and when the parting hour arrived, the legate took the heretical doctor in his arms and kissed him. "A Judas kiss," thought Luther; "I pretended," wrote he to Staupitz, "not to comprehend all these Italian manners."

Was this, then, to be, in truth, the kiss of reconciliation between Rome and the dawning Reformation? Miltitz hoped so, and rejoiced at it, for he had a nearer view than the courtiers of Rome of the fearful results which the Reformation might produce in regard to the papacy. If Luther and his opponents are silent, said he to himself, the dispute will be ended, and Rome, by availing herself of favourable circumstances, will regain all her ancient influence. It thus seemed that the debate was drawing to a close: Rome had stretched out her arms, and Luther had apparently thrown himself into them; but the Reformation was the work not of man, but of God. The error of Rome consisted in seeing the quarrel of a monk, where she ought to have seen an awakening of the Church. The revival of Christendom was not to be arrested by the kisses of a pope's chamberlain.

Miltitz, in fulfilment of the agreement which he had just concluded, proceeded from Altenburg to Leipsic, where Tetzel was residing. There was no occasion to shut Tetzel's mouth, for, sooner than speak, he would, if it had been possible, have hidden himself in the bowels of the earth; but the nuncio was determined to discharge his wrath upon him. Immediately on his arrival at Leipsic, Miltitz summoned the unhappy Tetzel before him, loaded him with reproaches, accused him of being the author of the whole mischief, and threatened him with the pope's displeasure. Nor was this all: the agent of the house of Fugger, who was then at Leipsic, was confronted with him. Miltitz laid before the Dominican the accounts of that house, together with papers which he himself had signed, and proved that he had squandered or stolen considerable sums. The poor wretch, who had stickled at nothing in his day of glory, was overwhelmed by the justice of these accusations: despair seized him, his health gave way, and he knew not where to hide his shame. Luther heard of the miserable condition of his old enemy, and was the only person who felt for him. In a letter to Spalatin, he says: "I pity Tetzel." Nor did he confine himself to such expressions. He had hated not the man, but his misconduct; and at the moment when Rome was pouring out her wrath upon him, wrote him in the most consolatory terms. But all was to no purpose. Tetzel, stung by remorse, alarmed at the reproaches of his best friends, and dreading the anger of the pope, not long after died miserably, and, as was supposed, of a broken heart.

Luther, in fulfilment of his promises to Miltitz, on the 3d of March wrote the following letter to the pope: "Blessed Father! will your blessedness deign to turn your paternal ears, which are like those of Christ himself, towards your poor sheep, and kindly listen to its bleat? What shall I do, most holy Father? I am unable to bear the fierceness of your anger, and know not how to escape from it. I am asked to retract, and would hasten to do so could it lead to the end which is proposed by it. But owing to the persecutions of my enemies, my writings have been circulated far and wide, and are too deeply engraven on men's hearts to be effaced. A recantation would only add to the dishonour of the Church of Rome, and raise an universal cry of accusation against her. Most holy Father! I declare before God and all His creatures, that I have never wished, and do not now wish, either by force or guile, to attack the authority of the Roman Church or of your holiness. I acknowledge that there is nothing in heaven or on the earth which ought to be put above this Church, unless it be Jesus Christ, the Lord of all."

These words might seem strange, and even reprehensible, in the mouth of Luther, did we not reflect that the light did not break in upon him all at once, but by slow and progressive steps. They shew, and this is very important, that the Reformation was not simply an opposition to the papacy. Its accomplishment was not effected by warring against this or that form, or by means of this or that negative tendency. Opposition to the pope was only one of its secondary features. Its creating principle was a new life, a positive doctrine: "Jesus Christ, the Lord of all, and paramount to all—to Rome herself," as Luther says in the conclusion of his letter. To this principle the revolution of the sixteenth century is truly to be ascribed.

It is probable that at an earlier period a letter from the monk of Wittemberg, positively refusing to retract, would not have been allowed by the pope to pass without animadversion. But Maximilian was dead, the topic of engrossing interest was the election of his successor; and amid the political intrigues which then agitated the pontifical city, Luther's letter was overlooked.

The reformer was employing his time to better purpose than his powerful antagonist. While Leo X., engrossed by his interests as a temporal prince, was straining every nerve to prevent a dreaded neighbour from reaching the imperial throne, Luther was daily growing in knowledge and in faith. He studied the decretals of the popes, and made discoveries which greatly modified his views. Writing Spalatin, he says: "I am reading the decretals of the popes, and, let me say it in your ear, I know not whether the pope is Antichrist himself, or only his apostle,—to such a degree, in these decretals, is Christ outraged and crucified."

Still he continued to respect the ancient Church of Rome, and had no thought of separating from her. "Let the Roman Church," said he, in the explanation which he had promised Miltitz to publish, "be honoured of God above all others. On this point there cannot be a doubt. St. Peter, St. Paul, forty-six popes, and several hundred thousand martyrs, have shed their blood in her bosom, and there vanquished hell and the world, so that the eye of God specially rests upon her. Although everything about her is now in a very sad condition, that is no ground for separating from her. On the contrary, the worse things are, the more firmly we should cling to her. Our separation is not the means by which she can be improved. We must not abandon God because there is a devil; nor the children of God, who are still at Rome, because the majority are wicked. No sin, no wickedness, can justify us in destroying charity or violating unity; for charity can do all things, and nothing is difficult to unity."

It was not Luther that separated from Rome, but Rome that separated from Luther; and by so doing rejected the ancient catholic faith, of which he was then the representative. Nor was it Luther that deprived Rome of her power, and compelled her bishop to descend from an usurped throne. The doctrines which he announced—the doctrine of the apostles again divinely proclaimed throughout the Church with great force and admirable purity—alone could prevail against a power by which the Church had for ages been enslaved.

These declarations, which Luther published at the end of February, did not fully satisfy Miltitz and De Vio. These two vultures, after both missing their prey, had retired within the ancient walls of Trèves. There, seconded by the prince-archbishop, they hoped jointly to accomplish the object in which they had failed individually. The two nuncios were aware that nothing more was to be expected from Frederick, now invested with supreme power in the empire. They saw that Luther persisted in his refusal of retraction. The only plan, therefore, was to withdraw the heretical monk from the protection of the elector, and entice him into their own neighbourhood. If the reformer were once in Trèves, in a state subject to a prince of the Church, he would be dexterous indeed if he got away without giving full satisfaction to the sovereign pontiff. The scheme was immediately proceeded with. "Luther," said Miltitz to the Elector-archbishop of Trèves, "has accepted your grace as arbiter; call him, therefore, before you." The Elector of Trèves accordingly (3d May) wrote to the Elector of Saxony, and requested him to send Luther. De Vio, and afterwards Miltitz himself, also wrote, announcing that the rose of gold had arrived at Augsburg, at the house of Fugger. Now, thought they, is the moment to strike the decisive blow.

But things were changed, and neither Frederick nor Luther felt alarmed. The elector, understanding his new position, had no longer any fear of the pope, and far less of his servants. The reformer, seeing Miltitz and De Vio in concert, had some idea of the fate which awaited him if he complied with their invitation. "Everywhere," says he, "on all hands, and in all ways, they seek my life." Besides, he had requested the pope to decide; but the pope, engrossed with crowns and intrigues, had given no answer. Luther thus wrote to Miltitz: "How could I undertake the journey, without an order from Rome, amid the troubles which shake the empire? How could I face so many dangers, and subject myself to so much expense, I who am the poorest of men?"

The Elector of Trèves, a man of wisdom and moderation, and a friend of Frederick, was willing to meet his views. He had no desire, moreover, to involve himself in the affair without being positively called upon. He therefore agreed with the Elector of Saxony to defer the investigation to the next diet. Two years elapsed before this diet assembled at Worms.

While the hand of Providence successfully warded off all the dangers which threatened him, Luther was boldly advancing to a result of which he was not himself aware. His reputation was extending, the cause of truth was gaining strength, and the number of the students of Wittemberg, among whom were the most distinguished young men in Germany, rapidly increased.

"Our town," wrote Luther, "can scarcely contain all who come to it;" and on another occasion: "The number of students increases out of measure, like a stream overflowing its banks."

But Germany was no longer the only country in which the voice of the reformer was heard. It had passed the frontiers of the empire, and begun to shake the foundations of the Roman power in the different states of Christendom. Frobenius, the famous printer of Bâle, had published the collected works of Luther, which were rapidly disposed of. At Bâle even the bishop applauded Luther; and the cardinal of Sion, after reading his work, exclaimed, somewhat ironically, and punning on his name, "O Luther, thou art a true Luther!" (Lauterer, a true purifier.)

Erasmus was at Louvain when Luther's works arrived in the Netherlands. The prior of the Augustines of Antwerp, who had studied at Wittenberg, and according to the testimony of Erasmus, held true primitive Christianity, and many other Belgians besides, read them with avidity. "But," says the scholar of Rotterdam, "those who sought only their own interest, and entertained the people with old wives' fables, gave full vent to their grovelling fanaticism." "It is not in my power," says Erasmus, in a letter to Luther, "to describe the emotions, the truly tragic scenes, which your writings have produced."

Frobenius sent six hundred copies of the works into France and Spain. They were publicly sold at Paris, and, as far as appears, the doctors of Sorbonne then read them with approbation. "It was time," said several of them, "that those engaged in the study of the Holy Scriptures should speak thus freely." In England the works were received with still greater eagerness. Spanish merchants at Antwerp caused them to be translated into their native tongue, and sent them into Spain. "Assuredly," says Pallavicini, "these merchants were of Moorish blood."

Calvi, a learned bookseller of Pavia, carried a great number of copies of the works into Italy, and circulated them in all the transalpine towns. This learned man was animated not by a love of gain, but a desire to contribute to the revival of piety. The vigour with which Luther maintained the cause of godliness filled him with joy. "All the learned of Italy," exclaimed he, "will concur with me; and we will see you celebrated in stanzas composed by our most distinguished poets."

Frobenius, in transmitting a copy of the publication to Luther, told him all these gladdening news, and added; "I have disposed of all the copies except ten, and never had so good a return." Other letters also informed Luther of the joy produced by his works. "I am glad," says he, "that the truth gives so much pleasure, although she speaks with little learning, and in a style so barbarous."

Such was the commencement of the revival in the different countries of Europe. In all countries, if we except Switzerland, and even France, where the Gospel had previously been heard, the arrival of Luther's writings forms the first page in the history of the Reformation. A printer of Bâle diffused these first germs of the truth. At the moment when the Roman pontiff entertained hopes of suppressing the work in Germany, it began in France, the Netherlands, Italy, Spain, England, and Switzerland; and now, even should Rome hew down the original trunk, what would it avail? The seeds are already diffused over every soil.

CHAPTER II.

The War seems ended in Germany.—Eck Revives the Contest—Debate between Eck and Carlstadt—The Question of the Pope—Luther Replies—Alarm of Luther's Friends—Luther's Courage—Truth triumphs single-handed—Refusal of Duke George—Delight of Mosellanus, and Fears of Erasmus.

WHILE the combat was only beginning beyond the limits of the empire, it seemed to him almost ceased within it. The most blustering soldiers of Rome, the Franciscan monks of Jüterbock, after having imprudently attacked Luther, had, after a vigorous rejoinder from the reformer, hastened to resume silence. The partisans of the pope were quiet; and Tetzel was unfit for service. Luther's friends conjured him not to persist in the contest, and he had promised to comply. The theses were beginning to be forgotten. By this perfidious peace the eloquent tongue of the reformer was completely paralyzed; and the Reformation seemed to be arrested. "But," says Luther afterwards, when speaking of this period, "men were imagining vain things, for the Lord had arisen to judge the nations." "God," says he in another place, "does not lead, but urges and hurries me along. I am not my own master. I would fain be at rest, but am precipitated into the midst of tumult and revolution."

The person who renewed the contest was Eck the schoolman, Luther's old friend, and the author of the "Obelisks." He was sincerely attached to the papacy, but seems to have been devoid of genuine religious sentiment, and to have belonged to a class of men, at all times too numerous, who value learning, and even theology and religion, merely as a means of gaining a name in the world. Vain glory lurks under the priest's cascock as well as the soldier's helmet. Eck had studied the art of disputation according to the scholastic rules, and was an acknowledged master in this species of warfare. While the knights of the Middle Ages, and the warriors at the period of the Reformation, sought glory in tournaments, the schoolmen sought it in the syllogistic disputations, which were often exhibited in universities. Eck, who was full of himself, stood high in his own opinion, and was proud of his talents, of the popularity of his cause, and the trophies which he had won in eight universities in Hungary, Lombardy, and Germany; eagerly longed for an opportunity of displaying his power and dexterity in debate with the reformer. He had spared nothing to secure the reputation of being one of the most celebrated scholars of the age. He was ever seeking to stir up new discussions, to produce a sensation, and by means of his exploits procure access to all the enjoyments of life. A tour which he made in Italy had, by his own account, been only a series of triumphs. The most learned of the learned had been constrained to subscribe to his theses. A practised bravo, he fixed his eyes on a new field of battle, where he thought himself secure of victory. That little monk, who had grown up all at once into a giant,—that Luther, whom no one had hitherto been able to vanquish,—offended his pride, and excited his jealousy. It might be that Eck, in seeking his own glory, might destroy Rome; . . . but scholastic vanity was not to be arrested by any such consideration. Theologians, as well as princes, have repeatedly sacrificed the general interest to their individual glory. Let us attend to the circumstances which gave the doctor of Ingolstadt an opportunity of entering the lists with his troublesome rival.

The zealous, but too ardent Carlstadt was still of one mind with Luther,—the special bond of union between them being their attachment to the doctrine of grace, and their admiration of St. Augustine. Carlstadt, who was of an enthusiastic temperament, and possessed little prudence, was not a man to be arrested by the address and policy of a Miltitz. In opposition to the "Obelisks" of Dr. Eck, he had published theses in which he defended Luther and their common faith. Eck had replied, and Carlstadt, determined not to leave him the last word, had rejoined. The combat grew warm. Eck, eager to avail himself of so favourable an opportunity, had thrown down the gauntlet; and the impetuous Carlstadt had taken it up. God employed the passions of these two men to accomplish His designs. Though Luther had taken no part in these debates, he was destined to be the hero of the fight. There are men whom the force of circumstances always brings upon the scene. Leipzig was fixed upon, and hence the origin of the celebrated discussion which bears its name.

Eck cared little about combating with Carlstadt, and even vanquishing him. Luther was the opponent whom he had in view. He accordingly employed every means to bring him into the field; and with this view published thirteen theses, directed against the leading doctrines which had been espoused by the reformer. The thirteenth was in these terms: "We deny that the Roman Church was not superior to other churches before the time of Pope Sylvester; and we acknowledge at all times, that he who has occupied the see of St. Peter and professed his faith, is the successor of St. Peter, and the vicar of Jesus Christ." Sylvester lived in the time of Constantine the great; and hence Eck, in this theses, denied that the primacy which Rome enjoyed was conferred on her by that emperor.

Luther, whose consent to remain silent had not been given without reluctance, was strongly excited when he read these propositions. He saw that he was the person aimed at, and felt that he could not, with honour, evade the contest. "This man," said he, "names Carlstadt as his antagonist, and at the same time makes his assault upon me. But God reigns, and knows what result He designs to bring out of this tragedy. The question is not between Dr. Eck and me. God's purpose will be accomplished. Thanks to Eck; this affair, which hitherto has been mere sport, will at length become serious, and give a fatal blow to the tyranny of Rome and the Roman pontiff."

Rome herself broke the agreement. She did more,—when she renewed the signal for battle, she directed it to a point which Luther had not previously attacked. The subject which Dr. Eck singled out for his antagonists was the primacy of the pope. In thus following the dangerous example which Tetzel had given, Rome invited the blows of the champion; and if she left her mangled members on the arena, she had herself to blame for the punishment inflicted by his mighty arm.

The pontifical supremacy being once overturned, the whole of the Roman platform fell to pieces. Hence, the papacy was in imminent peril; and yet neither Miltitz nor Cajetan took any steps to prevent this new contest. Did they imagine that the Reformation would be vanquished, or were they smitten with that blindness by which the ruin of the mighty is accomplished?

Luther, who, by his long silence, had given an example of rare moderation, boldly met the challenge of his antagonist, whose theses he immediately opposed by counter theses. The last was in these terms: "The primacy of the Church of Rome is defended by means of miserable decretals of the Roman pontiffs, composed within the last four hundred years; whereas this primacy is contradicted by the authentic history of eleven centuries, the declarations of Holy Scripture, and the canons of the Council of Nice, which is the purest of all councils."

At the same time Luther thus wrote to the elector: "God knows it was my firm determination to be silent; and I rejoiced to see the game at length brought to a close. So faithfully have I observed the paction concluded with the pope's commissioner, that I did not reply to Sylvester Prierias, notwithstanding of the taunts of adversaries and the counsels of friends. But now Dr. Eck attacks me; and not only me, but the whole university of Wittemberg besides. I cannot allow it to be thus covered with obloquy."

At the same time Luther wrote to Carlstadt: "I am unwilling, excellent Andrew, that you should engage in this quarrel, since I am the person aimed at." "I will gladly lay aside my serious labours and enter into the sports of these flatterers of the Roman pontiff." Then apostrophizing his adversary with disdain, and calling from Wittemberg to Ingolstadt, he exclaims: "Now, then, my dear Eck, be courageous, and gird thy sword upon thy thigh, thou mighty man. Having failed to please you as mediator, perhaps I will please you better as antagonist. Not that I have any thought of vanquishing you; but after all the trophies which you have gained in Hungary, Lombardy, and Bavaria, (at least if we are to take your account for it,) I will give you an opportunity of acquiring the name of the conqueror of Saxony and Misnia, so that you will be for ever saluted by the glorious title of Augustus."

All Luther's friends did not share his courage, for up to this hour none had been able to withstand the sophistry of Dr. Eck. But what alarmed them most was the subject of dispute—the primacy of the pope! . . . How does the poor monk of Wittemberg dare to encounter this giant who, for ages, has crushed all his enemies? The courtiers of the elector begin to tremble. Spalatin, the confidant of the prince, and intimate friend of the reformer, is full of anxiety. Frederick, too, feels uneasy: even the sword of the knight of the holy sepulchre, with which he had been armed at Jerusalem, would be unequal to this warfare. Luther alone feels no alarm. His thought is: The Lord will deliver him into my hands. The faith with which he is animated enables him to strengthen his friends. "I beg of you, my dear Spalatin," said he, "not to give yourself up to fear; you know well that if Christ was not with me, all that I have done up to this hour must have been my ruin. Was it not lately written from Italy, to the chancellor of the Duke of Pomerania, that I had upset Rome, and that, not knowing how to appease the tumult, they were purposing to attack me, not according to the forms of justice, but by Roman finesse, (the very words used,) that is, I presume, by poison, ambush, and assassination?"

"I restrain myself, and from love to the elector and the university, keep back many things which I would employ against Babylon, were I elsewhere. O my poor Spalatin! it is impossible to speak of Scripture and of the Church without irritating the beast. Never, therefore, hope to see me at rest, at least until I renounce theology. If this work is of God, it will not be terminated before all my friends have forsaken me, as Christ was forsaken by His disciples. Truth will endure single-handed, and triumph in virtue of its own prowess, not mine or yours, or any man's. If I fall, the world will not perish with me. But, wretch that I am, I fear I am not worthy to die in such a cause." "Rome," he again wrote about this time,—"Rome is burning with eagerness to destroy me, while I sit quiet and hold her in derision. I am informed that, in the field of Flora at Rome, one Martin Luther has been publicly burned in effigy, after being loaded with execrations. I abide their fury. The whole world," continues he, "is in agitation, heaving to and fro. What will happen? God knows. For my part, I foresee wars and disasters. The Lord have mercy on us."

Luther wrote letter after letter to Duke George, in whose states Leipsic is, entreating permission to repair thither and take part in the debate; but received no answer. The grandson of the Bohemian king, Podiebrad, alarmed at Luther's proposition concerning the pope, and afraid of seeing Saxony involved in the wars of which Bohemia had so long been the theatre, was unwilling to grant the doctor's request. Luther, therefore, determined to publish explanations of his thirteenth theses. But this treatise, far from persuading Duke George, on the contrary confirmed him in his resolution. Positively refusing to give the reformer authority to debate, he merely allowed him to be present as a spectator. This was a great disappointment to Luther. Nevertheless, as he had only one wish, and that was to obey God—he resolved to attend as a spectator, and await the result.

The prince at the same time did everything in his power to forward the discussion between Eck and Carlstadt. Duke George was devoted to the ancient doctrine; but he was upright and sincere, and friendly to free inquiry; and did not think that an opinion was to be charged with heresy, merely because it displeased the court of Rome. The elector, moreover, urged his cousin to permit the discussion; and the duke, confirmed by Frederick's statements, ordered it to take place.

Bishop Adolphus of Merseburg, in whose diocese Leipsic is situated, was more alive than Miltitz and Cajetan to the danger of trusting such important questions to the chances of single combat. Rome could not expose the fruit of the labours of so many ages to such hazard. All the theologians of Leipsic were equally alarmed, and implored their bishop to prevent the discussion. Adolphus accordingly presented most energetic remonstrances to Duke George, who replied with much good sense: "I am surprised at seeing a bishop so terrified at the ancient and laudable custom of our fathers, in examining doubtful questions as to matters of faith. If your theologians refuse to defend their doctrines, the money given to them would be far better employed in the maintenance of aged women and young children, who would be able at least to spin and sing."

This letter had little effect on the bishop and his theologians. There is in error a secret consciousness which makes it dread inquiry even when making loud professions of being favourable to it. After an imprudent advance it makes a cowardly retreat. Truth did not give the challenge, but firmly stood its ground. Error gave it, and ran off. Moreover, the prosperity of the university of Wittenberg excited the jealousy of that of Leipsic. The monks and priests inveighed from the pulpits of that city, urging the people to shun the new heretics—slandering Luther, and painting him, as well as his friends, in the blackest colours, in order to stir up the fanaticism of the populace against the reformers. Tetzel, who was still alive, awoke to cry from the depth of his retreat,—"It is the devil that is forcing on this contest."

All the professors of Leipsic, however, did not participate in these apprehensions. Some belonged to the indifferent class, consisting of persons who are always ready to laugh at the faults of both parties. Of this class was the Greek professor, Peter Mosellanus, who cared very little for John Eck, Carlstadt, and Martin Luther; but anticipated great amusement from the strife. Writing to his friend Erasmus, he says: "John Eck, who is the most illustrious of pen gladiators and rhapsodists, and like the Socrates of Aristophanes, contemns even the gods, is to have a turn in debate with Andrew Carlstadt. The battle will end in uproar, and there will be laughter in it for ten Democratuses."

The timid Erasmus, on the contrary, was frightened at the idea of a combat, and his prudence—ever ready to take alarm—would fain have prevented this discussion. In a letter to Melancthon, he says: "If you will be advised by Erasmus, you will be more anxious to promote the advancement of sound literature than to attack the enemies of it. My belief is, that in this way our progress will be greater. Above all, while engaged in this struggle, let us not forget that victory must be obtained, not only by eloquence, but also by moderation and meekness." Neither the alarms of priests, nor the prudence of pacificators, could now prevent the combat. The parties made ready their weapons.

CHAPTER III.

Arrival of Eck and the Wittenbergers—Amsdorf—The Students—Carlstadt's accident—Planard—Eck and Luther—Pleissenburg—Shall Judges be appointed?—Luther objects.

At the time when the electors met at Frankfurt to give an emperor to Germany, (June, 1519,) theologians met at Leipsic for an act which, though unnoticed by the world, was destined to be not less important in its results.

Eck was the first who arrived at the place of rendezvous. On the 21st June he entered Leipsic in company with Poliander, a young man whom he had brought from Ingolstadt to report the debate. All kinds of honours were paid to the scholastic doctor, who, on the fête Dieu, paraded the town in full canonicals, and at the head of a numerous procession. There was a general eagerness to see him. According to his own account, all the inhabitants were in his favour. "Nevertheless," adds he, "a rumour was current in the town that I was to be worsted in the encounter."

The day after the fête—viz., Friday, 24th June, (St. John's day)—the Wittenbergers arrived. Carlstadt, Eck's destined opponent, came first in a chariot by himself. Next, in an open carriage, came Duke Barnim of Pomerania, who was then studying at Wittenberg under the direction of a tutor, and had been elected rector of the university. On each side of him sat the two great theologians,—the fathers of the Reformation,—Melancthon and Luther. Melancthon had been unwilling to quit his friend. He had said to Spalatin: "Martin, the soldier of the Lord, has stirred up this foetid marsh. I cannot think of the shameful conduct of the pope's theologians without indignation. Be firm, and adhere to us." Luther himself had expressed a desire that his Achates, as he has been called, should accompany him.

John Lange, vicar of the Augustines, some doctors in law, several masters of arts, two licentiates in theology, and other ecclesiastics, among whom Nicholas Amsdorf was conspicuous, closed the rear. Amsdorf, the member of a noble family in Saxony, disregarding the brilliant career which his birth might have opened to him, had devoted himself to theology. The theses on indulgences having brought him to the knowledge of the truth, he had forthwith made a bold profession of the faith. Vigorous in intellect, and vehement in temper, Amsdorf often pushed on Luther, by nature abundantly ardent, to acts which were, perhaps, imprudent. Born to high rank, he was not overawed by the great, and occasionally addressed them with a freedom bordering on rudeness. "The Gospel of Jesus Christ," said he one day in an assembly of nobles, "belongs to the poor and afflicted, and not to you princes, lords, and courtiers, whose lives are passed in luxury and joy."

But we have not yet mentioned the whole train from Wittenberg. A large body of students accompanied their teachers. Eck affirms that the number amounted to two hundred. Armed with pikes and halberds, they walked beside the carriages of the doctors, ready to defend them, and proud of their cause.

Such was the order in which the body of reformers entered Leipsic. Just as they passed the Grimma gate, which is in front of St. Paul's cemetery, one of the wheels of Carlstadt's carriage broke down. The archdeacon, who, with great self-complacency, was enjoying the solemn entry, tumbled into the mire. He was not hurt, but was obliged to proceed to his lodgings on foot. Luther's chariot, which was immediately behind Carlstadt's, moved rapidly forward, and delivered the reformer safe and sound. The inhabitants of Leipsic, who had assembled to witness the entry of the Wittenberg champions, considered the accident as a bad omen for Carlstadt; and the inference was soon current over the town—viz., that he would be defeated in the combat, but that Luther would come off victorious.

Adolphus of Merseburg did not remain idle. As soon as he learned the approach of Luther and Carlstadt, and even before they had lighted from their carriages, he caused a notice to be posted up on all the church-doors, forbidding the discussion under pain of excommunication. Duke George, astonished at his presumption, ordered the town council to tear down the bishop's placard, and imprison the individual which had been employed to put it up. The Duke George, who had come in person to Leipsic, attended by all his court,—among others, by Jerome Emser, with whom Luther spent the famous evening at Dresden,—sent the disputants the usual presents. "The duke," boasted Eck, "presented me with a fine stag, and gave Carlstadt only a roebuck."

Eck was no sooner informed of Luther's arrival than he called upon him. "What!" said he, "it is said that you refuse to debate with me!"

Luther.—"How can I when the duke forbids me?"

Eck.—"If I cannot debate with you, I am not anxious to have anything to do with Carlstadt. It was for you I came here." Then, after a short pause, he added: "If I obtain the duke's permission, will you take the field?"

Luther, (joyfully).—"Obtain it, and we shall debate."

Eck forthwith repaired to the duke, and tried to dissipate his fears, representing to him that he was certain of victory; and that the authority of the pope, so far from suffering by the discussion, would come out of it more glorious. "We must strike at the head. If Luther stands erect, so do all his adherents—if he falls, they all fall." George granted permission.

The duke had caused a large hall to be prepared in his palace of Pleissenburg. Two desks had been erected opposite to each other; tables arranged for the notaries who were to take down the discussion in writing; and benches for the spectators. The desks and benches were covered with rich tapestry. At the doctor of Wittenberg's desk was suspended the portrait of St. Martin, after whom he was named; and at that of Dr. Eck, the portrait of the knight of St. George. "We shall see," said the arrogant Eck, with his eye on the emblem, "whether I do not, with my steel, trample down my enemies." Everything bespoke the importance which was attached to the combat.

On 25th June, the parties met in the castle to arrange the order of proceeding. Eck, who had more confidence in his declamation and gesture, than in his arguments, exclaimed: "We will debate freely, off hand; and the notaries will not take down our words in writing."

Carlstadt.—"The agreement was, that the discussion should be written down, published, and submitted to the judgment of all men."

Eck.—"To write down everything, is to wear out the spirit of the disputants, and protract the battle. In that case, there can be no hope of the vivacity requisite in an animated debate. Do not lay an arrest on the flow of eloquence."

Dr. Eck's friends supported his proposal, but Carlstadt persisted in his objection, and Eck was obliged to yield.

Eck.—"Be it so, let there be writing; but, at all events, the debate, when taken down by the notaries, is not to be published before it has been submitted to the decision of judges."

Luther.—"The truth of Dr. Eck and the Eckians fears the light."

Eck.—"There must be judges."

Luther.—"And what judges?"

Eck.—"After the debate is over we will agree upon them."

The object of the partizans of Rome was evident. If the theologians of Wittenberg accepted judges, their cause was lost. It was obvious beforehand who the persons were whom their opponents would suggest; and yet the reformers, if they refused them, would be covered with obloquy, as it would be circulated everywhere that they were afraid of submitting to impartial judges.

The judges whom the reformers desired were not individuals whose opinion was already declared, but the whole of Christendom. Their appeal was made to the general voice. It mattered little who condemned them, if, in pleading the cause in presence of the Christian world, they succeeded in bringing some individuals to the light. "Luther," says a Roman historian, "demanded all the faithful for judges—in other words, demanded a tribunal so numerous that there could be no urn large enough to hold its votes."

The meeting broke up. "See their stratagem," said Luther and his friends to each other. "They would, to a certainty, ask to have the pope or the universities for judges."

In fact, the theologians of Rome, next morning, sent one of their party to Luther, with a proposal that the judge should be—the pope! . . . "The pope!" said Luther, "how can I accept him?"

"Beware," exclaimed all his friends, "of accepting conditions so unjust." Eck and his friends having consulted anew, gave up the pope, and proposed certain universities. "Don't take from us the liberty which you have already granted us," replied Luther. "We cannot yield this point," resumed Eck. "Then," exclaimed Luther, "I don't debate."

They again parted, and what had just passed was talked of over the whole town. The Romans kept crying everywhere: "Luther won't debate—he refuses to accept of any judge!" Commenting on, and torturing his words, they endeavoured to represent them in the most unfavourable light. "What! truly? he will not debate?" say the best friends of the reformer, and hasten to him to express their alarm. "You decline the contest!" exclaim they. "Your refusal will bring eternal disgrace on your university and your cause." This was to attack Luther in his most tender point. "Very well," replied he, his heart filled with indignation, "I accept the terms which are imposed on me; but I reserve a right of appeal, and I decline the court of Rome."

CHAPTER IV.

The Procession—Mass—Mosellanus—Veni, Sancte Spiritus!—Portraits of Luther and Carlstadt—Doctor Eck—Carlstadt's Books—Merit of Conquity—Natural Powers—Scholastic Distinction—Point where Rome and the Reformation separate—Grace gives man freedom—Carlstadt's Note Book—Commotion in the auditory—Melancthon during the debate—Manœuvres of Eck—Luther Preaches—The Citizens of Leipsic—Quarrels of Students and quarrels of Teachers.

THE 27th of June was the day fixed for the commencement of the discussion. In the morning the parties met in the hall of the university, and thereafter walked in procession to the Church of St. Thomas, where high mass was celebrated by the order and at the expense of the duke. After service, those present proceeded to the ducal castle. At their head walked Duke George and the Duke of Pomerania; next came counts, abbots, knights, and other persons of distinction; and lastly, the doctors of the two parties. A guard composed of seventy-six citizens, carrying halberds, accompanied the procession, with colours flying, and drums beating, and halted at the castle gate.

On the arrival at the palace, each took his place in the hall where the debate was to take place.—Duke George, the hereditary Prince John, Prince George of Anhalt, a boy of twelve, and the Duke of Pomerania, occupying the seats allotted to them.

Mosellanus, by order of the duke, mounted a pulpit, to remind the theologians of the manner in which the discussion was to be carried on. "If you begin to quarrel," said the orator to them, "what difference will there be between a theological disputant and a swaggering duellist? What is victory here but just to recall a brother from his error? . . . Each, it would seem, should be more desirous to be conquered than to conquer."

At the conclusion of the address sacred music echoed along the aisles of the Pleissenburg, the whole assembly knelt down, and the ancient hymn of invocation to the Holy Spirit, Veni, Sancte Spiritus, was sung. Solemn hour in the annals of the Reformation! The invocation was thrice repeated; and while the solemn chant was pealing, the defenders of the ancient, and the champions of the new doctrines, the men of the Church of the Middle Ages, and those desirous of re-establishing the Church of the apostles, mingling together without distinction, in lowly attitude bent their faces to the ground. The ancient tie of one single communion still united all these different minds, and the same prayer still proceeded from all these lips, as if a single heart had dictated it.

These were the last moments of external lifeless unity for which a new spiritual living unity was about to be substituted. The Holy Spirit was invoked in behalf of the Church, and the Holy Spirit was about to answer by a revival of Christendom.

When the hymn and prayer were finished, the assembly rose up. The discussion should have now commenced; but as the hour of noon had arrived, there was an adjournment of two hours.

The leading personages who proposed to attend the debate, having dined with the duke, returned with him, after dinner, to the castle hall, which was filled with spectators. Meetings of this description were the public assemblies in which the representatives of the age discussed questions of general and engrossing interest.

TOWN HALL, LEIPSIG.

The orators were soon at their post. That a better idea may be formed of them, we will give their portraits, as drawn by one of the most impartial witnesses of the debate.

“Martin Luther is of middle size, and so emaciated by hard study that one might almost count his bones. He is in the vigour of life, and his voice is clear and sonorous. His learning and knowledge of the Holy Scriptures are beyond compare; he has the whole Word of God at command. In addition to this, he has great store of arguments and ideas. It were, perhaps, to be wished that he had a little more judgment in arranging his materials. In conversation he is candid and courteous; there is nothing stoical or haughty about him; he has the art of accommodating himself to every individual. His address is pleasing, and replete with good humour. He displays firmness, and is never discomposed by the menaces of his adversaries, be they what they may. One is, in a manner, compelled to believe that, in the great things which he has done, God must have assisted him. He is blamed, however, for being more sarcastic in his rejoinders than becomes a theologian, especially when he announces new religious ideas.

“Carlstadt is of smaller stature; his complexion is dark and sallow, his voice disagreeable, his memory less retentive, and his temper more easily ruffled than Luther's. Still, however, he possesses, though in an inferior degree, the same qualities which distinguish his friend.

“Eck is tall and broad-shouldered. He has a strong and truly German voice, and such excellent lungs that he would be well heard on the stage, or would make an admirable town-crier. His accent is rather coarse than elegant; and he has none of the gracefulness so much lauded by Cicero and Quintilian. His mouth, his eyes, and his whole features, suggest the idea of a soldier or a butcher, rather than a theologian. His memory is excellent; and were his intellect equal to it, he would be faultless. But he is slow of comprehension, and wants judgment, without which all other gifts are useless. Hence, when he debates, he piles up, without selection or discernment, passages from the Bible, quotations from the Fathers, and arguments of all descriptions. His assurance, moreover, is unbounded. When he finds himself in a difficulty, he darts off from the matter in hand, and pounces upon another; sometimes, even he adopts the view of his antagonist, and, changing the form of expression, most dexterously charges him with the very absurdity which he himself was defending.”

Such, according to Mosellanus, were the men who drew the eyes of the crowds who were then thronging into the great hall of Pleissenburg.

The discussion was opened by Eck and Carlstadt.

Eck, for some moments, fixed his eyes on the books which lay on the little table in front of his opponent's desk, and seemed to give him uneasiness,—they were the Bible and the Fathers. “I decline the discussion,” exclaimed he suddenly, “if you are allowed to bring books with you.” A theologian have recourse to his books in discussion! The astonishment of Dr. Eck was still more astonishing. “It is merely a fig-leaf which this Adam is employing to hide his shame,” said Luther. “Did Augustine consult no books in combating the Manichees?” No matter!—Eck's partizans made a great noise. Carlstadt remonstrated. “The man is altogether devoid of memory,” said Eck. At last it was decided, agreeably to the desire of the chancellor of Ingolstadt, that each disputant should have the use only of his memory and his tongue. “Thus, then,” said several, “the object in this debate will not be to discover truth, but to shew off the eloquence and memory of the disputants.”

The discussion lasted seventeen days; but as it is impossible to give the whole of it, we must, as a historian says, imitate painters who, in representing a battle, place the most distinguished exploits in front, and leave the others in the background.

The subject of discussion between Eck and Carlstadt was important. "Before conversion," said Carlstadt, "the will of man is incapable of doing good; every good work comes entirely and exclusively from God, who gives first the will to do, and afterwards the ability to perform." This truth is proclaimed by the Scriptures, which say: It is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of His good pleasure; and by Augustine, who, in disputing with the Pelagians, delivers it in almost the very same terms. Every work in which there is neither love to God nor obedience to His will, is, in His sight, devoid of the only quality which could render it truly good, even should it be, in other respects, dictated by the most honourable human motives. Now, there is in man a natural enmity to God—an enmity which he is utterly unable to suppress. He has not the power to do so; he even wants the will. If ever, therefore, it is to be suppressed, it must be by the power of God.

This is the doctrine of free will, so much declaimed against in the world, and yet so simple. It had been the doctrine of the Church. But the schoolmen had explained it in a manner which caused it to be misunderstood. No doubt, (said they,) the natural will of man cannot do anything which is truly pleasing to God; but it can do much to render man more capable and more worthy of receiving divine grace. These preparatives they termed merit of congruity; "because," as St. Thomas expressed it, "it is congruous for God to bestow peculiar favour on those who make a good use of their will." In regard, again, to the conversion which man must undergo, it is no doubt true that, according to the schoolmen, the grace of God behoved to accomplish it; but still without excluding his natural powers. "These powers," said they, "have not been annihilated by sin—sin only puts an obstacle in the way of their development; but as soon as this obstacle is removed, (and this, according to them, was what the grace of God had to do,) these powers begin again to act." To use one of their favourite comparisons—"the bird whose legs are tied does not thereby lose either its powers, or forget the art of flying, though it must be loosed by some other hand before it can be able again to use its wings." "The same," said they, "is the case with man."

Such was the question discussed between Eck and Carlstadt. At first, Eck seemed to deny Carlstadt's propositions out and out; but feeling the difficulty of maintaining his ground, said: "I grant that the will has not power to do a good work, but receives it from God." "Confess, then," rejoined Carlstadt, overjoyed at obtaining such a concession, "that every good work comes entirely from God." "Every good work comes indeed from God," replied the schoolman subtly, "but not entirely." "There," exclaimed Melancthon, "goes a discovery well worthy of theological science." "An apple," added Eck, "is all produced by the sun, but not altogether, and without the co-operation of the tree." Assuredly no man ever thought of maintaining that an apple is all produced by the sun.

"Very well," said his opponents, going still deeper into this delicate question, so important in philosophy and in religion, "let us consider how God acts on man, and how man conducts himself when so acted on." "I acknowledge," said Eck, "that in conversion the first impulse comes from God, and that the human will is entirely passive." So far the disputants were agreed. "I acknowledge," said Carlstadt, on his part, "that after this first action on the part of God, something must come from man, something which St. Paul calls the will, and which the Fathers designate by consent."

Here again both parties were agreed: but at this point the separation began. "This consent of man," said Eck, "comes partly from our natural will, and partly from the grace of God."—"No," said Carlstadt, "this will in man is entirely created by God." Hereupon Eck began to express astonishment and indignation at words so well fitted to impress man with a sense of his utter nothingness. "Your doctrine," exclaims he, "makes man a stone or a block, incapable of any counter action. . . ."—"What!" replied the reformers, "does not the faculty of receiving the powers which God produces in him, (a faculty which we admit that he possesses,) sufficiently distinguish him from a stone and a block?" "But," resumed their antagonist, "by denying man all natural power, you contradict experience."—"We deny not," was the reply, "that man possesses certain powers, and has in him a faculty of reflecting, meditating, and choosing. We only consider these powers and faculties as mere instruments, incapable of doing anything that is good, until the hand of God sets them in motion. They are like the saw in the hands of the sawyer."

The great question of liberty was here debated; and it was easy to demonstrate that the doctrine of the reformers did not divest man of the liberty of a moral agent, or make him a passive machine. The liberty of a moral agent consists in the power of acting conformably to his choice. Every action done without external constraint, and in consequence of the determination of the mind itself, is a free action. The mind is determined by motives; but we constantly see that the same motives act differently on different minds. Many do not act conformably to the motives which their judgment approves. This inefficiency of motives is attributable to the obstacles which they meet with in the corruption of the understanding and the heart. Now, God, by giving a new heart and a new spirit, removes those obstacles, and thereby, so far from depriving man of freedom, on the contrary removes what prevented him from acting freely, and in obedience to the dictates of his conscience. In the language of the Gospel, it renders him "free indeed," (John viii. 36.)

A slight incident for a short time interrupted the debate. Carlstadt (this is Eck's account) had prepared different heads of argument; and, as is done by many of the orators of our day, read what he had written. Eck saw in this only a school-boy's tactics, and objected. Carlstadt, embarrassed, and fearing he might be taken at a disadvantage if deprived of his notebook, insisted on retaining it. "Ah!" said the scholastic doctor, quite proud of the advantage which he thought he had over him, "his memory is shorter than mine." The point having been submitted to arbiters, it was decided that quotations from the Fathers might be read; but that in other respects the discussion should be extempore.

This first part of the discussion often met with interruption from the audience. They ruffed and screamed. Any proposition offensive to the ears of the majority instantly aroused their clamour, and then, as in our day, it was necessary to call to order. The disputants also occasionally allowed themselves to be carried away in the heat of discussion.

Melancthon sat near Luther, and attracted almost equal attention. He was of short stature, and would scarcely have been thought more than eighteen. Luther, who was a whole head taller, seemed to be united to him by the closest friendship; they came in, went out, and walked together. "To look at Melancthon," says a Swiss theologian,¹ who studied at Wittenberg, "one would think him a mere boy; but in judgment, learning, and talent, he is a giant. It is difficult to comprehend how so much wisdom and genius can be contained within so puny a body." Between the sittings, Melancthon conferred with Carlstadt and Luther. He assisted them in preparing for the debate, and suggested arguments drawn from the stores of his vast erudition; but during the discussion he remained quietly seated among the spectators, giving close attention to everything that was said by the theologians. Occasionally, however, he came to the aid of Carlstadt. When the latter was on the point of giving way under the powerful declamation of the chancellor of Ingolstadt, the young professor whispered a word in his ear, or slipt a paper to him on which he had noted down the answer. Eck on one occasion perceived this, and indignant that this grammarian, as he called him, should presume to intermeddle with the discussion, turned towards him, and haughtily said: "Be silent, Philip; keep to your own studies, and give me no disturbance." Perhaps Eck had already a presentiment of the formidable adversary he was afterwards to encounter in this young man. Luther was offended at the rude insult given to his friend; "The judgment of Philip," said he, "weighs more with me than that of a thousand Doctor Ecks."

The calm Melancthon easily discerned the weak points of this discussion. "We can only be surprised," says he, with the wisdom and grace conspicuous in all his words, "when we think of the violence which was brought to the discussion of such subjects. How could any advantage be derived from it? The Spirit of God loves retreat and silence; there dwell those whose hearts He penetrates. The bride of Christ does not stand in streets and public places, but conducts the Bridegroom into her mother's house."

Both parties claimed the victory. Eck employed all his address to make it appear that he had gained it. As the points of divergence almost met, he often exclaimed that he had brought over his opponent to his opinion; or like a new Proteus, as Luther calls him, turning suddenly round, he stated Carlstadt's own opinion in different words, and then asked, with an air of triumph, if he did not feel constrained to yield. The unskilful, who were unable to detect the sophist's manoeuvre, applauded and triumphed with him. . . .

In several respects the match was unequal. Carlstadt was slow, and sometimes left his opponent's objections unanswered till next day. Eck, on the contrary, was master of his subject, and could lay his hand at once on whatever he required. He came forward with a haughty air, mounted his desk with a firm step, and when there, stamped with his foot, moved backwards and forwards, made the ceiling ring with his powerful voice, gave some sort of reply to every argument, and astonished the audience with his memory and adroitness. Still Eck, without perceiving it, conceded much more in the discussion than he had intended. His partizans shouted and laughed at each of his turns; "but," says Luther, "I strongly suspect they only made a shew of laughing, and were exceedingly vexed at heart when they saw their chief, who had commenced with so much bravado, quit his standard, abandon his army, and become a shameless deserter."

Three or four days after the discussion had commenced, it was interrupted by the feast of St. Peter and St. Paul.

The Duke of Pomerania requested Luther to preach before him, on the occasion, in his chapel. Luther gladly complied. The chapel was soon filled, and crowds still arriving, it became necessary to remove to the great hall of the castle, where the discussion was held. Luther preached from the text of the day, on the grace of God, and the power of Peter; and gave a popular exposition of the views which he was wont to maintain before a learned audience. Christianity causes the light of truth to penetrate alike into the highest and the humblest intellects, and is in this way distinguished from all other religions, and from all philosophical systems. The theologians of Leipsic, who had been present at the sermon, hastened to acquaint Eck with the expressions which had offended them. "These subtle errors," exclaimed they, "must be answered—must be publicly refuted." This was just what Eck wished. All the churches were open to him; and on four successive occasions he mounted the pulpit to declaim against Luther and his sermon. Luther's friends were indignant, and demanded that the theologian of Wittenberg should be heard in his turn. But they demanded in vain. The pulpits were open to the enemies of evangelical truth; but shut against those who proclaimed it. "I kept silence," says Luther, "and was obliged to submit to attacks, insults, and calumnies, without being able to exculpate and defend myself."

The ecclesiastics were not the only persons who displayed hostility to the evangelical doctrine: the citizens of Leipsic were, in this respect, of one mind with their clergy, and yielded themselves up with blind fanaticism to the falsehoods and animosities which were industriously propagated. The principal inhabitants did not visit either Luther or Carlstadt. They left them unnoticed when they met them in the street, and tried to prejudice the duke against them. On the other hand, they visited and gave daily entertainments to the doctor of Ingolstadt, who enjoyed their good cheer, and learnedly discussed the comparative merits of Saxony and Bavarian beer. His manners, somewhat free, did not indicate a very strict morality. The only thing offered to Luther was the customary present of wine to the disputants. Moreover, even those who wished him well were anxious that others should not know it; several Nicodemites visited him by night or in secret. There were only two who did themselves honour by publicly declaring their friendship. These were Dr. Auerbach, whom we have already met at Augsburg, and Dr. Pistor, junior.

The greatest excitement prevailed in the town. The two parties formed, as it were, two hostile camps, and sometimes came to blows. In taverns, frequent quarrels took place between the students of Leipsic and Wittenberg. It was openly averred, even at meetings of the clergy, that Luther carried about with him a devil, confined in a little box. "Whether the devil is in a box, or only under his frock," said Eck, maliciously, "I know not; but most assuredly he is in one or other of them."

During the discussion, several doctors of both parties lodged with the printer Herbigopolis; and the dispute ran so high, that the host was obliged to station a town-officer at the top of the table with a halbert to keep the peace, and prevent the guests from coming to blows. One day, Baumgartner, a vender of indulgences, had a scuffle with a gentleman, a friend of Luther, and fell into such a rage that he dropt down dead. Frösehel, who gives the account, says: "I was one of those who carried him to the grave." The general agitation which prevailed was thus manifested. Then, as now, the discourses of the desk were echoed in the drawing-room and in the streets.

Duke George, though very decidedly in favour of Eck, did not betray so much passion as his subjects. He invited Eck, Luther, and Carlstadt, to dine together with him. He even asked Luther to pay him a visit in private; but soon shewed how strongly he was prejudiced against him. "By your book on the Lord's Prayer," said the duke to him, with bitterness, "you have led many consciences astray. There are persons who complain of not having been able to say one pater for more than four days."

On the 4th of July the debate between Eck and Luther commenced. Everything announced that it would be keener, more decisive, and more interesting than that which had just been concluded, and during which the audience had gradually thinned away. The two antagonists descended into the arena, resolved not to lay down their arms till victory should declare in favour of one of them. All were in eager expectation, for the subject to be debated was the primacy of the pope. Christianity had two great adversaries—hierarchy and rationalism. Rationalism, as applied to the doctrine of man's natural powers, had been attacked by the Reformation in the former branch of the Leipsic discussion. Hierarchy, viewed with reference to what is at once its apex and its base,—viz., the doctrine of the pope,—was now to be considered. On the one side appeared Eck, boasting of the debates in which he had been engaged, as a general boasts of his battles. On the other side stood Luther, to whom the contest seemed to promise only persecution and obloquy; but who came forward with a good conscience, a firm resolution to sacrifice everything for the cause of truth, and a confident expectation, founded on faith in God and the deliverance which He affords. New convictions had sunk deep into his mind,—as yet they were not arranged into a system; but in the heat of debate they flashed forth like lightning. Grave and intrepid, he manifested a decision which set all trammels at defiance. His features bore marks of the storms which had raged within his soul, and of the courage with which he was prepared to face new tempests. Two peasants' sons—representatives of the two systems which still divide Christendom—were on the eve of a contest, the issue of which would go far to decide the future destiny of the State and the Church.

At seven in the morning the two antagonists were in their desks, in the midst of a numerous and attentive assembly.

Luther rose, and, in the exercise of a necessary precaution, modestly said:—

“In the name of the Lord!—Amen. I declare, that the respect which I feel for the sovereign pontiff would have disposed me to avoid this discussion, had the excellent Dr. Eck left me any alternative.”

Eck.—“In thy name, dear Jesus! before I descend into the arena, I protest in your presence, mighty lords, that whatever I shall say is under correction of the first of all sees, and the master who occupies it.”

After a momentary pause, Eck continued:—“There is in the Church of God a primacy derived from Jesus Christ himself. The Church militant is an image of the Church triumphant. But the latter is a monarchical hierarchy, rising step by step up to the sole head, who is God; and, accordingly, Christ has established the same gradation upon earth. What kind of monster should the Church be if she were without a head!”

Luther, (turning towards the audience).—“The doctor is correct in saying that the universal Church must have a head. If there is any one here who maintains the contrary, let him stand up!—the remark does not at all apply to me.”

Eck.—“If the Church militant has never been without a monarch, I should like to know who that monarch is, if he is not the pontiff of Rome?”

Luther.—“The head of the Church militant is not a man, but Jesus Christ himself. This I believe on the testimony of God. Christ (says the Scripture) must reign until He has put ALL HIS ENEMIES under His feet. We cannot, therefore, listen to those who would confine Christ to the Church triumphant in heaven. His reign is a reign of faith. We cannot see our Head, and yet we have Him.”

Eck, not admitting that he was beaten, had recourse to other arguments, and resumed: “According to St. Cyprian, sacerdotal unity is derived from Rome.”

Luther.—“Granted in regard to the Western Church. But is not the Church of Rome herself a descendant of the Church of Jerusalem, which is properly the mother and nurse of all the churches?”

Eck.—“St. Jerome declares, that unless an extraordinary power, superior to all other powers, is given to the pope, churches will have as many schisms as pontiffs.”

Luther.—“Granted: that is to say, this power might, by human authority, be attributed to the Roman pontiff, provided all the faithful consent to it. And, in like manner, I, for my part, deny not that if all the faithful throughout the world were to concur in acknowledging the bishop, either of Rome, or of Paris, or of Magdebourg, as prime and sovereign pontiff, it would be necessary to acknowledge him as such in deference to this universal consent of the Church. The thing, however, never has been, and never will be seen. Even in our own day does not the Greek Church refuse her assent to Rome?”

At this period Luther was quite ready to acknowledge the pope as first magistrate of the Church, elected by her own free choice; but he denied that he was of Divine institution. At a later period, he denied that subjection was due to him in any respect; and this denial he owed to the discussion at Leipsic. Eck had come upon ground which he did not know so thoroughly as Luther. The latter, it is true, could not maintain his theses, that the papacy had not been in existence for more than four centuries. Eck quoted authorities of an earlier date; and these Luther was unable to obviate, criticism not having yet attacked the spurious decretals. But the nearer the discussion was brought to primitive times, the more Luther's strength increased. Eck appealed to the Fathers. Luther quoted the Fathers in reply; and all the hearers were struck with his superiority to his rival.

“That my exposition,” said he, “is that of St. Jerome, I prove by St. Jerome's own Epistle to Evagrius, in which he says: ‘Every bishop, whether at Rome, or Engubium, or Constantinople, or Rhegium, or Alexandria, or Tanis, has the same merit, and the same priesthood. The power of riches, and the humiliation of poverty, constitute the only precedence or inferiority among bishops.’”

From the writings of the Fathers, Luther passed to the decrees of councils, which regard the bishop of Rome as only a first among equals.

“We read,” says he, “in the decree of the Council of Africa: ‘The bishop of the first see must not be called either prince of the pontiffs, or sovereign pontiff, or any other similar name; but only bishop of the first see.’ Were the supremacy of the bishop of Rome of Divine institution, would not these words be heretical?”

Eck replied by one of those subtle distinctions which were so familiar to him.

“The bishop of Rome, if you will so have it, is not universal bishop, but bishop of the universal Church.”

Luther.—“I am quite willing to leave this reply unanswered: let our hearers judge for themselves.”

“Assuredly,” said he, afterwards, “the gloss is worthy of a theologian, and well fitted to satisfy a disputant thirsting for glory. My expensive sojourn in Leipsic has not been for nothing, since I have learned that the pope, though not indeed the universal bishop, is the bishop of the universal Church.”

Eck.—“Very well, I come to the essential point. The venerable doctor calls upon me to prove that the primacy of the Church of Rome is of Divine institution. I prove it by these words of Christ: Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build my Church. St. Augustine, in one of his epistles, has thus expounded the passage:

"Thou art Peter, and upon this rock—that is to say, on this Peter—I will build my Church." It is true, Augustine has elsewhere said, that by this rock must be understood Christ himself; but he never retracted his former exposition."

Luther.—"If the reverend doctor would attack me, he should first reconcile these contrary statements of Augustine. It is undeniable that St. Augustine has, again and again, said that the rock was Christ; and he may, perhaps, have once said that it was Peter himself. But even should St. Augustine and all the Fathers say that the apostle is the rock of which Christ speaks, I would combat their view on the authority of an apostle,—in other words, Divine authority; for it is written: No other foundation can any man lay than that is laid, namely, Jesus Christ. Peter himself calls Christ the chief and corner-stone, on which we are built up a spiritual house."

Eck.—"I am astonished at the humility and modesty with which the reverend doctor undertakes single-handed to combat so many distinguished Fathers, and to know better than sovereign pontiffs, councils, doctors, and universities. . . . It would, certainly, be astonishing that God should have concealed the truth from so many saints and martyrs . . . and not revealed it until the advent of the reverend father!"

Luther.—"The Fathers are not against me. The distinguished doctors, St. Augustine and St. Ambrose, speak as I do. Super isto articulo fidei, fundata est Ecclesia, says St. Ambrose, when explaining what must be understood by the rock on which the Church is built. Let my opponent, then, bridle his tongue. To express himself as he does, is to stir up strife, not to discuss like a true doctor."

Eck had not expected that his opponent would possess so much knowledge of the subject, and be able to disentangle himself from the labyrinth in which he tried to bewilder him. "The reverend doctor," said he, "has entered the lists after carefully studying his subject. Your highnesses will excuse me for not presenting them with such exact researches. I came to debate, and not to make a book." Eck was astonished, but not beaten. Having no more arguments to give, he had recourse to a mean and despicable artifice, which, if it did not vanquish his opponent, would at least subject him to great embarrassment. If the charge of being a Bohemian, a heretic, a Hussite, fastens upon Luther, he is vanquished—for the Bohemians were detested in the Church. The scene of discussion was not far from the frontiers of Bohemia. Saxony, which, immediately after the condemnation of John Huss by the Council of Constance, had been subjected to all the horrors of a long and ruinous war, was proud of the resistance which she had then given to the Hussites. The university of Leipsic had been founded to oppose their tenets; and the discussion was in presence of nobles, princes, and citizens, whose fathers had fallen in that celebrated struggle. To make out that Luther was at one with Huss, was almost like giving him the finishing blow; and this was the stratagem to which the doctor of Ingolstadt had recourse. "From primitive times downwards," says he, "it was acknowledged by all good Christians that the Church of Rome holds its primacy of Jesus Christ himself, and not of man. I must confess, however, that the Bohemians, while obstinately defending their errors, attacked this doctrine. The venerable father must pardon me if I am an enemy of the Bohemians, because they are the enemies of the Church, and if the present discussion has reminded me of these heretics; for, . . . according to my weak judgment, . . . the conclusions to which the doctor has come, are all in favour of their errors. It is even affirmed that the Hussites loudly boast of this."

Eck had calculated well. All his partizans received the insinuation with acclamation, and an expression of applause was general throughout the audience. "These slanders," said the reformer at a later period, "tickled their fancy much more agreeably than the discussion itself."

Luther.—"I love not a schism, and I never shall. Since the Bohemians, of their own authority, separate from our unity, they do wrong, even were Divine authority decisive in favour of their doctrine; for at the head of all Divine authority is charity and the unity of the Spirit."

It was at the morning sitting, on the 5th July, that Luther thus expressed himself. Shortly after, the meeting adjourned for dinner. Luther felt uneasy. Had he not gone too far in thus condemning the Christians of Bohemia? Have they not maintained the doctrine which Luther is maintaining at this hour? He sees all the difficulty of the step before him. Will he declare against the council which condemned John Huss, or will he abjure the grand idea of an universal Christian Church,—an idea deeply imprinted on his mind? Resolute Luther hesitated not. "I must do my duty, come what may." Accordingly, when the assembly again met at two o'clock, he rose and said firmly:—

"Certain of the tenets of John Huss and the Bohemians are perfectly orthodox. This much is certain. For instance, 'that there is only one universal Church' and again, 'that it is not necessary to salvation to believe the Roman Church superior to others.' Whether Wickliffe or Huss has said so I care not. . . . It is the truth."

This declaration of Luther produced an immense sensation in the audience. The abhorred names of Huss and Wickliffe, pronounced with eulogium by a monk in the heart of a Catholic assembly! . . . A general murmur was heard. Duke George himself felt as much alarmed as if he had actually seen the standard of civil war, which had so long desolated the states of his maternal ancestors, unfurled in Saxony. Unable to conceal his emotion, he struck his thigh, shook his head, and exclaimed, loud enough to be heard by the whole assembly, "The man is mad!" The whole audience was extremely excited. They rose to their feet, and every one kept talking to his neighbour. Those who had fallen asleep, awoke. Luther's opponents expressed their exultation, while his friends were greatly embarrassed. Several persons, who till then had listened to him with pleasure, began to doubt his orthodoxy. The impression produced upon the mind of the duke by this declaration was never effaced; and from this moment he looked upon the reformer with an unfavourable eye, and became his enemy.

Luther was not intimidated by this explosion of disapprobation. One of his leading arguments was, that the Greeks had never recognized the pope, and yet had never been declared heretics; that the Greek Church had subsisted, was subsisting, and would subsist, without the pope, and was a Church of Christ as much as the Church of Rome. Eck, on the contrary, boldly affirmed that the Christian Church and the Roman Church were one and the same; that the Greeks and Orientals, by abandoning the Church, had also abandoned Christian faith, and unquestionably were heretics.—“What!” exclaimed Luther, “are not Gregory of Nanzianzen, Basil the Great, Epiphanius, Chrysostom, and an immense number of other Greek bishops in bliss? and yet they did not believe that the Church of Rome was superior to other churches! . . . It is not in the power of the pontiff of Rome to make new articles of faith. The Christian believer has no other authority than the Holy Scriptures—they alone constitute Divine law. I pray the illustrious doctor to admit that the pontiffs of Rome were men, and have the goodness not to make gods of them.”

Eck had recourse to one of those witticisms which at small cost give a little air of triumph to the person employing them.

“The reverend father,” says he, “not being well versed in the culinary art, makes an odd mixture of Greek saints and heretics, so that the perfume of holiness in the one disguises the poison in the other.”

Luther, (hastily interrupting Eck.)—“The worthy doctor is impertinent. I do not hold that there is any communion between Christ and Belial.”

Luther had taken a large step in advance. In 1516 and 1517, he had only attacked the discourses of the venders of indulgences, and had respected the decrees of the popes. At a later period he had rejected these decrees, but had appealed from them to a council. Now he had discarded this last authority also, declaring that no council can establish a new article of faith, or claim to be infallible. Thus, all human authorities had successively fallen before him. The sand brought along by the rain and the floods had disappeared; and now, for building up the ruins of the Lord's house, there remained only the eternal rock of the Word of God. “Venerable father!” said Eck to him, “if you believe that a council, lawfully assembled, can err, you are to me only a heathen man and a publican.”

Such were the discussions between the two doctors. The audience were attentive, but occasionally began to flag, and hence were pleased with any incident which enlivened the scene and gave them a momentary relaxation. The gravest matters have their comic interludes; and so it was at Leipzig.

Duke George, according to the custom of the time, had a court fool, to whom some wags said: “Luther maintains that a court fool may marry. Eck maintains the contrary.” On this the fool took a great dislike to Eck, and, every time he came into the hall with the servants of Duke George, eyed the theologian with a menacing air. The Chancellor of Ingolstadt, not disdaining to descend to pleasantry, one day shut one eye, (the fool was blind of one,) and with the other began to squint at the poor creature, who, in a perfect rage, let fly a volley of abuse. “The whole assembly,” says Peiffer, “burst into laughter.” This amusing incident somewhat relieved their minds from the stretch on which they had been kept.

At the same time, both in the town and in the churches, scenes occurred which shewed how much the partizans of Rome were horrified at Luther's bold assertions. An outcry was raised against him, especially in the convents attached to the pope.

Luther had one day walked into the church of the Dominicans before high mass. The only persons present were some monks, saying low mass at the side altars. No sooner was it told in the cloister that the heretic Luther was in the church, than the monks came down in all haste, laid hold of the ostensorium, and carrying it into the tabernacle, shut it up, carefully watching it, lest the holy sacrament should be profaned by the heretical eye of the Augustine of Wittenberg. At the same time, those who were saying mass hastily gathered up their articles, quitted the altar, ran across the church, and took refuge in the sacristy, “just,” says a historian, “as if the devil had been at their heels.”

The discussion became the general subject of conversation. In the inn, at the university, and the court, every one gave his opinion. Duke George, whatever his irritation may have been, did not obstinately shut his ears against conviction. One day, when Eck and Luther were dining with him, he interrupted their conversation, saying: “Let the pope be pope, whether by Divine or human law; at all events, he is pope.” Luther was much pleased with the expression. “The prince,” says he, “never would have uttered it if my arguments had not made some impression on him.”

The discussion on the primacy of the pope had lasted during five days. On the 8th of July, the doctrine of purgatory was discussed, and occupied two days. Luther was still a believer in the existence of purgatory; but he denied that the doctrine, as held by the schoolmen and his opponent, was taught either in the Scriptures or by the Fathers. “Our Doctor Eck,” said he,—referring to the superficial knowledge of his opponent,—“has to-day run over the Holy Scriptures almost without touching them, just as an insect skins the water.”

On the 11th July, indulgences were discussed. “It was mere sport and burlesque,” says Luther. “Indulgences gave way at once, and Eck was almost entirely of my opinion.” Eck himself said: “Had I not disputed with Doctor Martin on the primacy of the pope, I could almost agree with him.”

The discussion afterwards turned on repentance, absolution by the priest, and satisfactions. Eck, as usual, quoted the schoolmen, the Dominicans, and the canons of the pope. Luther closed the discussion with these words:—

“The reverend doctor flees before the Holy Scriptures as the devil does before the cross. For my part, with all due deference to the Fathers, I prefer the authority of Scripture, and recommend it to our judges.”

This closed the debate between Eck and Luther; but Carlstadt and the doctor of Ingolstadt continued, for two days longer, to discuss the subject of human merit and good works. On the 16th July, the whole proceeding, after having lasted twenty days, was closed by a discourse from the rector of Leipsic. The moment the discourse was finished, thrilling music burst forth, and the whole concluded with the Te Deum.

But during this solemn chant, the feelings of the audience no longer were what they had been during the Veni Spiritus. The presentiments which several persons had expressed seemed to be actually realized. The blows struck by the champions of the two systems had made a large wound in the papacy.

Interest felt by the Laity—Luther's Opinion—Admissions and Bestings of Dr. Eck—Effects of the Discussion—Polander—Cellarius—The Young Prince of Anhalt—The Students of Leipsic—Cruiger—Calling of Melancthon—Emanicipation of Luther.

THESE theological discussions, to which the worldly-minded of the present day would not devote a few short moments, had been attended and listened to with eagerness during twenty days,—laymen, knights, and princes, taking a deep interest in them to the last. Duke Barnim and Duke George, seemed particularly attentive, whereas some of the theologians of Leipsic, friends of Dr. Eck, slept, as an eye-witness expresses it, "quite soundly." It was even necessary to awake them on the adjournments, that they might not lose their dinner.

Luther was the first to quit Leipsic, and next Carlstadt. Eck remained several days after they were gone.

No formal decision was given on the points discussed. Every one spoke as he thought. "There was at Leipsic," says Luther, "loss of time, and no investigation of truth. During the two years in which we have been examining the doctrines of our opponents, we have counted all their bones. Eck, on the contrary, has hardly skimmed the surface; but he cried more in one hour, than we did in two long years."

Eck, when writing privately to his friends, admitted his defeat to a certain extent, though he was at no loss for an explanation. "The Wittenbergers," wrote he to Hochstraten on the 24th July, "defeated me on several points—first, because they brought books with them—secondly, because they took down the debate in writing, and examined it at home at their leisure—and thirdly, because they were more numerous. Two doctors, (Carlstadt and Luther); Lange, vicar of the Augustines; two licentiates, Amsdorff, and a very arrogant nephew of Reuchlin, (Melancthon); three doctors of law, and several masters of arts, lent their assistance both in public and private; whereas I stood alone, having nothing but a good cause for my companion." Eck forgot Enser, and all the doctors of Leipsic.

Though these concessions escaped Eck in familiar correspondence, he acted otherwise in public. The doctor of Ingolstadt, and the theologians of Leipsic, made a great noise with what they called their victory.

They everywhere set false reports in circulation, while all the tongues of the party reiterated their expressions of self-complacency. "Eck goes about triumphing," wrote Luther. There were disputes, however, in the camp of Rome in regard to the laurels.—"Had we not come to the help of Eck," said the theologians of Leipsic, "the illustrious doctor would have been overthrown."—"The theologians of Leipsic," said Eck on his part, "are well enough, but I had hoped too much from them: I did the whole myself."—"You see," said Luther to Spalatin, "how they are chanting a new Iliad, and a new Æneid. They are kind enough to make me a Hector or a Turnus, while Eck is their Achilles or Æneas. Their only doubt is, whether the victory was gained by the arms of Eck, or by those of Leipsic. All I can say to throw light on the matter is, that Eck uniformly kept bawling, and the Leipsic divines as uniformly held their peace."

"Eck," says the elegant, clever, and sagacious Mosellanus, "has triumphed in the estimation of those who do not understand the subject, and who have grown old in poring over the schoolmen; but, in the estimation of all men of learning, intellect, and moderation, Luther and Carlstadt are the victors."

The Leipsic discussion, however, was not destined to vanish into smoke. Every work which is devoutly performed bears fruit. The words of Luther had penetrated the minds of his hearers with irresistible force. Several of those who had daily thronged the castle hall were subdued by the truth, whose leading conquests were made among her most decided opponents. Even Polander, the secretary, familiar friend and disciple of Eck, was gained to the Reformation, and began, in 1522, to preach the Gospel at Leipsic. John Camerarius, professor of Hebrew, one of the keenest opponents of the Reformation, impressed by the words of the mighty teacher, began to examine the Holy Scriptures more thoroughly; and, shortly after throwing up his situation, came to Wittenberg to study at the feet of Luther. He was afterwards pastor at Frankfort and Dresden.

Among those who had taken their place on the seats reserved for the court, and accompanied Duke George, was George of Anhalt, a young prince, twelve years of age, of a family which had distinguished itself in the wars against the Saracens. At this time he was studying at Leipsic with his tutor. Great ardour for science, and a strong attachment to truth, had already become the characteristics of the illustrious young prince. He was often heard to repeat the words of Solomon, Falsehood ill becomes a prince. The Leipsic discussion inspired this child with serious reflection, and with a decided leaning to Luther. Some time after a bishopric was offered to him. His brother, and all his family, with the view of raising him to high honour in the Church, urged him to accept it; but he resolutely declined. His pious mother, who was secretly favourable to Luther, having died, he became possessed of all the reformer's writings. He was constant and fervent in prayer to God, to incline his heart to the truth; and, often in the solitude of his chamber, exclaimed, with tears, Deal mercifully with thy servant, and teach me thy statutes. His prayers were heard. Carried forward by his convictions, he fearlessly joined the ranks of the friends of the Gospel. In vain did his guardians, and particularly Duke George, besiege him with entreaties and remonstrances. He remained inflexible; and the Duke, half convinced by his pupil's reasons, exclaimed: "I cannot answer him; still, however, I will keep by my Church. I am too old a dog to be trained." We will afterwards see in this amiable prince one of the finest characters of the Reformation, one who himself preached the Word of life to his subjects, and to whom the saying of Dion respecting the Emperor Marcus Antoninus has been applied: "He was through life consistent with himself; he was a good man—a man free from guile."

CHURCH OF ST. NICHOLAS, LEIPSIQ.

But Luther's words met with an enthusiastic reception, especially from the students. They felt the difference between the spirit and life of the doctor of Wittenberg, and the sophistical distinctions and vain speculations of the Chancellor of Ingolstadt. They saw Luther founding upon the Word of God, and they saw Dr. Eck founding only on human traditions. The effect was soon visible. The classes of the university of Leipzig almost emptied after the discussion. One circumstance partly contributed to this. The plague threatened to make its appearance; but there were many other universities—for example, Erfurt, or Ingolstadt—to which the students might have repaired. The force of truth drew them to Wittenberg, where the number of the students was doubled.

Among those who removed from the one university to the other, was a youth of sixteen, of a melancholy air—who spoke little; and often, amid the conversation and games of his fellow-students, seemed absorbed by his own thoughts. His parents at first thought him of weak intellect; but they soon found him so apt to learn, and so completely engrossed by his studies, that they conceived high hopes of him. His integrity, his candour, his modesty, and his piety, made him a general favourite; and Mosellanns singled him out as a model to all the university. He was called Gaspard Cruciger, and was originally from Leipsic. This new student of Wittenberg was afterwards the friend of Melancthon, and the assistant of Luthler in the translation of the Bible.

The Leipsic discussion produced results still more important, inasmuch as the theologian of the Reformation then received his call. Modest and silent, Melancthon had been present at the discussion, almost without taking any part in it. Till then, his attention had been engrossed by literature; but the discussion gave him a new impulse, and gained him over to theology. Henceforth his science did homage to the Word of God. He received the evangelical truth with the simplicity of a child. His audience heard him expound the doctrines of salvation with a grace and clearness by which all were charmed. He boldly advanced in this, which was to him a new career; "for," said he, "Christ will never leave His people." From this moment the two friends walked side by side, contending for liberty and truth,—the one with the energy of St. Paul, and the other with the meekness of St. John. Luther has admirably expressed the difference of their calling: "I was born," said he, "to enter the field of battle, and contend with factions and demons. Hence my writings breathe war and tempest. I must root up the trunks, remove the thorns and the brambles, and fill up the marshes and pools. I am the sturdy wood-cutter, who must clear the passage and level the ground; but master Philip advances calmly and softly; he digs and plants; sows and waters joyously, in accordance with the gifts which God has, with so liberal a hand, bestowed upon him."

If Melancthon, the quiet sower, was called to the work by the discussion of Leipsic, Luther, the hardy woodcutter, felt his arm strengthened, and his courage still more inflamed by it. The mightiest result of this discussion was produced in Luther himself. "Scholastic theology," said he, "sunk entirely in my estimation, under the triumphant presidency of Dr. Eck." In regard to the reformer, the veil which the School and the Church had hung up in front of the sanctuary was rent from top to bottom. Constrained to engage in new inquiries, he arrived at unexpected discoveries. With equal astonishment and indignation he saw the evil in all its magnitude. While poring over the annals of the Church, he discovered that the supremacy of Rome had no other origin than ambition on the one hand, and credulous ignorance on the other. The narrow point of view under which he had hitherto looked at the Church, was succeeded by one both clearer and wider. In the Christians of Greece and the East he recognized true members of the Catholic Church; and instead of a visible head, seated on the banks of the Tiber, he adored, as sole head of his people, that invisible and eternal Redeemer, who, according to His promise, is always and in all parts of the world, in the midst of those who believe in His name. The Latin Church Luther no longer regarded as the universal Church. The narrow barriers of Rome were thrown down; and he shouted for joy when he saw the glorious domain of Jesus Christ stretching far beyond them. Henceforth he felt that he could be a member of the Church of Christ without belonging to the Church of the pope. In particular, the writings of John Huss made a strong impression on him. To his great surprise he discovered in them the doctrine of St. Paul and St. Augustine,—the doctrine to which he had himself arrived after so many struggles. "I believe," said he, "and, without knowing it, taught all the doctrines of John Huss. So did Staupitz. In short, without suspecting it, we are all Hussites, as are also St. Paul and St. Augustine. I am confounded at it, and know not what to think. . . . Oh what dreadful judgments have not men merited from God! Evangelical truth, when unfolded, and published more than a century ago, was condemned, burned, and suppressed. . . . Woe! woe to the earth!"

Luther disengaged himself from the papacy, regarding it with decided aversion and holy indignation. All the witnesses who, in every age, had risen up against Rome, came successively before him, to testify against her and unveil some of her abuses or errors. "Oh, darkness!" exclaimed he.

He was not allowed to be silent as to these sad discoveries. The pride of his adversaries, their pretended triumph, and the efforts which they made to extinguish the light, fixed his decision. He advanced in the path in which God was leading him, without any uneasiness as to the result. Luther has fixed upon this as the moment of his emancipation from the papal yoke. "Learn by me," said he, "how difficult it is to disengage oneself of errors which the whole world confirms by its example, and which, from long habit, have become a second nature. For seven years I had been reading, and, with great zeal, publicly expounding the Holy Scriptures, so that I had them almost entirely by heart. I had also all the rudiments of knowledge and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ,—that is to say, I knew that we were not justified and saved by our works, but by faith in Christ; and I even maintained openly, that the pope is not head of the Christian Church by Divine authority. And yet . . . I could not see the inference,—viz., that certainly and necessarily the pope is of the devil. For whatever is not of God must, of necessity, be of the devil." Further on Luther adds: "I no longer vent my indignation against those who are still attached to the pope, since I myself, after reading the Holy Scriptures so carefully, and for so many years, still cling to the pope with so much obstinacy."

Such were the true results of the discussion of Leipsic—results far more important than the discussion itself, and resembling those first successes which discipline an army, and inflame its courage.

CHAPTER VII.

Eck attacks Melancthon—Melancthon's defence—Interpretation of Scripture—Luther's firmness—The Bohemian Brethren—Emser—Staupitz.

Eck abandoned himself to all the intoxication of what he would fain have passed off as a victory. He kept tearing at Luther, and heaped accusation upon accusation against him. He also wrote to Frederick. Like a skilful general, he wished to take advantage of the confusion which always succeeds a battle, in order to obtain important concessions from the prince. Preparatory to the steps which he meant to take against his opponent personally, he invoked the flames against his writings, even those of them which he had not read. Implying the elector to convene a provincial council, the coarse-minded doctor exclaimed: "Let us exterminate all this vermin before they multiply out of measure."

Luther was not the only person against whom he vented his rage. He had the imprudence to call Melancthon into the field. Melancthon, who was in terms of the greatest intimacy with the excellent (Ecolampadius, gave him an account of the discussion, and spoke of Eck in eulogistic terms. Nevertheless, the pride of the Chancellor of Ingolstadt was offended, and he immediately took up the pen against this "grammarian of Wittemberg, who, it is true," said he, "was not ignorant of Latin and Greek, but had dared to publish a letter in which he had insulted him, Dr. Eck."

Melancthon replied. It is his first theological writing, and displays the exquisite urbanity which characterized this excellent man. Laying down the fundamental principles of hermeneutics, he shews that the Holy Scriptures ought not to be explained according to the Fathers, but the Fathers according to the Holy Scriptures. "How often," says he, "did not Jerome commit mistakes! how often Augustine! how often Ambrose! how often do they differ in opinion! how often do they retract their own errors! . . . There is only one volume inspired by the Spirit of heaven, pure and true throughout."

"Luther," it is said, "does not follow some ambiguous expositions of the ancients; and why should he follow them? When he expounds the passage of St. Matthew, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, he agrees with Origen, who by himself alone is worth a host; with Augustine in his homily; and Ambrose in his sixth book on St. Luke; to say nothing of others. What, then, you will say, do the Fathers contradict each other? Is it surprising that they should? I believe in the Fathers, because I believe in the Holy Scriptures. The meaning of Scripture is one, and simple, like heavenly truth herself. We arrive at it by comparing different passages together; we deduce it from the thread and connection of the discourse. There is a philosophy enjoined us in regard to the Book of God; and it is, to employ it as the touchstone by which all the opinions and maxims of men must be tried."

It was a long time since these great truths had been so elegantly expounded. The Word of God was restored to its proper place, and the Fathers to theirs. The simple method by which we ascertain the meaning of Scripture was distinctly traced. The Word had precedence over all the difficulties and the expositions of the School. Melancthon furnished the answer to those who, like Dr. Eck, would envelope this subject in the mists of a remote antiquity. The feeble grammarian had risen up, and the broad and sturdy shoulders of the scholastic gladiator had bent under the first pressure of his arm.

The weaker Eck was, the more noise he made; as if his rhodomontades and accusations were to secure the victory which he had failed to obtain in debate. The monks and all the partizans of Rome re-echoing his clamour, Germany rang with invectives against Luther, who, however, remained passive. "The more I see my name covered with opprobrium," said he, in finishing the expositions which he published on the propositions of Leipsic, "the prouder I feel; the truth, in other words, Christ, must increase, but I must decrease. The voice of the Bridegroom and the bride delights me more than all this clamour dismays me. Men are not the authors of my sufferings, and I have no hatred against them. It is Satan, the prince of evil, who would terrify me. But He who is in us, is greater than he who is in the world. The judgment of our contemporaries is bad; that of posterity will be better."

If the Leipsic discussion multiplied Luther's enemies in Germany, it also increased the number of his friends abroad: "What Huss was formerly in Bohemia, you, O Martin, are now in Saxony," wrote the brothers of Bohemia to him; "wherefore pray, and be strong in the Lord."

About this time war was declared between Luther and Emser, now a professor of Leipsic. The latter addressed a letter to Dr. Zach, a zealous Roman Catholic of Prague, in which his professed object was to disabuse the Hussites of the idea that Luther was of their party. Luther could not doubt, that under the semblance of defending him, the learned Leipsicker's real purpose was to fasten on him a suspicion of adhering to the Bohemian heresy; and he resolved to tear aside the veil under which his old Dresden host was endeavouring to shroud his enmity. With this view he published a letter addressed to the "goat Emser,"—Emser's arms being a goat. Luther concludes with a sentiment which well delineates his own character: "To love all, but fear none."

While new friends and new enemies thus appeared, old friends seemed to draw off from Luther. Staupitz, who had been the means of bringing the reformer out of the obscurity of the cloister of Erfurt, began to shew him some degree of coolness. Luther was rising too high for Staupitz to follow him. "You abandon me," wrote Luther to him. "The whole day I have been exceedingly grieved on your account—like a child just weaned and weeping for its mother. Last night," continues the reformer, "I dreamed of you: you were keeping aloof from me; and I was sobbing and shedding tears; then you gave me your hand, and told me to dry up my tears, for you would return to me."

The pacificator, Miltitz, wished to make a new attempt at conciliation. But what hold can be had on men while still under the excitement of the contest? His endeavours led to no result. He brought the famous rose of gold; but the elector did not even take the trouble to receive it in person. Frederick knew the artifices of Rome, and was not to be imposed upon.

CHAPTER VIII.

Epistle to the Galatians—Christ for us—Blindness of Luther's Adversaries —First Ideas on the Supper—Is the Sacrament Sufficient without Faith?—Luther a Bohemian—Eck attacked—Eck sets out for Rome.

FAR from drawing back, Luther uniformly continued to advance, and at this time struck one of his severest blows at error, by publishing his first commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians. It is true, the second commentary was superior to the first; but still, the first contained a forcible exposition of the doctrine of justification by faith. Every expression of the new apostle was full of life; and God employed him to imbue the hearts of the people with divine knowledge. "Christ gave himself for our sins," said Luther to his contemporaries. "It was not silver or gold that He gave for us, nor was it a man or angels. He gave himself—himself, out of whom there is no true greatness; and this incomparable treasure He gave . . . for our sins. Where, now, are those who proudly boast of the powers of our will? where are the lessons of moral philosophy? where the power and strength of the law? Our sins being so great, that they cannot possibly be taken away without an immense ransom, shall we pretend to acquire righteousness by the energy of our will, by the power of the law, and the doctrines of men? What will all these cunning devices, all these illusions, avail us? Ah! we will only cover our iniquities with a spurious righteousness, and convert ourselves into hypocrites, whom no worldly power can save."

But while Luther thus proves that man's only salvation is in Christ, he also shews how this salvation changes his nature, and enables him to abound in good works. "The man," says he, "who has truly heard the Word of Christ, and keeps it, is immediately clothed with the spirit of charity. If thou lovest him who has made thee a present of twenty florins, or done thee some service, or in some way given thee a proof of his affection, how much more oughtest thou to love Him, who, on thy account, has given not silver or gold, but himself, received so many wounds, endured a bloody sweat, and even died for thee; in one word, who, in paying for all thy sins, has annihilated death, and secured for thee a Father full of love in heaven!

. . . If thou lovest Him not, thy heart has not listened to the things which He has done; thou hast not believed them; for faith works by love." "This epistle," said Luther, in speaking of the Epistle to the Galatians, "is my epistle: I am married to it."

His opponents caused him to proceed at a quicker pace than he would otherwise have done. At this time Eck instigated the Franciscans of Jüterbock to make a new attack upon him; and Luther, in his reply, not satisfied with repeating what he had already taught, attacked errors which he had recently discovered. "I would fain know," says he, "in what part of Scripture the power of canonizing saints has been given to the popes; and also what the necessity, or even the utility is, of canonizing them?" . . . "However," adds he, ironically, "let them canonize as they will."

These new attacks of Luther remained unanswered. The blindness of his enemies was as favourable to him as his own courage. They passionately defended secondary matters, and said not a word when they saw the foundations of Roman doctrine shaking under his hand. While they were eagerly defending some out-works, their intrepid adversary penetrated into the heart of the citadel, and there boldly planted the standard of truth; and hence their astonishment when they saw the fortress sapped, blazing, and falling to pieces amid the flames, at the moment when they thought it impregnable, and were hurling defiance at their assailants. Thus it is that great changes are accomplished.

The sacrament of the Lord's Supper began, at this time, to engage Luther's attention. He looked for it in the mass, but in vain. One day, shortly after his return from Leipsic, he mounted the pulpit. Let us mark his words, for they are the first which he pronounced on a subject which afterwards divided the Church and the Reformation into two parties. "In the holy sacrament of the altar," says he, "there are three things which it is necessary to know: the sign, which must be external, visible, and under a corporal form; the thing signified, which is internal, spiritual, and within the mind; and faith, which avails itself of both." Had the definitions not been pushed further, unity would not have been destroyed.

Luther continues: "It were good that the Church should, by a general council, decree that both kinds should be distributed to all the faithful; not, however, on the ground that one kind is insufficient, for faith by itself would be sufficient." These bold words pleased his audience, though some were astonished and offended, and exclaimed, "This is false and scandalous."

The preacher continues: "There is no union closer, deeper, or more inseparable than that between food and the body which is nourished by it. In the sacrament, Christ mixes himself to us so closely that He acts in us as if He were identified with us. Our sins attack Him. His righteousness defends us."

But Luther, not deeming it enough to expound the truth, attacks one of the most fundamental errors of Rome. The Roman Church pretends that the sacrament operates by itself, independently of the disposition of him who receives it. Nothing can be more convenient than such an opinion, since it to both the eagerness with which the sacrament is sought, and the profits of the clergy, are to be ascribed. Luther attacks this doctrine,¹ and maintains its opposite,²—viz., that faith and a right disposition of heart are indispensable.

This energetic protestation was destined to overthrow ancient superstitions; but, strange to say, it attracted no attention. Rome overlooked what might have made her scream in agony, and impetuously attacked the unimportant observation which Luther threw out at the commencement of his discourse, concerning communion in two kinds. The discourse having been published in December, a general cry of heresy was raised. "It is just the doctrine of Prague unadulterated," was the exclamation at the Court of Dresden, where the sermon arrived during the Christmas festivals. "It is written, moreover, in German, in order to make it accessible to the common people." The devotion of the prince was troubled, and, on the third day of the festival, he wrote to his cousin Frederick: "Since the publication of this discourse, the number of persons who receive the sacrament in two kinds has received an increase of 6000. Your Luther, from being a professor of Wittemberg, is on the eve of becoming a bishop of Prague, and an arch-heretic." . . . The cry was: "He was born in Bohemia, of Bohemian parents; he was brought up at Prague, and trained in the writings of Wickliffe."

Luther judged it right to contradict these rumours in a writing in which he gravely detailed his parentage. "I was born at Eisleben," said he, "and was baptized in St. Peter's Church. The nearest town to Bohemia in which I have ever been, is Dresden."

The letter of Duke George did not prejudice the elector against Luther; for a few days after, he invited him to a splendid entertainment which he gave to the Spanish ambassador; and at which Luther valiantly combated the minister of Charles. The elector's chaplain had, by his master's order, requested Luther to use moderation in defending his cause. "Excessive folly displeases man," replied Luther to Spalatin; "but excessive wisdom displeases God. The Gospel cannot be defended without tumult and scandal. The Word of God is sword, war, ruin, scandal, destruction, poison; and hence, as Amos expresses it, it presents itself like a bear in the path, and a lioness in the forest. I ask nothing, I demand nothing. There is one greater than I who asks and demands. Whether He stands or falls, I am neither gainer nor loser."

It was obvious that faith and courage were about to become more necessary to Luther than ever. Eck was forming projects of revenge. Instead of the laurels which he had counted on gaining, he had become a laughing-stock to all men of intellect throughout the nation. Cutting satires were published against him. Eck was cut to the very heart by "An Epistle of Ignorant Canons," written by Ecolampadius, and a complaint against him, probably by the excellent Pirckheimer of Nuremberg, exhibiting a combination of sarcasm and dignity of which the "Provincial Letters" of Pascal alone can give some idea.

CATHEDRAL, ST. PETER'S, PRAGUE.

Luther expressed his dissatisfaction with some of these writings. "It is better," said he, "to attack openly than to keep barking behind a hedge."

How greatly the Chancellor of Ingolstadt had miscalculated! His countrymen abandon him; and he prepares for a journey beyond the Alps, to invoke the aid of strangers. Wherever he goes he vents his threatenings against Luther, Melancthon, Carlstadt, and the elector himself. "From the haughtiness of his expressions," says the doctor of Wittenberg, "one would say he imagines himself to be God Almighty." Inflamed with rage and thirsting for vengeance, Eck, having, in February, 1520, published a work on the primacy of St. Peter,—a work devoid of sound criticism, in which he maintained that this apostle, the first of the popes, resided for twenty-five years at Rome,—set out for Italy in order to receive the reward of his pretended triumphs, and to forge at Rome, near the papal capitol, thunders mightier than the frail scholastic arms which had given way in his hands.

Luther was aware of all the dangers to which the journey of his antagonist would expose him; but he feared not. Spalatin, alarmed, urged him to make proposals of peace. "No," replied Luther, "so long as he clamours, I cannot decline the contest. I commit the whole affair to God, and leave my bark to the winds and waves. It is the battle of the Lord. How can it be imagined that Christ will advance His cause by peace? Did He not combat even unto death; and have not all the martyrs since done the same?"

Such was the position of the two combatants of Leipsic at the commencement of the year 1520. The one was stirring up the whole papacy to strike a blow at his rival, who, on his part, waited for war as calmly as if he had been waiting for peace. The year in which we are entering will see the bursting of the storm.

BOOK VI.

THE BULL OF ROME—1520.

CHAPTER I.

Character of Maximilian—The Competitors for the Empire—Charles—Francis I.—Inclination of the Germans—The Crown offered to Frederick—Charles is Elected.

A NEW character was going to appear upon the stage. God saw meet to place the monk of Wittenberg in presence of the most powerful monarch who had appeared in Christendom since Charlemagne. He chose a prince in the fervid vigour of youth, to whom everything presaged a reign of long duration,—a prince whose sceptre extended over a considerable portion both of the old and the new world; so that, according to a celebrated expression, the sun never set on his vast dominions,—and opposed him to this humble Reformation, which began with the anguish and sighs of a poor monk in the obscure cell of a convent at Erfurt. The history of this monarch and his reign seems to have been destined to give a great lesson to the world. It was to shew the nothingness of all "the power of man," when it presumes to contend with "the weakness of God." Had a prince, friendly to Luther, been called to the empire, the success of the Reformation would have been attributed to his protection. Had even an emperor opposed to the new doctrine, but feeble, occupied the throne, the triumphant success of the work would have been accounted for by the feebleness of the monarch. But it was the proud conqueror of Pavia who behaved to humble his pride before the power of the Divine Word, that all the world might see how he, who had found it easy to drag Francis I. a captive to Madrid, was compelled to lower his sword before the son of a poor miner.

The Emperor Maximilian was dead, and the electors had met at Frankfort to give him a successor. In the circumstances in which Europe was placed, this election was of vast importance, and was regarded with deep interest by all Christendom. Maximilian had not been a great prince; but his memory was dear to the people, who took a pleasure in remembering his presence of mind and good-humoured affability. Luther often talked of him to his friends, and one day related the following anecdote:—

A beggar had kept running after him asking charity, and addressing him as his brother; "for," said he, "we are both descended from the same father, Adam. I am poor," continued he; "but you are rich, and it is your duty to assist me." At these words the emperor turned round and said to him: "Hold, there's a penny; go to your other brothers, and if each gives you as much, you will soon be richer than I am."

The person about to be called to the empire was not a good-natured Maximilian. Times were to undergo a change; ambitious potentates were competing for the imperial throne of the West; the reins of the empire were to be seized by an energetic hand; profound peace was to be succeeded by long and bloody wars.

At the assembly of Frankfort, three kings aspired to the crown of the Caesars. A youthful prince, grandson of the last emperor, born at the opening of the century, and consequently nineteen years of age, first presented himself. He was named Charles, and was born at Ghent. His paternal grandmother, Mary, daughter of Charles the Bold, had left him Flanders and the rich States of Burgundy. His mother, Joan, daughter of Ferdinand of Arragon and Isabella of Castile, and wife of Philip, son of the Emperor Maximilian, had transmitted to him the united kingdoms of Spain, Naples, and Sicily, to which Christopher Columbus had added a new world, while the recent death of his grandfather put him in possession of the hereditary States of Austria. This young prince, who was endowed with great talents, to a turn for military exercises (in which the Dukes of Burgundy had long been distinguished)—to the fineness and penetration of the Italians—to the reverence for existing institutions which still characterizes the house of Austria, and promised the papacy a firm defender,—joined a thorough knowledge of public affairs, acquired under the direction of Châvres, having, from fifteen years of age, taken part in all the deliberations of his cabinet. These diversified qualities were, in a manner, shrouded under Spanish reserve and taciturnity. In personal appearance he was tall in stature, and had somewhat of a melancholy air. "He is pious and tranquil," said Luther, "and I believe does not speak as much in a year as I do in a day." Had the character of Charles been formed under the influence of freedom and Christianity, he would, perhaps, have been one of the most admirable princes on record; but politics engrossed his life, and stifled his great and good qualities.

CHARLES V.

(From the original by Holbein.)

Not contented with all the sceptres which he grasped in his hand, young Charles aspired to the imperial dignity. "It is like a sunbeam, which throws lustre on the house which it illumines," said several; "but put forth the hand to lay hold of it and you will find nothing." Charles, on the contrary, saw in it the pinnacle of all earthly grandeur, and a means of acquiring a magic influence over the spirit of the nations.

Francis I. was the second of the competitors. The young paladins of the court of this chivalric king were incessantly representing to him that he was entitled, like Charlemagne, to be the emperor of all the West; and reviving the exploits of the ancient knights, to attack the crescent which was menacing the empire, discomfit the infidels, and recover the holy sepulchre.

"It is necessary," said the ambassadors of Francis to the electors,— "it is necessary to prove to the dukes of Austria that the imperial crown is not hereditary. Besides, in existing circumstances, Germany has need, not of a young man of nineteen, but of a prince who, to an experienced judgment, joins talents which have already been recognized. Francis will unite the arms of France and Lombardy to those of Germany; and make war on the Mussulmans. Sovereign of the duchy of Milan, he is already a member of the imperial body." These arguments the French ambassadors supported by four hundred thousand crowns, which they distributed in purchasing votes and in festivities; by which they endeavoured to gain over their guests.

The third competitor was Henry VIII., who, jealous of the influence which the choice of the electors might give to Francis or Charles, also entered the lists; but soon left his powerful rivals sole disputants for the crown.

The electors were not disposed to favour either. Their subjects thought they would have in Francis a foreign master—and a master who might deprive the electors themselves of their independence, as he had lately deprived the nobles of his own dominions. As to Charles, it was an ancient rule with the electors not to choose a prince who was already playing an important part in the empire. The pope shared in these fears. He wished neither the King of Naples, who was his neighbour, nor the King of France, whose enterprising spirit had filled him with alarm. "Choose rather some one from amongst yourselves," was his message to the electors. The Elector of Trèves proposed Frederick of Saxony; and the imperial crown was laid at the feet of Luther's friend.

This choice would have obtained the approbation of all Germany. Frederick's wisdom and affection for his people were well known. During the revolt of Erfurt, he had been urged to take the town by assault, and refused, in order to spare blood. "But it will not cost five men."—"A single man would be too many," replied the prince. The triumph of the Reformation seemed on the eve of being secured by the election of its protector. Ought not Frederick to have regarded the offer of the electors as a call from God himself? Who could have presided better over the destinies of the empire than a prince of so much wisdom? Who could have been stronger to oppose the Turks than an emperor strong in faith? The refusal of the Elector of Saxony, so much lauded by historians, was perhaps a fault. For the contests which afterwards tore Germany to pieces, he is perhaps partly to blame. But it is difficult to say whether Frederick deserves censure for his want of faith, or honour for his humility. He thought that even the safety of the empire made it his duty to refuse the crown. "To save Germany," said this modest and disinterested prince, "an emperor more powerful than I is requisite."

The legate of Rome, seeing that the choice would fall upon Charles, intimated that the pope withdrew his objections; and, on the 28th of June, the grandson of Maximilian was elected. "God," said Frederick afterwards, "gave him to us in mercy and in anger." The Spanish envoys sent a present of thirty thousand gold florins to the Elector of Saxony, as a mark of their master's gratitude; but the prince refused it, and charged his ministers not to accept of any present. At the same time he secured the German liberties by an engagement, to which the envoys of Charles took an oath in his name. The circumstances in which the latter prince encircled his head with the imperial crown, seemed still better fitted than the oath to secure the Germanic liberties and the success of the Reformation. The young prince was jealous of the laurels which his rival, Francis I., had gained at Marignan. The struggle was to be continued in Italy; and, in the meantime, the Reformation would doubtless be made secure. Charles left Spain in May, 1520, and was crowned on the 22nd of October, at Aix-la-Chapelle.

LUTHER had foreseen that the cause of the Reformation would soon be brought before the new emperor; and, when Charles was still at Madrid, addressed a letter to him, in which he said: "If the cause which I defend is worthy of being presented before the heavenly Majesty, it cannot be unworthy of engaging the attention of a prince of this world. O Charles! prince of the kings of the earth, I cast myself as a suppliant at the feet of your most serene majesty, and beseech you to deign to take under the shadow of your wings, not me, but the very cause of eternal truth; for the defence of which God has entrusted you with the sword."

The young King of Spain threw aside this odd letter from a German monk, and returned no answer.

While Luther was turning in vain toward Madrid, the storm seemed gathering around him. Fanaticism was rekindled in Germany. Hochstraten, indefatigable in his efforts at persecution, had extracted certain theses from Luther's writings, and obtained their condemnation by the universities of Cologne and Louvain. That of Erfurt, which had always had a grudge at Luther, for having given Wittenberg the preference, was on the eve of following their example. But the doctor, having been informed of it, wrote Lange, in terms so energetic that the theologians of Erfurt took fright, and said nothing. Still, however, there was enough to inflame the minds of men in the condemnation pronounced by Cologne and Louvain. More than this, the priests of Misnia, who had espoused Emser's quarrel, said openly (such is Melancthon's statement) that there would be no sin in killing Luther. "The time is come," said Luther, "when men think they will do Jesus Christ service by putting us to death." The murderous language of the priests did not fail of its effect.

"One day," says a biographer, "when Luther was in front of the Augustine convent, a stranger, with a pistol hid under his arm, accosted him, and said, 'Why do you walk about thus quite alone?'"—"I am in the hands of God," replied Luther; "He is my strength and my shield." "Thereupon," adds the biographer, "the stranger grew pale, and fled trembling." About the same time Serra-Longa, the orator of the conference of Augsburg, wrote to the elector: "Let not Luther find any asylum in the states of your highness; but, repulsed by ail, let him be stoned to death in the face of heaven. This would please me more than a gift of ten thousand crowns."

But the sound of the gathering storm was heard, especially in the direction of Rome. Valentine Teutleben, a noble of Thuringia, vicar of the Archbishop of Mentz, and a zealous partizan of the papacy, was the representative of the Elector of Saxony at Rome. Teutleben, ashamed of the protection which his master gave to the heretical monk, could not bear to see his mission paralyzed by this imprudent conduct; and imagined that, by alarming the elector, he would induce him to abandon the rebel theologian. Writing to his master, he said: "I am not listened to, because of the protection which you give to Luther." But the Romans were mistaken if they thought they could frighten sage Frederick. He knew that the will of God and the movements of the people were more irresistible than the decrees of the papal chancery. He ordered his envoy to hint to the pope that, far from defending Luther, he had always left him to defend himself,—that he had, moreover, told him to quit Saxony and the university,—that the doctor had declared his readiness to obey, and would not now be in the electoral states had not the legate, Charles de Miltitz, begged the prince to keep him near himself, from a fear that in other countries he would act with still less restraint than in Saxony. Frederick did still more; he tried to enlighten Rome. "Germany," continues he, in his letter, "now possesses a great number of learned men, distinguished for scholarship and science; the laity themselves begin to cultivate their understanding, and to love the Holy Scriptures. Hence, there is great reason to fear that, if the equitable proposals of Doctor Luther are not accepted, peace will never be re-established. The doctrine of Luther has struck its roots deep in many hearts. If, instead of refuting it by passages from the Bible, an attempt is made to crush him by the thunders of ecclesiastical power, great scandal will be given, and pernicious and dreadful outbreaks will ensue."

The elector, having full confidence in Luther, caused Teutleben's letter to be communicated to him, and also another letter from Cardinal St. George. The reformer was moved on reading them. He at once saw all the dangers by which he was surrounded, and for an instant his heart sank. But it was in such moments as these that his faith displayed its full power. Often, when feeble and ready to fall into despondency, he rallied again, and seemed greater amid the raging of the storm. He would fain have been delivered from all these trials; but, aware of the price that must have been paid for repose, he spurned it with indignation. "Be silent!" said he; "I am disposed to be so, if I am allowed—that is to say, if others are silent. If any one envies my situation, he is welcome to it. If any one is desirous to destroy my writings, let him burn them. I am ready to remain quiet, provided Gospel truth is not compelled to be quiet also. I ask not a cardinal's hat; I ask neither gold, nor ought that Rome esteems. There is nothing which I will not concede, provided Christians are not excluded from the way of salvation. All their threatenings do not terrify—all their promises cannot seduce me."

Animated by these sentiments, Luther soon resumed his warlike temperament, preferring the Christian combat to the calmness of solitude. One night was sufficient to revive his desire of overthrowing Rome. "My part is taken," wrote he next day. "I despise the fury of Rome, and I despise her favour. No more reconciliation, nor more communication with her for ever. Let her condemn and burn my writings! I, in my turn, will condemn and publicly burn the pontifical law, that nest of all heresies. The moderation which I have shewn up to this hour has been useless, and I have done with it!"

His friends were far from feeling equally tranquil. Great alarm prevailed at Wittenberg. "We are waiting in extreme anxiety," said Melancthon. "I would sooner die than be separated from Luther. Unless God come to our assistance, we perish." Writing a month later, in his anxiety, he says: "Our Luther still lives; and God grant he long may; for the Roman sycophants are using every means to destroy him. Pray for the life of him who is sole vindicator of sound theology."

These prayers were not in vain. The warnings which the elector had given Rome, through his envoy, were not without foundation. The word of Luther had been everywhere heard, in cottages and convents, at the firesides of the citizens, in the castles of nobles, in academies, and in the palaces of kings. He had said to Duke John of Saxony: "Let my life only have contributed to the salvation of a single individual, and I will willingly consent that all my books perish."

Not a single individual, but a great multitude, had found light in the writings of the humble doctor; and hence, in all quarters, there were men ready to protect him. The sword which was to attack him was on the anvil of the Vatican; but there were heroes in Germany who would interpose their bodies as his buckler. At the moment when the bishops were waxing wrath, when princes were silent, when the people were awaiting the result, and when the thunder was already grumbling on the seven hills, God raised up the German nobility, and placed them as a rampart around His servant.

At this time, Sylvester of Schaumburg, one of the most powerful nobles of Franconia, sent his son to Wittenberg with a letter for the reformer, in which he said: "Your life is exposed to danger. If the support of electors, princes, or magistrates fails you, I beg of you to beware of going into Bohemia, where, of old, very learned men had much to suffer; come rather to me; God willing, I shall soon have collected more than a hundred gentlemen, and with their help will be able to keep you free from harm."

Francis of Seckingen, the hero of his age, whose intrepid courage we have already seen, loved the reformer, because he found that he was worthy of love; and also because he was hated by the monks. "My person, my property, and services,—all that I possess," wrote he to him, "is at your disposal. Your wish is to maintain Christian truth, and in that I am ready to assist you." Harmuth of Cronberg spoke in similar terms. Ulric von Hutten, the poet and valiant knight of the sixteenth century, ceased not to speak in commendation of Luther. But how great the contrast between these two men! Hutten wrote to the reformer: "We must have swords, bows, javelins, and bullets, to destroy the fury of the devil." Luther, on receiving these letters, exclaimed: "I have no wish that men should have recourse to arms and carnage in order to defend the Gospel. It was by the Word the world was overcome—by the Word the Church has been saved—and by the Word will she be re-established." "I despise not his offers," said he, on receiving the above letter from Schaumburg; "but still I wish to lean on none but Christ." So spake not the pontiffs of Rome when they waded in the blood of the Vaudois and Albigenes. Hutten was sensible of the difference between his cause and Luther's, and accordingly wrote with noble frankness: "I am occupied with the things of man; but you, rising to a far greater height, give yourself wholly to those of God." After thus writing, he set out to try, if possible, to gain over Ferdinand and Charles V. to the truth.

Thus, on the one hand, Luther's enemies assail him; and on the other, his friends rise up to defend him. "My barque," says he, "floats here and there at the pleasure of the winds; . . . hope and fear reign by turns; but what matters it?" Still his mind was not uninfluenced by the marks of sympathy which he received. "The Lord reigns," said he; "and so visibly as to be almost palpable." Luther saw that he was no longer alone; his words had proved faithful, and the thought inspired him with new courage. Now that he has other defenders prepared to brave the fury of Rome, he will no longer be kept back by the fear of compromising the elector. He becomes more free, and, if possible, more decided. This is an important period in the development of Luther's mind. Writing at this time to the elector's chaplain, he says: "Rome must be made aware, that though she should succeed, by her menaces, in exiling me from Wittenberg, she will only damage her cause. Those who are ready to defend me against the thunders of the papacy, are to be found not in Bohemia, but in the heart of Germany. If I have not yet done to my enemies all that I am preparing for them, they must ascribe it neither to my moderation nor to their tyranny; but to my fear of compromising the name of the elector, and the prosperity of the university of Wittenberg. Now that I have no longer any such fears,

I will rush with new impetuosity on Rome and her courtiers."

Still Luther's hope was not placed on the great. He had often been urged to dedicate a book to Duke John, the elector's brother, but had never done it. "I fear," he had said, "that the suggestion comes from himself. The Holy Scriptures must be subservient only to the full of cares, and is detained in thralldom; he anxiously asks how many works he ought to do; he runs up and down interrogating this man and that man, and, nowhere finding any peace, does everything with dissatisfaction and fear.

"Hence, I have always extolled faith. But it is otherwise in the world: there the essential point is to have many works—works great and high, and of all dimensions; while it is a matter of indifference whether or not faith animates them. Thus, men build their peace, not on the good pleasure of God, but on their own merits,—that is to say, on the sand. . . . (Matt. vii. 27.)

"To preach faith is, it is said, to prevent good works; but though a single man should have in himself the powers of all men, or even of all creatures, the mere obligation of living by faith would be a task too great for him ever to accomplish. If I say to a sick person, Be in health and you will have the use of your members—will it be said that I forbid him to use his members? Must not health precede labour? The same holds true in the preaching of faith; it must be before works, in order that works themselves may exist.

"Where, then, you will ask, is this faith found, and how is it received? This, indeed, is the most important of all questions. Faith comes solely from Jesus Christ, who is promised, and given gratuitously.

"O man! represent Christ to thyself, and consider how in Him God manifests His mercy to thee without being anticipated by any merit on thy part. In this image of His grace receive the faith and assurance that all thy sins are forgiven thee. Works cannot produce it. It flows from the blood, the wounds, and the death of Christ, whence it wells up in the heart. Christ is the rock out of which come milk and honey. (Deut. xxxii.)"

Not being able to give an account of all Luther's works, we have quoted some short fragments of this discourse on Good Works, on account of the opinion which the reformer himself had of it. "It is in my glory of God's name." Luther afterwards laid aside his suspicions, and dedicated his discourse on Good Works to Duke John,—a discourse in which he gives a forcible exposition of the doctrine of justification by faith—a mighty doctrine, whose power he rates far higher than the sword of Hütten, the army of Seckingen, or the protection of dukes and electors.

"The first, the noblest, the sublimest of all works," says he, "is faith in Jesus Christ. From this work all other works should proceed; they are all the vassals of faith, and from it alone derive their efficacy.

"If a man's own heart assures him that what he is doing is agreeable to God, the work is good should it be merely the lifting up of a straw; but in the absence of this assurance the work is not good, though it should be the raising of the dead. A pagan, a Jew, a Turk, a sinner, can do all other works; but to trust firmly in the Lord, and feel assured of pleasing Him, are works of which none are capable but the Christian strengthened by grace.

"A Christian, who has faith in God, acts, at all times, with freedom and gladness, whereas the man who is not at one with God is judgment," said he, "the best work that I have published." He immediately subjoins this profound observation: "But I know that when anything I write pleases myself, the infection of the bad leaven prevents it from pleasing others." Melanethon, in sending a copy of this discourse to a friend, thus expressed himself: "Of all Greek and Latin authors none has come nearer the spirit of St. Paul than Luther."

CHAPTER III.

The Papacy Attacked—Appeal to the Nobility—The Three Walls—All Christians are Priests—The Magistrate's duty to Correct the Clergy—Abuses of Rome—Ruin of Italy—Dangers of Germany—The Pope—The Legates—The Monks—The Marriage of Priests—Celibacy—Festivals—The Bohemians—Charity—The Universities—The Empire—The Emperor must retake Rome—A Book not Published—Luther's Modesty—Success of the Address.

BUT the substitution of a system of meritorious works for the idea of grace and amnesty, was not the only evil existing in the Church. A domineering power had risen up among the humble pastors of Christ's flock. Luther must attack this usurped authority. A vague and distant rumour of Eek's intrigues and success at Rome awakened a warlike spirit in the reformer, who, amid all his turmoil, had calmly studied the origin, progress, and usurpations of the papacy. His discoveries having filled him with surprise, he no longer hesitated to communicate them, and strike the blow which was destined, like the rod of Moses of old, to awaken a whole nation out of a lethargy, the result of long bondage. Even before Rome had time to publish her formidable bull, he published his declaration of war. "The time of silence," exclaims he, "is past; the time for speaking has arrived. The mysteries of Antichrist must at length be unveiled." On the 24th June, 1520, he published his famous "Appeal to his Imperial Majesty and the Christian Nobility of Germany, on the Reformation of Christianity." This work was the signal of the attack which was at once to complete the rupture and decide the victory.

"It is not from presumption," says he, at the outset of this treatise, "that I, who am only one of the people, undertake to address your lordships. The misery and oppression endured at this moment by all the States of Christendom, and more especially by Germany, wring from me a cry of distress. I must call for aid; I must see whether God will not give His Spirit to some one of our countrymen, and stretch out a hand to our unhappy nation. God has given us a young and generous prince, (the Emperor Charles V.) and thus filled our hearts with high hopes. But we, too, must, on our own part, do all we can.

"Now, the first thing necessary is, not to confide in our own great strength, or our own high wisdom. When any work otherwise good is begun in self-confidence, God casts it down, and destroys it. Frederick I., Frederick II., and many other emperors besides, before whom the world trembled, have been trampled upon by the popes, because they trusted more to their own strength than to God. They could not but fall. In this war we have to combat the powers of hell; and our mode of conducting it must be to expect nothing from the strength of human weapons—to trust humbly in the Lord, and look still more to the distress of Christendom than to the crimes of the wicked. It may be that, by a different procedure, the work would begin under more favourable appearances; but suddenly, in the heat of the contest, confusion would arise, bad men would cause fearful disaster, and the world would be deluged with blood. The greater the power the greater the danger, when things are not done in the fear of the Lord."

After this exordium, Luther continues:—

"The Romans, to guard against every species of reformation, have surrounded themselves with three walls. When attacked by the temporal power, they denied its jurisdiction over them, and maintained the superiority of the spiritual power. When tested by Scripture, they replied, that none could interpret it but the pope. When threatened with a council, they again replied, that none but the pope could convene it.

"They have thus carried off from us the three rods destined to chastise them, and abandoned themselves to all sorts of wickedness. But now may God be our help, and give us one of the trumpets which threw down the walls of Jericho. Let us blow down the walls of paper and straw which the Romans have built around them; and lift up the rods which punished the wicked, by bringing the wiles of the devil to the light of day."

Luther next commences the attack, and shakes to the foundation that papal monarchy which had for ages united the nations of the West into one body under the sceptre of the Roman bishop. There is no sacerdotal caste in Christianity. This truth, of which the Church was so early robbed, he vigorously expounds in the following terms:—

"It has been said that the pope, the bishops, the priests, and all those who people convents, form the spiritual or ecclesiastical estate; and that princes, nobles, citizens, and peasants, form the secular or lay estate. This is a specious tale. But let no man be alarmed. All Christians belong to the spiritual estate; and the only difference between them is in the functions which they fulfil. We have all but one baptism, but one faith; and these constitute the spiritual man. Unction, tonsure, ordination, consecration, given by the pope, or by a bishop, may make a hypocrite, but can never make a spiritual man. We are all consecrated priests by baptism, as St. Peter says: 'You are a royal priesthood;' although all do not actually perform the offices of kings and priests, because no one can assume what is common to all without the common consent. But if this consecration of God did not belong to us, the unction of the pope could not make a single priest. If ten brothers, the sons of one king, and possessing equal claims to his inheritance, should choose one of their number to administer for them, they would all be kings, and yet only one of them would be the administrator of their common power. So it is in the Church. Were several pious laymen banished to a desert, and were they, from not having among them a priest consecrated by a bishop, to agree in selecting one of their number, whether married or not, he would be as truly a priest, as if all the bishops of the world had consecrated him. In this way were Augustine, Ambrose, and Cyprian elected.

"Hence it follows, that laymen and priests, princes and bishops, or, as we have said, ecclesiastics and laics, have nothing to distinguish them but their functions. They have all the same condition, but they have not all the same work to perform.

"This being so, why should not the magistrate correct the clergy? The secular power was appointed by God for the punishment of the wicked and the protection of the good, and must be left free to act throughout Christendom without respect of persons, be they pope, bishops, priests, monks, or nuns. St. Paul says to all Christians, Let every soul (and, consequently, the pope also) be subject to the higher powers; for they bear not the sword in vain. (Rom. xiii. 1, 4.)"

Luther, after throwing down the other two walls in the same way, takes a review of all the abuses of Rome. With an eloquence of a truly popular description he exposes evils which had for ages been notorious. Never had a nobler remonstrance been heard. The assembly which Luther addresses is the Church; the power whose abuses he attacks is that papacy which had for ages been the oppressor of all nations; and the Reformation for which he calls aloud, is destined to exercise its powerful influence on Christendom—all over the world, and so long as man shall exist upon it.

He begins with the pope. "It is monstrous," says he, "to see him who calls himself the vicar of Jesus Christ displaying a magnificence unequalled by that of any emperor. Is this the way in which he proves his resemblance to lowly Jesus, or humble Peter? He is, it is said, the lord of the world. But Christ, whose vicar he boasts to be, has said: My kingdom is not of this world. Can the power of a viceroy exceed that of his prince?"

Luther proceeds to depict the consequences of the papal domination. "Do you know of what use the cardinals are? I will tell you. Italy and Germany have many convents, foundations, and benefices, richly endowed. How could their revenues be brought to Rome? . . . Cardinals were created; then on them cloisters and prelaties were bestowed; and at this hour . . . Italy is almost a desert—the convents are destroyed—the bishoprics devoured—the towns in decay—the inhabitants corrupted—worship dying out, and preaching abolished. . . . Why? Because all the revenues of the churches go to Rome. Never would the Turk himself have so ruined Italy."

Luther next turns to his countrymen:

"And now that they have thus sucked the blood of their own country, they come into Germany. They begin gently; but let us be on our guard. Germany will soon become like Italy. We have already some cardinals. Their thought is—before the rustic Germans comprehend our design they will have neither bishopric, nor convent, nor benefice, nor penny, nor farthing. Antichrist must possess the treasures of the earth. Thirty or forty cardinals will be elected in a single day; to one will be given Bamberg, to another the duchy of Wurzburg, and rich benefices will be annexed, until the churches and cities are laid desolate. And then the pope will say: 'I am the vicar of Christ, and the pastor of His flocks. Let the Germans be resigned,'"

Luther's indignation rises:

"How do we Germans submit to such robbery and embezzlement on the part of the pope? If France has successfully resisted, why do we allow ourselves to be thus sported with and insulted? Ah! if they deprived us of nothing but our goods. But they ravage churches, plunder the sheep of Christ, abolish the worship, and suppress the Word of God."

Luther then exposes the devices of Rome to obtain money and secure the revenues of Germany. Annats, palliums, commendams, administrations, expected favours, incorporations, reservations, &c., all pass in review. Then he says: "Let us endeavour to put a stop to this desolation and misery. If we would march against the Turks, let us begin with the worst species of them. If we hang pickpockets, and behead robbers, let us not allow Roman avarice to escape—avarice, which is the greatest of all thieves and robbers; and that, too, in the name of St. Peter and Jesus Christ. Who can endure it? Who can be silent? Is not all that the pope possesses stolen? He neither purchased it nor inherited it from St. Peter, nor acquired it by the sweat of his own brow. Where, then, did he get it?"

Luther proposes remedies for all these evils, and energetically arouses the German nobility to put an end to Roman depredation. He next comes to the reform of the pope himself. "Is it not ridiculous," says he, "that the pope should pretend to be the lawful heir of the empire? Who gave it to him? Was it Jesus Christ, when He said: The kings of the earth exercise lordship over them; but it shall not be so with you? (Luke xxii. 25, 26.) How can he govern an empire, and at the same time preach, pray, study, and take care of the poor? Jesus Christ forbade His disciples to carry with them gold or clothes, because the office of the ministry cannot be performed without freedom from every other care; yet the pope would govern the empire, and at the same time remain pope."

Luther continues to strip the sovereign pontiff of his spoils. "Let the pope renounce every species of title to the kingdom of Naples and Sicily. He has no more right to it than I have. His possession of Bologna, Imola, Ravenna, Romagna, Marche d'Ancona, &c., is unjust, and contrary to the commands of Jesus Christ. No man, says St. Paul, who goeth a warfare entangleth himself with the affairs of this life. (2 Tim. ii. 2.) And the pope, who pretends to take the lead in the war of the Gospel, entangles himself more with the affairs of this life than any emperor or king. He must be disencumbered of all this toil. The emperor should put a Bible and a prayer-book into the hands of the pope, that the pope may leave kings to govern, and devote himself to preaching and prayer."

Luther is as averse to the pope's ecclesiastical power in Germany as to his temporal power in Italy. "The first thing necessary is to banish from all the countries of Germany the legates of the pope and the pretended blessings which they sell us at the weight of gold, and which are sheer imposture. They take our money; and why? for legalizing ill-gotten gain, for loosing oaths, and teaching us to break faith, to sin, and go direct to hell. . . . Hearst thou, O pope!—not pope most holy, but pope most sinful. . . . May God, from His place in heaven, cast down thy throne into the infernal abyss!”

The Christian tribune pursues his course. After citing the pope to his bar, he cites all the abuses in the train of the papacy, and endeavours to sweep away from the Church all the rubbish by which it is encumbered. He begins with the monks:

“And now I come to a lazy band, which promises much, but performs little. Be not angry, dear sirs, my intention is good; what I have to say is a truth at once sweet and bitter,—viz., that it is no longer necessary to build cloisters for mendicant monks. Good God! we have only too many of them; and would they were all suppressed. . . . To wander vagabond over the country, never has done, and never will do good.”

The marriage of ecclesiastics comes next in course. It is the first occasion on which Luther speaks of it:

“Into what a state have the clergy fallen, and how many priests are burdened with women, and children, and remorse, while no one comes to their assistance! Let the pope and the bishops run their course, and let those who will go to perdition; all very well! but I am resolved to unburden my conscience, and open my mouth freely, however pope, bishops, and others, may be offended! . . . I say, then, that according to the institution of Jesus Christ and the apostles, every town ought to have a pastor or bishop, and that this pastor may have a wife, as St. Paul writes to Timothy: Let the bishop be the husband of one wife, (1 Tim. iii. 2,) and as is still practised in the Greek Church. But the devil has persuaded the pope, as St. Paul tells Timothy, (1 Tim. iv. 1-3,) to forbid the clergy to marry. And hence evils so numerous that it is impossible to give them in detail. What is to be done? How are we to save the many pastors who are blameworthy only in this, that they live with a female, to whom they wish with all their heart to be lawfully united? Ah! let them save their conscience!—let them take this woman in lawful wedlock, and live decently with her, not troubling themselves whether it pleases or displeases the pope. The salvation of your soul is of greater moment than arbitrary and tyrannical laws—laws not imposed by the Lord.”

In this way the Reformation sought to restore purity of morals within the Church. The reformer continues:—

“Let feast-days be abolished, and let Sunday only be kept; or, if it is deemed proper to keep the great Christian festivals, let them be celebrated in the morning, and let the remainder of the day be a working-day as usual. For, by the ordinary mode of spending them in drinking, and gaming, and committing all sorts of sins, or in mere idleness, God is offended on festivals much more than on other days.”

He afterwards attacks the dedications of churches, (which he describes as mere taverns;) and after them fasts and fraternities. He desires not only to suppress abuses, but also to put an end to schisms. “It is time,” says he, “to take the case of the Bohemians into serious consideration, that hatred and envy may cease, and union be again established.” He proposes excellent methods of conciliation, and adds: “In this way must heretics be refuted by Scripture, as the ancient Fathers did, and not subdued by fire. On a contrary system, executioners would be the most learned of all doctors. Oh! would to God that each party among us would shake hands with each other in fraternal humility, rather than harden ourselves in the idea of our power and right! Charity is more necessary than the Roman papacy. I have now done what was in my power. If the pope or his people oppose it, they will have to give an account. The pope should be ready to renounce the popedom, and all his wealth, and all his honours, if he could thereby save a single soul. But he would see the universe go to destruction sooner than yield a hair-breadth of his usurped power. I am clear of these things.”

Luther next comes to universities and schools:

“I much fear the universities will become wide gates to hell, if due care is not taken to explain the Holy Scriptures, and engrave it on the hearts of the students. My advice to every person is, not to place his child where the Scripture does not reign paramount. Every institution in which the studies carried on lead to a relaxed consideration of the Word of God, must prove corrupting,—a weighty sentiment, which governments, literary men, and parents in all ages, would do well to ponder.”

Towards the end of his address he returns to the emperor and the emperor:

“The popes,” says he, “unable to lead the ancient masters of the Roman empire at will, resolved on wresting their title and their empire from them, and giving it to us Germans. This they accomplished, and we have become bondmen to the pope. For the pope has possessed himself of Rome, and bound the emperor by oath never to reside in it; and the consequence is, that the emperor is the emperor of Rome without having Rome. We have the name; the pope has the country and its cities. We have the title and the insignia of empire; the pope its treasury, power, privileges, and freedom. The pope eats the fruit, and we amuse ourselves with the husk. In this way our simplicity has always been abused by the pride and tyranny of the Romans.”

“But now, may God, who has given us such an empire, be our aid! Let us act conformably to our name, our title, our insignia; let us save our freedom, and give the Romans to know, that through their hands it was committed to us by God. They boast of having given us an empire. Very well! let us take what belongs to us. Let the pope surrender Rome, and every part of the empire that he possesses. Let him put an end to his taxes and extortions. Let him restore our liberty, our power, our wealth, our honour, our soul, and our body. Let the empire be all that an empire ought to be; and let the sword of princes no longer be compelled to lower itself before the hypocritical pretensions of a pope.”

In these words there is not only energy and eloquence, but also sound argument. Never did orator so speak to the nobility of the empire, and to the emperor himself. Far from being surprised that so many German states revolted from Rome, we should rather wonder that all Germany did not proceed to the banks of the Tiber, and there resume that imperial power, the insignia of which the popes had imprudently placed on the head of their chief.

Luther thus concludes his intrepid address:

"I presume, however, that I have struck too high a note, proposed many things that will appear impossible, and been somewhat too severe on the many errors which I have attacked. But what can I do? Better that the world be offended with me than God! . . . The utmost which it can take from me is life. I have often offered to make peace with my opponents, but, through their instrumentality, God has always obliged me to speak out against them. I have still a chant upon Rome in reserve; and if they have an itching ear, I will sing it to them at full pitch. Rome! do ye understand me?" . . . It is probable that Luther here refers to a treatise on the papacy which he was preparing for publication, but which never was published. Rector Burkhardt, writing at this time to Spengler, says: "There is, moreover, a short tract, 'De Execranda Venere Romanorum;' but it is kept in reserve." The title of the work seems to intimate something which would have given great offence; and it is pleasing to think that Luther had moderation not to publish it.

"If my cause is just," continues he, "it must be condemned on the earth, and justified only by Christ in heaven. Therefore let pope, bishops, priests, monks, doctors, come forward, display all their zeal, and give full vent to their fury. Assuredly they are just the people who ought to persecute the truth, as in all ages they have persecuted it."

Where did this monk obtain this clear knowledge of public affairs, which even the states of the empire often find it so difficult to unravel? Whence did this German derive this courage, which enables him to hold up his head among his countrymen, who had been enslaved for so many ages, and deal such severe blows to the papacy? By what mysterious energy is he animated? Does it not seem that he must have heard the words which God addressed to one of ancient times?—Lo! I have strengthened thy face against their faces; I have made thy forehead like a diamond, and harder than flint; be not, then, afraid because of them.

This exhortation, being addressed to the German nobility, was soon in the hands of all those for whom it was intended. It spread over Germany with inconceivable rapidity. Luther's friends trembled; while Staupitz, and those who wished to follow gentle methods, thought the blow too severe. "In our days," replied Luther, "whatever is treated calmly falls into oblivion, and nobody cares for it." At the same time he displayed extraordinary simplicity and humility. He was unconscious of his own powers. "I know not," writes he, "what to say of myself; perhaps I am the precursor of Philip (Melancthon.) Like Elias, I am preparing the way for him, in spirit and in power, that he may one day trouble Israel and the house of Ahab." But there was no occasion to wait for any other than he who had appeared. The house of Ahab was already shaken. The "Address to the German Nobility," was published on the 26th of June, 1520; and in a short time 4000 copies were sold,—a number, at that period, unprecedented. The astonishment was universal, and the whole people were in commotion. The vigour, spirit, perspicuity, and noble boldness by which it was pervaded, made it truly a work for the people, who felt that one who spoke in such terms truly loved them. The confused views which many wise men entertained were enlightened. All became aware of the usurpations of Rome. At Wittenberg no man had any doubt whatever that the pope was Antichrist. Even the elector's court, with all its timidity and circumspection, did not disapprove of the reformer, but only awaited the issue. The nobility and the people did not even wait. The nation was awakened, and, at the voice of Luther, adopted his cause, and rallied around his standard. Nothing could have been more advantageous to the reformer than this publication. In palaces, in castles, in the dwellings of the citizens, and even in cottages, all are now prepared, and made proof, as it were, against the sentence of condemnation which is about to fall upon the prophet of the people. All Germany is on fire; and the bull, come when it may, never will extinguish the conflagration.

CHAPTER IV.

Preparations at Rome—Motives to Resist the Papacy—Eck at Rome—Eck gains the Day—The Pope is the World—God produces the Separation—A Swiss Priest pleads for Luther—The Roman Consistory—Preamble of the Bull—Condemnation of Luther.

At Rome everything necessary for the condemnation of the defender of the liberty of the Church was prepared. Men had long lived there in arrogant security. The monks of Rome had long accused Leo X. of devoting himself to luxury and pleasure, and of spending his whole time in hunting, theatricals, and music, while the Church was crumbling to pieces. At last, through the clamour of Dr. Eck, who had come from Leipsic to invoke the power of the Vatican, the pope, the cardinals, the monks, all Rome awoke and bestirred themselves to save the papacy.

Rome, in fact, was obliged to adopt the severest measures. The gauntlet had been thrown down, and the combat was destined to be mortal. Luther attacked not the abuses of the Roman pontificate, but the pontificate itself. At his bidding the pope was humbly to descend from his throne, and again become a simple pastor or bishop on the banks of the Tiber. All the dignitaries of the Roman hierarchy were required to renounce their riches and worldly glory, and again become elders or deacons of the churches of Italy. All the splendour and power which had for ages dazzled the West, behoved to vanish away and give place to the humble and simple worship of the primitive Christians. These things God could have done, and will one day do; but they were not to be expected from men. Even should a pope have been disinterested enough, and bold enough to attempt the overthrow of the ancient and sumptuous edifice of the Romish Church, thousands of priests and bishops would have rushed forward to its support. The pope had received power under the express condition of maintaining whatever was entrusted to him. Rome deemed herself appointed of God to govern the Church; and no wonder, therefore, that she was prepared, with this view, to adopt the most decisive measures. And yet, at the outset, she did show hesitation. Several cardinals and the pope himself were averse to severe proceedings. Leo had too much sagacity not to be aware that a decision, the enforcement of which depended on the very dubious inclinations of the civil power, might seriously compromise the authority of the Church. He saw, moreover, that the violent methods already resorted to had only increased the evil. "Is it impossible to gain this Saxon monk?" asked the politicians of Rome. "Would all the power of the Church, and all the wiles of Italy, be ineffectual for this purpose? Negotiation must still be attempted."

Eck accordingly encountered formidable obstacles. He neglected nothing to prevent what he termed impious concessions. Going up and down Rome, he gave vent to his rage, and cried for vengeance. The fanatical faction of the monks having immediately leagued with him, he felt strong in this alliance, and proceeded with new courage to importune the pope and the cardinals. According to him, all attempts at conciliation were useless. "The idea of it," said he, "is only the vain dream of those who slumber at a distance from the scene." But he knew the danger; for he had wrestled with the audacious monk. The thing necessary was to amputate the gangrened limb, and so prevent the disease from attacking the whole body. The blustering disputant of Leipsic solves objections one after another, and endeavours, but finds it difficult, to persuade the pope. He wishes to save Rome in spite of herself. Sparing no exertion, he spent whole hours in deliberation in the cabinet of the pontiff, and made application both to the court and the cloisters, to the people and the Church. "Eck is calling to the depth of depths against me," said Luther, "and setting on fire the forests of Lebanon." At length he succeeded. The fanatics in the councils of the papacy vanquished the politicians. Leo gave way, and Luther's condemnation was resolved. Eck began again to breathe; and his pride felt gratified by the thought that his own efforts had procured the ruin of his heretical rival, and thereby saved the Church. "It was well," said he, "that I came to Rome at this time, for little was known of Luther's errors. It will one day be seen how much I have done in this cause."

No one exerted himself so much in concurring Dr. Eck as the master of the sacred palace, Sylvester Mazzolini de Prierio, who had just published a work, in which he maintained, that not only to the pope alone appertained the infallible decision of all debateable points, but also that papal ascendancy was the fifth monarchy of Daniel, and the only true monarchy; that the pope was the prince of all ecclesiastical, and the father of all secular princes, the chief of the world, and even in substance the world itself. In another writing he affirmed, that the pope is as much superior to the emperor as gold is to lead; that the pope can appoint and depose emperors and electors, establish and annul positive rights; and that the emperor, with all the laws and all the nations of Christendom, cannot decide the smallest matter contrary to the pope's will. Such was the voice which came forth from the palace of the sovereign pontiff—such the monstrous fiction which, in union with scholastic dogmas, aimed at suppressing reviving truth. Had this fiction not been unmasked, as it has been, and that even by learned members of the Catholic Church, there would have been neither true history nor true religion. The papacy is not merely a lie in regard to the Bible, it is also a lie in regard to the annals of nations. And hence the Reformation, by destroying its fascinating power, has emancipated not only the Church, but also kings and nations. The Reformation has been described as a political work; and in this secondary sense it truly was so.

Thus God sent a spirit of delusion on the doctors of Rome. The separation between truth and error must now be accomplished, and it is to error that the task is assigned. Had a compromise been entered into, it must have been at the expense of truth; for to mutilate truth in the slightest degree, is to pave the way for her complete annihilation. Like the insect which is said to die on the loss of one of its antennae, she must be complete in all her parts, in order to display the energy which enables her to gain great and advantageous victories, and propagate herself through coming ages. To mingle any portion of error with truth, is to throw a grain of poison into a large dish of food. The grain suffices to change its whole nature, and death ensues slowly, it may be, but yet surely. Those who defend the doctrine of Christ against the attacks of its adversaries, keep as jealous an eye on its farthest outposts as on the citadel itself; for the moment the enemy gains any footing at all, he is on the highway to conquest. The Roman pontiff determined, at the period of which we now treat, to rend the Church; and the fragment which remained in his hand, how splendid soever it may be, in vain endeavours under pompous ornaments to hide the deleterious principle by which it is attacked. It is only where the Word of God is that there is life. Luther, however great his courage was, would probably have been silent had Rome been so, and made some faint show of concession. But God did not leave the Reformation to depend on a weak human heart. Luther was under the guidance of a clearer intellect than his own. The pope was the instrument in the hand of Providence to sever every tie between the past and the future; and launch the reformer on a new, unknown, and to him uncertain career; and the difficult avenues to which he would, if left to himself, have been unable to find. The papal bull was a writing of divorce, sent from Rome to the pure Church of Jesus Christ, as personified in him who was then her humble but faithful representative. And the Church accepted the writing, on the understanding that she was thenceforth to depend on none but her heavenly Head.

While at Rome Luther's condemnation was urged forward with so much violence, a humble priest, dwelling in one of the humble towns of Helvetia, and who had never had any correspondence with the reformer, was deeply moved when he thought of the blow which was aimed at him; while even the friends of the Wittemberg doctor trembled in silence, this mountaineer of Switzerland resolved to employ every means to stay the formidable bull. His name was Ulrich Zwingli. William des Faucons, who was secretary to the papal legate in Switzerland, and managed the affairs of Rome during the legate's absence, was his friend, and a few days before had said to him: "While I live you may calculate on obtaining from me everything that a true friend can be expected to give." The Helvetician priest, trusting to this declaration, repaired to the Roman embassy. This, at least, may be inferred from one of his letters. For himself he had no fear of the dangers to which evangelical faith exposed him, knowing that a disciple of Jesus Christ must always be ready to sacrifice his life. "All I ask of Christ for myself," said he to a friend to whom he was unbosoming his solicitude on Luther's account,—"all I ask is to be able to bear like a man whatever evils await me. I am a vessel of clay in His hands. Let Him break or let Him strengthen me, as seemeth to Him good." But the Swiss evangelist had fears for the Christian Church, should this formidable blow reach the reformer; and he endeavoured to persuade the representative of Rome to enlighten the pope, and employ all the means in his power to prevent him from launching an excommunication at Luther. "The dignity of the holy see itself," said he to him, "is here at stake; for if matters are brought to such a point, Germany, in the height of her enthusiasm for the Gospel and for its preacher, will despise the pope and his anathemas." The efforts of Zwingli were in vain. It appears, indeed, that when he was making them, the blow had already been struck. Such was the first occasion on which the paths of the Saxon doctor and the Swiss priest met. The latter we will again meet with in the course of this history, and will see him gradually expanding and growing, until he obtain a high standing in the Church of the Lord.

After Luther's condemnation was at last resolved upon, new difficulties arose in the consistory. The theologians wished to proceed at once to fulfilment, whereas the lawyers were for beginning with a citation, asking their theological colleagues: "Was not Adam first cited? Adam, where art thou?" said the Lord. It was the same with Cain, the question asked at him was, Where is thy brother, Abel?" These strange arguments, drawn from Scripture, the canonists strengthened by appealing to the principles of the law of nature. "The certainty of a crime," said they, "cannot deprive the criminal of his right of defence." It is pleasing to find a sense of justice still existing in a Roman consistory. But these scruples did not suit the theologians, who, hurried on by passion, thought only of proceeding to business with despatch. It was at length agreed that the doctrine of Luther should be immediately condemned, and that a period of sixty days should be granted to him and his adherents; after which, provided they did not retract, they should all be, ipso facto, excommunicated. De Vio, who had returned from Germany in ill health, was carried to the meeting, that he might not lose this little triumph, which carried with it some degree of consolation. Having been defeated at Augsburg, he longed to be able at Rome to condemn the invincible monk, before whom his knowledge, finesse, and authority had proved unavailing.

Luther not being there to reply, De Vio felt himself strong. A last conference, which Eck attended, was held in presence of the pope himself, in his villa at Malliano. On the 15th of June the sacred college resolved on condemnation, and approved of the famous bull.

"Arise, O Lord!" said the Roman pontiff, speaking at this solemn moment as vicar of God and head of the Church,—arise and be judge in thy own cause. Remember the insults daily offered to thee by infatuated men. Arise, O Peter!—remember thy holy Roman Church, the mother of all churches, and mistress of the faith! Arise, O Paul! for here is a new Porphyry, who is attacking thy doctrines, and the holy popes, our predecessors! Arise, in fine, assembly of all the saints, holy Church of God, and intercede with the Almighty!"

The pope afterwards quotes as pernicious, scandalous, and poisonous, forty-one propositions in which Luther had expounded the holy doctrine of the Gospel. Among these propositions we find the following:—

"To deny that sin remains in an infant after baptism, is to trample St. Paul and our Lord Jesus Christ under foot."

"A new life is the best and noblest penance."

"To burn heretics is contrary to the will of the Holy Spirit," &c.

"The moment this bull is published," continued the pope, "it will be the duty of the bishops to make careful search for the writings of Martin Luther, which contain these errors, and to burn them publicly and solemnly in presence of the clergy and laity. In regard to Martin himself, good God! what have we not done! Imitating the goodness of the Almighty, we are ready, even yet, to receive him into the bosom of the Church; and we give him sixty days to transmit his retraction to us in a writing sealed by two prelates; or, what will be more agreeable to us, to come to Rome in person, that no doubt may be entertained as to his submission. Meanwhile, and from this moment, he must cease to preach, teach, or write, and must deliver his works to the flames. If, in the space of sixty days, he do not retract, we, by these presents, condemn him and his adherents as public and absolute heretics." The pope afterwards pronounces a multiplicity of excommunications, maledictions, and interdicts against Luther and all his adherents, with injunctions to seize their persons and send them to Rome. It is easy to conjecture what the fate of these noble confessors of the Gospel would have been in the dungeons of the papacy.

A thunderstorm was thus gathering over the head of Luther. Some had been able to persuade themselves, after Reuchlin's affair, that the court at Rome would not again make common cause with the Dominicans and the Inquisitors. These, however, were again in the ascendant, and the old alliance was solemnly renewed. The bull was published, and for ages the mouth of Rome had never pronounced a sentence of condemnation without following it up with a death-blow. This murderous message was about to issue from the seven hills, and attack the Saxon monk in his cloister. The moment was well chosen. There were good grounds for supposing that the new emperor, who, for many reasons, was anxious to obtain the friendship of the pope, would hasten to merit it by the sacrifice of an obscure monk. Leo X., the cardinals, and all Rome, were exulting in the belief that their enemy was already in their power.

CHAPTER V.

Witteberg—Melancthon—His Marriage—Catharine—Domestic Life—Benevolence—Good Humour—Christ and Antiquity—Labour—Love of Letters—His Mother—Outbreak among the Students.

WHILE the inhabitants of the eternal city were thus agitated, more tranquil events were occurring at Witteberg, where Melancthon was shedding a soft, but brilliant light. From 1500 to 2000 hearers, who had flocked from Germany, England, the Netherlands, France, Italy, Hungary, and Greece, often assembled around him. He was twenty-four years of age, and had not taken orders. Every house in Witteberg was open to this learned and amiable young professor. Foreign universities, in particular Ingolstadt, were desirous to gain him; and his Witteberg friends wished to get him married, and thereby retain him among them. Luther, though he concurred in wishing that his dear Philip should have a female companion, declared openly that he would give no counsel in the matter. The task was undertaken by others. The young doctor was a frequent visitor of Burgomaster Krapp. The burgomaster was of an ancient family, and had a daughter named Catharine, remarkable for the mildness of her dispositions and her great sensibility. Melancthon was urged to ask her in marriage; but the young scholar was buried among his books, and could talk of nothing else. His Greek authors and his New Testament were all his delight. He combated the arguments of his friends; but at length his consent was obtained, and all the arrangements having been made by others, Catharine became his wife. He received her with great coolness, and said, with a sigh: "God has willed it; so I must renounce my studies and my delights, to follow the wishes of my friends." Still, he appreciated the good qualities of Catharine. "The disposition and education of the girl," said he, "are such as I might have asked God to give her: ἀγαθὴ ὁ οὐκ ἐρεχάπορα. She certainly deserved a better husband." The matter was settled in August. The espousals took place on the 25th of September, and the marriage was celebrated in the end of November. Old John Luther and his wife came with their daughters to Witteberg on the occasion. Many learned and distinguished persons were also present.

The young bride was as warm in her affection as the young professor was cold. Ever full of anxiety for her husband, Catharine took the alarm the moment she saw him threatened with even the semblance of danger. If Melancthon proposed to take any step which might compromise him, she urged and entreated him to abandon it. "On one of these occasions," wrote Melancthon, "I was obliged to yield to her weakness. . . . It is our lot." How much unfaithfulness in the Church has had a similar origin! To the influence of Catharine ought, perhaps, to be attributed the timidity and fears with which her husband has often been reproached. Catharine was as fond a mother as a wife. She gave liberally to the poor. "O God, leave me not in my old age, when my hair shall begin to turn grey!" Such was the frequent prayer of this pious and timorous soul. Melancthon was soon won by the affection of his wife. When he had tasted the pleasures of domestic society, he felt how sweet they were, for he was of a nature to feel them. His happiest moments were beside his Catharine and her children. A French traveller having one day found the "preceptor of Germany" rocking his infant with one hand, and with a book in the other, started back in surprise; but Melancthon, without being discomposed, so warmly explained to him the value of children in the sight of God, that the stranger left the house (to use his own words) "wiser than he had entered it."

The marriage of Melancthon gave a domestic hearth to the Reformation. There was, thenceforth, in Witteberg a family whose house was open to all those whom the principle of a new life now animated. The concourse of strangers was immense. Melancthon was waited on for a thousand different affairs; and his rule was never to deny himself to anybody. The young professor was particularly skilful in concealing his own good deeds. If he had no more money, he secretly carried his silver plate to some merchant, never hesitating to part with it, provided he had the means of assisting those who were in distress. "Hence," says his friend, Camerarius, "it would have been impossible for him to provide for his own wants, and those of his family, had not a Divine and hidden blessing from time to time furnished him with the means. He carried his good nature to an extreme. He had some antique medals of gold and silver, which were extremely curious. One day, when shewing them to a stranger who was visiting him, Melancthon said: "Take any one of them you wish."—"I wish them all," replied the stranger. "I confess," says Philip, "I was at first offended at the selfishness of the request; however, I gave them to him." Melancthon's writings had a savour of antiquity. This, however, did not prevent them from exhaling the sweet savour of Christ, while it gave them an inexpressible charm. There is not one of his letters to his friends which does not contain some very apt allusion to Homer, Plato, Cicero, and Pliny; while Christ is always brought forward as his Master and his God. Spalatin had asked him for an explanation of our Saviour's words: Without me ye can do nothing, (John xv. 5.) Melancthon refers him to Luther: Cur agam gestum spectante Roscio? as Cicero expresses it; and then continues: "This passage means, that we must be absorbed by Christ, so that it is no longer we that act, but Christ that liveth in us. As in His person the Divine has been incorporated with the human nature, so must man be incorporated with Jesus Christ by faith."

The distinguished scholar's habit was to go to bed shortly after supper, and get up to his studies at two or three in the morning. During these early hours his best works were composed. His manuscripts usually lay on his table exposed to the view of all who came and went, so that several were stolen. When he had a party of his friends, he asked one or other of them, before they sat down to table, to read some short composition in prose or verse. During his journeys he was always accompanied by some young persons, with whom he conversed in a manner at once instructive and amusing. If the conversation flagged, each of them had to repeat in his turn some passage taken from the ancient poets. He often had recourse to irony, but always tempered it with great gentleness. "He stings and cuts," said he of himself; "but still without doing any harm."

The acquisition of knowledge was his ruling passion. The aim of his life was to diffuse literature and instruction. Let us not forget, that with him the first place in literature was given to the Holy Scriptures, and only a secondary place to the ancient Classics. "My sole object," said he, "is the defence of literature. We must, by our example, inspire youth with an admiration of literature, and make them love it for itself, and not for the pecuniary profit which it may be made to yield. The downfall of literature involves the destruction of all that is good—of religion and morals—of things human and divine. . . . The better a man is, the more ardently does he exert himself in favour of learning, for he knows that the most pernicious of all pests is ignorance."

Some time after his marriage, Melancthon went to Bretten, in the Palatinate, accompanied by Camerarius and other friends, to pay a visit to his affectionate mother. On coming in sight of his native town, he dismounted from his horse, threw himself on his knees, and thanked God for permitting him to see it again. Margaret, on embracing her son, almost fainted with joy. She would have had him reside at Bretten; and earnestly entreated him to continue in the faith of his fathers. On this head Melancthon excused himself, but with great tenderness, that he might not give offence to the conscientious feelings of his mother. He had great difficulty in parting with her; and whenever a traveller brought him news of his native town, he rejoiced, to use his own expression, as if he had renewed the joys of his childhood. Such was the character of one of the greatest instruments employed in the religious Revolution of the sixteenth century.

The domestic calmness and studious activity of Wittenberg was, however, disturbed by a commotion, the consequence of a rupture which took place between the students and the citizens. The rector betrayed great weakness. One may suppose how deeply Melancthon was grieved when he saw these disciples of literature committing such excesses. Luther felt indignant; and had no idea of trying to gain them over by a false condescension. The disgrace which these disorders brought upon the university, stung him to the heart. Having mounted the pulpit, he inveighed in strong terms against these commotions, calling upon both parties to submit to the authorities. His discourse produced great irritation: "Satan," says he, "unable to attack us from without, is trying to do us mischief from within. Him I fear not; but I fear lest the wrath of God be kindled against us for not having duly received His Word. During the three last years I have been three exposed to great danger. In 1518, at Augsburg; in 1519, at Leipsic; and now, in 1520, at Wittenberg. It is neither by wisdom nor by arms that the renovation of the Church will be accomplished; but by humble prayers, and by an intrepid faith, which puts Jesus Christ on our side. O my friend! unite your prayers to mine, that the evil spirit may not be able, by means of this small spark, to kindle a vast conflagration."

CHAPTER VI.

The Gospel in Italy—Discourse on the Mass—The Babylonish Captivity of the Church—Baptism—Abolition of Vows—Progress of the Reformation.

BUT fiercer combats awaited Luther. Rome was brandishing the sword with which she had resolved to attack the Gospel. Her threatened sentence, however, so far from dispiriting the reformer, increased his courage. The blows of this arrogant power gave him little concern. He will himself give more formidable blows, and thereby neutralize those of his adversaries. While Transalpine consistories are fulminating their anathemas against him, he will, with the sword of the Gospel, pierce to the very heart of the Italian states. Luther having been informed, by letters from Venice, of the favourable reception which had been given to his opinions, felt an ardent desire to carry the Gospel over the Alps. Evangelists must be found to transport it. "I wish," said he, "that we had living books—I mean preachers; and that we could multiply them, and afford them protection in all quarters, in order that they might convey the knowledge of holy things to the people. The prince could not do a work more worthy of him. Were the inhabitants of Italy to receive the truth, our cause would be unassailable." It does not appear that this project of Luther was realized. It is true that, at a later period, evangelists, even Calvin himself, sojourned for awhile in Italy; but at this time the design was not followed out. He had applied to one of the great ones of the earth. Had he made his appeal to men low in station, but full of zeal for the kingdom of God, the result might have been very different. The idea at this period was, that everything behoved to be done by governments. The association of private individuals, by which so much is now accomplished in Christendom, was almost unknown.

If Luther did not succeed in his plans of spreading the truth in a distant country, he was only the more zealous in proclaiming it himself. At this time his discourse "On the Holy Mass," was delivered at Wittenberg. In it he inveighed against the numerous sects of the Romish Church, and justly reproached it with its want of unity. "The multiplicity of spiritual laws," said he, "has filled the world with sects and divisions. Priests, monks, and laics, have shewn more hatred of each other than subsists between Christians and Turks. What do I say? Priests are mortal enemies of priests, and monks of monks. Each is attached to his particular sect, and despises all others. There is an end of Christian love and unity." He then attacks the idea that the mass is a sacrifice, and has any efficacy in itself. "The best thing in every sacrament, and consequently in the Supper, is the word and promises of God. Without faith in this Word and these promises, the sacrament is dead; a body without a soul, a flagon without wine, a purse without money, a type without an antitype, the letter without the spirit, a casket without its diamond, a scabbard without its sword."

Luther's voice, however, was not confined to Wittenberg; and if he failed to procure missionaries to carry his instructions to distant lands, God provided him with a missionary of a new description. The art of printing supplied the place of evangelists. The press was destined to make a breach in the Roman fortress. Luther had prepared a mine, the explosion of which shook the Roman edifice to its very foundations. This was his famous treatise on the "Babylonish Captivity of the Church," which appeared 6th October, 1520. Never had man displayed such courage in such critical circumstances.

In this writing he first enumerates, with a kind of ironical pride, all the advantages for which he is indebted to his enemies.

"Whether I will or not," says he, "I daily become more learned, spurred on as I am by so many celebrated masters. Two years ago I attacked indulgences; but with so much fear and indecision, that I am now ashamed of it. But, after all, the mode of attack is not to be wondered at, for I had nobody who would help me to roll the stone." He returns thanks to Prierio, Eck, Emser, and his other opponents, and continues: "I denied that the papacy was of God; but I granted that it had the authority of man. Now, after reading all the subtleties by which these sparks prop up their idol, I know that the papacy is only the kingdom of Babylon, and the tyranny of the great hunter, Nimrod. I therefore beg all my friends, and all book-sellers, to burn the books which I wrote on this subject, and to substitute for them the single proposition: 'The papacy is a general chase, by command of the Roman pontiff, for the purpose of running down and destroying souls.'"

Luther afterwards attacks the prevailing errors on the sacraments, on monastic vows, &c. The seven sacraments of the Church he reduces to three—viz., Baptism, Penitence, and the Lord's Supper. He then proceeds to baptism; and when discussing it dwells especially on the excellence of faith, and makes a vigorous attack upon Rome. "God," says he, "has preserved this single sacrament to us clear of human traditions. God has said, Whoso believeth and is baptized, shall be saved. This Divine promise must take precedence of all works however splendid, of all vows, all satisfactions, all indulgences, all that man has devised. On this promise, if we receive it in faith, all our salvation depends. If we believe, our heart is strengthened by the Divine promise; and though all else should abandon the believer, this promise will not abandon him. With it he will resist the adversary who assaults his soul, and will meet death though pitiless, and even the judgment of God himself. In all trials his comfort will be to say, 'God is faithful to his promises, and these were pledged to me in baptism; if God be for me, who can be against me?' Oh, how rich the Christian, the baptized! Nothing can destroy him but his own refusal to believe."

"It may be that, to my observations on the necessity of faith, will be opposed the baptism of little children. But as the Word of God is powerful to change even the heart of the wicked, though neither less deaf nor less impotent than a little child; so the prayer of the Church, to which all things are possible, changes the little child by means of the faith which God is pleased to pour into its soul, and so cleanses and renews it."

After explaining the doctrine of baptism, Luther employs it as a weapon against the papacy. In fact, if the Christian finds complete salvation in the renewal which accompanies the baptism of faith, what need has he of the prescriptions of Rome?

"Wherefore," says Luther, "I declare that neither the pope, nor the bishop, nor any man whatever, is entitled to impose the smallest burden on a Christian—at least without his consent. Whatsoever is done otherwise is done tyrannically. We are free of all men. The vow which we made in baptism is sufficient by itself alone, and is more than all we could ever accomplish. Therefore all other vows may be abolished. Let every one who enters the priesthood, or a religious order, consider well that the works of a monk or a priest, how difficult soever they may be, are, in the view of God, in no respect superior to those of a peasant labouring in the field, or a woman attending to the duties of her house. God estimates all these things by the rule of faith. And it often happens that the simple labour of a man-servant, or a maid-servant, is more agreeable to God than the fastings and works of a monk, these being deficient in faith. . . . The Christian people is the people of God led away into captivity, to Babylon, and there robbed of their baptism."

Such were the weapons by which the religious revolution, whose history we are tracing, was accomplished. First, the necessity of faith was established, and then the reformers used it as a hammer to break superstition in pieces. They attacked error with that Divine power which removes mountains. These, and many similar passages of Luther, circulated in towns, convents, and the country, were the leaven which leavened the whole lump.

The conclusion of this famous production on the captivity of Babylon, is in the following terms:—

"I learn that a new papal excommunication has been prepared against me. If so, the present book may be regarded as part of my future recantation. In proof of my obedience, the rest will soon follow; and the whole will, with the help of Christ, form a collection, the like to which Rome never saw or heard before."

CHAPTER VII.

New Negotiations—Miltitz and the Augustines of Eisleben—Deputation to Luther—Miltitz and the Elector—Conference at Lichtenberg—Luther's Letter to the Pope—Book Presented to the Pope—Union of the Believer with Christ—Freedom and Bondage.

AFTER this publication all hope of reconciliation between the pope and Luther must have vanished. Persons of the least possible discernment must have been struck with the incompatibility of the reformer's belief with the doctrine of the Church; and yet, at this very moment, new negotiations were about to commence. In the end of August, 1520, five weeks before the publication of the "Captivity of Babylon," the general chapter of the Augustines had assembled at Eisleben. At this meeting the venerable Staupitz resigned his office of vicar-general of his order, and Wicacelas Link—he who accompanied Luther to Augsburg—was invested with it. Suddenly, in the middle of the chapter, arrived the indefatigable Miltitz, burning with eagerness to reconcile Luther and the pope. His avarice, and, above all, his jealousy and hatred, were interested. Eck and his swaggering had galled him. He knew that the doctor of Ingolstadt had spoken disparagingly of him at Rome; and there was nothing he would not have sacrificed in order to defeat the designs of this troublesome rival by means of a speedily concluded peace. The interest of religion gave him no concern. One day, by his own account, he was dining with the Bishop of Leipsic. After the guests had drank very freely, a new work of Luther's was brought in. On being opened and read, the bishop flew into a passion, and the official swore; but Miltitz laughed with all his heart. The Reformation was treated by Miltitz as a man of the world, and by Eck as a theologian.

Aroused by the arrival of Dr. Eck, Miltitz addressed the chapter of the Augustines in a discourse, which he delivered with a very marked Italian accent, thinking thus to overawe his countrymen. "The whole Augustinian order is compromised by this affair," said he. "Shew me some method of silencing Luther." "We have nothing to do with the doctor," replied the fathers, "and we know not what counsel to give you." They founded, doubtless, on what Staupitz had done at Augsburg, when he loosed Luther from his vows of obedience to the order. Miltitz insisted: "Let a deputation from this venerable chapter wait upon Luther, and solicit him to write a letter to the pope, assuring him that he has never plotted in any respect against his person. That will be sufficient to terminate the affair." The chapter gave their consent, and assigned the task of conferring with Luther, no doubt at the nuncio's request, to the ex-vicar-general, Staupitz, and his successor Link. The deputation forthwith set out for Wittemberg, with a letter from Miltitz to the doctor, filled with expressions of the highest respect. "There is no time to be lost," said he, "the thunder already hovering over the head of the reformer will soon burst, and then all is over."

Neither Luther nor the deputies, who concurred in his opinions, hoped anything from a letter to the pope. That, however, was a reason for not refusing to write it, as it would only be a mere matter of form, and might serve to bring out Luther's rights. "This Italian of Saxony, (Miltitz,)" thought Luther, "in making this demand, has doubtless his own particular interest in view. Very well; be it so! I will write, as I can with truth, that I have never objected to the pope personally. I will even endeavour to guard against severity in attacking the see of Rome. Still, it shall have its sprinkling of salt."

Luther having shortly after been informed of the arrival of the bull in Germany, declared to Spalatin, on the 3rd of October, that he would not write the pope; and on the 6th of the same month, published his book on the "Captivity of Babylon." Miltitz did not even yet despair of success. His eagerness to humble Eck made him believe an impossibility. On the 2nd of October he had written the elector in high spirits: "Everything will go well; but, for the love of God, delay no longer to order payment of the pension which I have had from you and your brother for some years. I must have money, in order to make new friends at Rome. Write the pope, and do homage to the young cardinals, the relatives of his holiness, with gold and silver pieces from the mint of your electoral highness; and add some for me also, for I was robbed of those which you gave me."

Even after Luther was acquainted with the bull, the intriguing Miltitz was not discouraged, and requested a conference with Luther at Lichtenberg. The elector ordered Luther to repair thither. But his friends, and especially the affectionate Melancthon, opposed it. "What!" thought they, "at the moment when a bull has appeared, ordering Luther to be seized and carried off to Rome, to accept a conference with the pope's nuncio in a retired spot! Is it not evident that, because Dr. Eck, from having too openly proclaimed his hatred, is not able to approach the reformer, the wily chamberlain has been employed to ensnare Luther in his nets?"

These fears could not deter the doctor of Wittemberg. The prince has commanded, and he will obey. "I am setting out for Lichtenberg," wrote he to the chaplain on the 11th of October; "pray for me." His friends would not quit him. The same day, towards evening, Luther entered Lichtenberg on horseback, amid thirty horsemen, one of whom was Melancthon. The papal nuncio arrived almost at the same time with only four attendants. Was this modest escort a stratagem to throw Luther and his friends off their guard?

Miltitz urged Luther with the most pressing solicitations, assuring him that the blame would be thrown upon Eck and his foolish boastings, and that everything would terminate to the satisfaction of both parties. "Very well," replied Luther; "I offer henceforth to keep silence, provided my opponents keep it also. For the sake of peace, I will do everything that it is possible for me to do."

Miltitz was delighted; and, accompanying Luther as far as Wittemberg, the reformer and the papal nuncio walked arm in arm into this town, which Dr. Eck was now approaching, holding menacingly in his hand the formidable bull which was to overthrow the Reformation. "We will bring the matter to a happy conclusion," wrote Miltitz forthwith to the elector. "Thank the pope for his rose; and, at the same time, send forty or fifty florins to Cardinal Quatuor Sanctorum."

Luther felt bound to keep his promise of writing the pope. Before bidding Rome an eternal adieu, he wished once more to tell her important and salutary truths. Some, perhaps, will regard his letter only as a piece of irony,—a bitter and insulting satire; but this were to mistake the sentiments by which he was actuated. He sincerely believed that Rome was to blame for all the evils of Christendom; and in this view his words are not insults, but solemn warnings. The more he loved Leo, and the more he loved the Church of Christ, the more he desired to unfold the full magnitude of the disease. The energy of his expressions is proportioned to the energy of his feelings. The crisis has arrived, and he seems like a prophet walking round the city for the last time, upbraiding it for all its abominations, denouncing the judgments of the Almighty, and crying aloud, "Still some days of respite!" The letter is as follows:—

"To the most holy Father in God, Leo X., Pope at Rome, salvation in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

"From amid the fearful war which I have been waging for three years with disorderly men, I cannot help looking to you, O Leo, most holy Father in God. And although the folly of your impious flatterers has compelled me to appeal from your judgment to a future council, my heart is not turned away from your holiness; and I have not ceased to pray God earnestly and with profound sighs, to grant prosperity to yourself and your pontificate.

"It is true I have attacked some antichristian doctrines, and have inflicted a deep wound on my adversaries because of their impiety. Of this I repent not, as I have here Christ for an example. Of what use is salt if it have lost its savour, or the edge of a sword if it will not cut? Cursed be he who does the work of the Lord negligently. Most excellent Leo, far from having conceived any bad thoughts with regard to you, my wish is that you may enjoy the most precious blessings throughout eternity. One thing only I have done: I have maintained the Word of truth. I am ready to yield to all in everything; but as to this Word, I will not, I cannot abandon it. He who thinks differently on this subject is in error.

"It is true that I have attacked the court of Rome; but neither yourself nor any man living can deny that there is greater corruption in it than was in Sodom and Gomorrah, and that the impiety which prevails makes cure hopeless. Yes; I have been horrified on seeing how, under your name, the poor followers of Christ were deceived. I have opposed this, and will oppose it still,—not that I imagine it possible, in spite of the opposition of flatterers, to accomplish anything in this Babylon, which is confusion itself; but I owe it to my brethren to endeavour, if possible, to remove some of them from these dreadful evils.

"You know it; Rome has for many years been inundating the world with whatever could destroy both soul and body. The Church of Rome, formerly the first in holiness, has become a den of robbers, a place of prostitution, a kingdom of death and hell; so that Antichrist himself, were he to appear, would be unable to increase the amount of wickedness. All this is as clear as day.

"And yet, O Leo, you yourself are like a lamb in the midst of wolves—a Daniel in the lions' den. But single-handed, what can you oppose to these monsters? There may be three or four cardinals who to knowledge add virtue. But what are these against so many? You should perish by poison even before you could try any remedy. It is all over with the court at Rome—the wrath of God has overtaken and will consume it.

It hates counsel—it fears reform—it will not moderate the fury of its ungodliness; and hence it may be justly said of it as of its mother, We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed; forsake her. It belonged to you and your cardinals to apply the remedy; but the patient laughs at the doctor, and the horse refuses to feel the bit.

"Cherishing the deepest affection for you, most excellent Leo, I have always regretted that, formed as you are for a better age, you were raised to the pontificate in these times. Rome is not worthy of you, and those who resemble you; the only chief whom she deserves to have is Satan himself; and hence the truth is, that in this Babylon he is more king than you are. Would to God that, laying aside this glory which your enemies so much extol, you would exchange it for a modest pastoral office, or live on your paternal inheritance. Rome's glory is of a kind fit only for Iscariots.

... O my dear Leo, of what use are you in this Roman court, unless it be to allow the most execrable men to use your name and your authority in ruining fortunes, destroying souls, multiplying crimes, oppressing faith, truth, and the whole Church of God? O Leo, Leo! you are the most unfortunate of men, and you sit upon the most dangerous of thrones. I tell you the truth because I wish your good.

"Is it not true that, under the vast expanse of heaven there is nothing more corrupt, more hateful, than the Roman Court? In vice and corruption it infinitely exceeds the Turks. Once the gate of heaven, it has become the mouth of hell—a wide mouth which the wrath of God keeps open, so that, on seeing so many unhappy beings thrown headlong into it, I was obliged to lift my voice, as in a tempest, in order that, at least, some might be saved from the fearful abyss. Such, O Leo, my Father, was the reason why I inveighed against this death-giving see. Far from attacking your person, I thought I was labouring for your safety, when I valiantly assaulted this prison, or rather this hell in which you are confined. To do all sorts of evil to the Court of Rome, were to discharge your own duty; to cover it with shame is to honour Christ; in one word, to be a Christian is to be anything but a Roman.

"Meanwhile, seeing that in succouring the see of Rome I was losing my labour and my pains, I sent her a letter of divorce. I said to her, 'Adieu, Rome!' He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still, (Rev. xxii. 11;) and devoted myself to the tranquil and solitary study of the sacred volume. Then Satan opened his eyes and awoke his servant, John Eck, a great enemy of Jesus Christ, in order that he might oblige me again to descend into the arena. Eck's wish was to establish the primacy, not of Peter, but of himself, and, for that purpose, to lead vanquished Luther in triumph. The blame of all the obloquy which has been cast on the see of Rome rests with him."

Luther narrates his intercourse with De Vio, Milnitz, and Eck, and then continues:

"Now, then, I come to you, O most holy Father, and, prostrated at your feet, pray you, if possible, to put a curb on the enemies of the truth. But I cannot retract my doctrine. I cannot permit rules of interpretation to be imposed on the Holy Scriptures. The Word of God—the source whence all freedom springs, must be left free."

"O Leo, my Father! listen not to those flattering sirens who tell you that you are not a mere man, but a demi-god, and can ordain what you please. You are the servant of servants; and the seat which you occupy is of all others the most dangerous, and the most unhappy. Give credit not to those who exalt, but to those who humble you. Perhaps I am too bold in giving advice to so high a majesty, whose duty it is to instruct all men. But I see the dangers which surround you at Rome; I see you driven hither and thither, tossed, as it were, upon the billows of a raging sea. Charity urges me; and I cannot resist sending forth a warning cry.

"Not to appear empty-handed before your holiness, I present you with a little book, which has appeared under your name; and which will make you aware of the subjects to which I will be able to devote myself, if your flatterers permit me. It is a small matter as regards the size of the volume; but a great one in regard to its contents; for it comprehends a summary of the Christian life. I am poor, and have nothing else to offer; besides, you have no want of anything but spiritual gifts. I commend myself to your holiness. May the Lord keep you for ever and ever! Amen."

The little book with which Luther did homage to the pope, was his "Treatise on the Liberty of the Christian;" in which he demonstrates, without any polemical discussion, how the Christian, without infringing on the liberty which faith has given him, may submit to every external ordinance in a spirit of freedom and love. Two truths form the basis of the whole discourse,—viz., The Christian is free—all things are his. The Christian is a servant subject to all in everything. By faith he is free; by love he is subject.

At first he explains the power of faith to make the Christian free. "Faith unites the soul with Christ, as a bride with the bridegroom. Everything that Christ has become the property of the believer; everything that the believer has become the property of Christ. Christ possesses all blessings, even eternal salvation; and these are thenceforth the property of the believer. The believer possesses all vices and all sins; and these become, thenceforth, the property of Christ. A happy exchange now takes place. Christ, who is God and man, Christ, who has never sinned, and whose holiness is invincible, Christ the Omnipotent and Eternal, appropriating to himself by His wedding ring—that is to say, by faith—all the sins of the believer,—these sins are swallowed up in Him and annihilated; for no sin can exist in presence of His infinite righteousness. Thus, by means of faith, the soul is delivered from all sins, and invested with the eternal righteousness of Jesus Christ the Bridegroom. O happy union! Jesus Christ the rich, the noble, the holy Bridegroom, takes in marriage this poor, guilty, contemned bride, delivers her from all evil, and decks her in the richest robes. . . . Christ, a king and priest, shares this honour and glory with all Christians. The Christian is a king, and consequently possesses all things. He is a priest, and consequently possesses God. And it is faith, not works, which procures him this honour. The Christian is free from all things, and above all things—faith giving him everything in abundance."

In the second part of the treatise Luther presents the truth in its other point of view. "Although the Christian has thus been made free, he voluntarily becomes a servant, that he may act towards his brethren as God has acted towards him through Jesus Christ. I desire," said he, "freely, joyfully, and gratuitously, to serve a Father who hath thus shed upon me all the riches of His goodness. I wish to become everything to my neighbour, as Christ has become everything to me." . . . "From faith," continues Luther, "flows love to God, and from love a life full of liberty, charity, and joy. Oh how noble and elevated a life the life of the Christian is! But, alas! none know it, and none preach it. By faith the Christian rises even to God,—by love he descends to man; still, however, remaining always in God. This is true liberty,—a liberty as far above every other species of liberty as the heavens are above the earth."

Such was the treatise which accompanied Luther's letter to Leo X.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Bull in Germany—Eck's Reception—The Bull at Wittenberg—Interposition of Zwingle.

WHILE the reformer was thus addressing the Roman pontiff for the last time, the bull which anathematized him was already in the hands of the Germanic Church, and at Luther's own door. It would seem that no doubt was entertained at Rome as to the success of the measure which had thus been adopted against the Reformation. The pope had charged two high functionaries of his court—Caraacioli and Aleander—to be the bearers of it to the Archbishop of Mentz, who was requested to see to its execution. But Eck himself appeared in Saxony as the herald and executor of the great pontifical work. No man knew better than the doctor of Ingolstadt how formidable the blows were which Luther had struck. Alive to the danger, he had stretched forth his hand to sustain the tottering edifice of Rome. In his own estimation he was the Atlas, destined to support the ancient Roman world on his robust shoulders when on the point of falling to pieces. Proud of the success of his journey to Rome,—proud of the charge which he had received from the sovereign pontiff,—proud to appear in Germany with the new title of protonotary and pontifical nuncio,—proud of the bull which he held in his hand, and which contained the condemnation of his indomitable rival, he regarded his present mission as a triumph more splendid than all the victories which he had gained in Hungary, Bavaria, Lombardy, and Saxony, and from which he had previously derived so much renown. But this pride was soon to be humbled. The pope, in entrusting the publication of the bull to Eck, had committed a blunder which was destined to neutralize its effect. The proud distinction conferred on a man who did not hold high rank in the Church, gave offence to sensitive and jealous spirits. The bishops, accustomed to receive the bulls directly from the pope, were offended at the publication of this one in their dioceses by an upstart nuncio. The nation, who had hooted the pretended conqueror of Leipsic at the moment of his flight into Italy, were equally astonished and indignant when they saw him repass the Alps, decked in the insignia of pontifical nuncio, and with the power of crushing whosoever he chose. The sentence brought by his implacable adversary, Luther regarded as an act of personal revenge. "He regarded it," says Pallavicini, "as the perfidious poniard of a mortal enemy, and not as the legitimate act of a Roman licitor." It was generally viewed as less the bull of the sovereign pontiff than of Dr. Eck. In this way the blow was obstructed and weakened beforehand by the very person at whose instigation it was struck.

The Chancellor of Ingolstadt had hastened back to Saxony, which, as having been the scene of battle, he was desirous should also be the scene of his victory. Having arrived, he published the bull at Meissen, Merseburg, and Brandenburg, towards the end of September. But in the first of these towns it was posted up in a place where nobody could read it; and the bishops of those three sees were in no haste to publish it. Even Duke George, Eck's great patron, prohibited the council of Leipsic from making it public, before receiving orders from the Bishop of Merseburg; and these orders did not arrive till the following year. "These are only difficulties of form," said John Eck to himself at first, for everything else seemed to smile upon him. Duke George sent him a golden cup and some ducats. Even Miltitz, who had hastened to Leipsic, on learning that his rival had arrived, invited him to dinner. The two legates were boon companions; and Miltitz thought he could not have a better opportunity of sounding Eck than over their wine. "After he had drunk pretty freely, he began," says the pope's chamberlain, "to boast in grand style; he displayed his bull, and told how he meant to bring that droll fellow Martin to his senses." But the Ingolstadt doctor soon had occasion to observe that the wind was veering. The course of a year had produced a great change in Leipsic. On St. Michael's day, some students posted up placards, in ten different places, containing a severe attack on the new nuncio, who, in amazement, took refuge in the cloister of St. Paul, where Tetzel had previously found his asylum, and declining every visit, induced the rector to call his youthful opponents to account. By this poor Eck gained little. The students composed a song upon him, and sang it in the streets. Eck must have heard it in his prison. On this all his courage failed him, and the redoubtable champion trembled in every limb. Every day brought him threatening letters. One hundred and fifty students, who had arrived from Wittemberg, spoke out boldly against the papal envoy. For once the poor apostolical nuncio could hold out no longer. "I would not have them kill him," said Luther, "though I wish his designs to fail." Eck, quitting his retreat at night, clandestinely escaped from Leipsic to go and hide himself at Coburg. Miltitz, who gives the account, triumphed more than the reformer. His triumph, however, was not of long duration. All the chamberlain's projects of conciliation failed, and he came at last to a miserable end. One day, when drunk, he fell into the Rhine at Mentz, and was drowned.

Eck gradually recovered courage. Repairing to Erfurt, whose theologians had on more than one occasion betrayed their jealousy of Luther, he insisted on having his bull published in this town; but the students seized the copies, tore them to pieces, and threw them into the river, saying: "Since it is a bull, let it swim." "Now," said Luther, on being informed of this, "the pope's paper is a true bull." Eck durst not make his appearance at Wittemberg; but he sent the bull to the rector with a threat, that if it was not conformed to, he would destroy the university. At the same time he wrote Duke John, Frederick's brother, and co-regent: "Do not take what I do in bad part; I am acting in behalf of the faith, and it costs me many cares, great labour, and much money."

The Bishop of Brandenburg, supposing him inclined, was not entitled to act at Wittemberg in his capacity of ordinary, the university being protected by its privileges. Luther and Carlstadt, who were condemned by the bull, were asked to take part in the meetings which were held to deliberate on its contents. The rector declared that, as he had not received a letter from the pope along with the bull, he declined to publish it. The university had already acquired greater authority in the surrounding countries than the sovereign pontiff himself. Its declaration served as a model to the government of the elector; and thus the spirit which was in Luther triumphed over the bull of Rome.

While the German mind was thus strongly agitated by this affair, a grave voice was heard in another quarter of Europe. An individual, foreseeing the immense rent which the papal bull was about to make in the Church, came forward to give a solemn warning, and to defend the reformer. It was that of the Swiss priest, of whom we have already spoken,—viz., Ulrich Zwingli, who, though not united to Luther by any friendly tie, published a treatise full of wisdom and dignity, the first of his numerous writings. A kind of fraternal affection seemed to draw him towards the doctor of Wittemberg. "The piety of the pontiff," said he, "requires that he shall joyfully sacrifice whatever is dearest to him for the glory of Christ his King, and for the public peace of the Church. Nothing is more injurious to his dignity than to defend it by pensions or terror. Even before the writings of Luther were read, he had been calumniated to the people as a heretic, a schismatic, and as Antichrist himself. Not one gave him warning—none refuted him. He called for a discussion; but all he could get was a sentence of condemnation. The bull which is published displeases even those who honour the majesty of the pope. For it is everywhere regarded as an expression of the impotent hatred of some monks, and not of the mildness of a pontiff, who ought to be the vicar of a Saviour full of love. All acknowledge that the true doctrine of the Gospel of Jesus Christ has greatly degenerated, and that a public and thorough reformation of laws and manners is required. Consider all men of learning and virtue,—the more sincere they are, the stronger is their attachment to evangelical truth, and the less their dissatisfaction with Luther's writings. There is not one who does not acknowledge that he has derived benefit from these books, though he may have met with passages which he was unable to approve. Let men of sound doctrine and acknowledged probity be selected. Let three princes, above all suspicion,—the Emperor Charles, the King of England, and the King of Hungary,—name the judges. Let these judges read Luther's writings. Let them hear his defence, and then let their decision, whatever it be, be confirmed.

Νεκρωσθε τὸν Χριστὸν ταῖς αἰσὶ καὶ τῷ λογισμῷ.¹

This proposal, which came from the country of the Swiss, led to no result. It was necessary that the great divorce should take place. It was necessary that Christendom should be rent in twain. Her very wounds were destined to be the cure of her diseases.

CHAPTER IX.

Luther Examines himself in the presence of God—Luther's Opinion of the Bull—A Neutral Family—Luther on the Bull, and against the Bull of Antichrist—The Pope prohibits Faith—Effects of the Bull—The Fugate File of Louvain.

BUT what signified all this resistance by students, rectors, and priests? If the mighty arm of Charles V. is joined to the mighty arm of the pope, will they not crush these scholars and grammarians? Will any one be able to resist the combined power of the pontiff of Christendom and of the Emperor of the West? The blow has been struck. Luther is excommunicated; and the Gospel seems lost. At this solemn moment the reformer does not disguise to himself the magnitude of the danger to which he is exposed; but he looks upward, and prepares to receive, as from the hand of the Lord himself, a blow which seems destined to annihilate him. He retires within himself, and meditates at the footstool of the throne of God. "What the result is to be," says he, "I know not, and I am not anxious to know; certain as I am, that He who sits in heaven has from all eternity foreseen the beginning, the progress, and the end of this affair. Wherever the blow is to strike, I am without fear. The leaf of a tree falls not without our Father's will. How much less shall we fall. It is a small matter to die for the Word, since this Word, which became incarnate, and that for us, has itself first died. If we die with it, we shall rise again with it; and, passing along the same road by which it passed, will arrive where it has arrived, and remain with it throughout eternity." Sometimes, however, Luther could not restrain the contempt which he felt for the manoeuvres of his enemies. On these occasions he displays his characteristic combination of sublimity and sarcasm. "I know nothing of Eck," says he, "except that he arrived with a long beard, a long bull, and a long purse. . . . But I will laugh at his bull."

On the 3d of October he was made acquainted with the papal letter. "At length," says he, "this Roman bull has arrived. I despise it, and defy it as impious, false, and in all respects worthy of Eck. It is Christ himself who is condemned. It gives no reasons; it merely cites me, not to be heard, but simply to sing a psalmode. I will treat it as spurious, though I have no doubt it is genuine. Oh, if Charles V. were a man, and would, for the love of Christ, attack these demons! I rejoice in having to endure some hardships for the best of causes. I already feel more liberty in my heart; for, at length, I know that the pope is Antichrist, and that his see is that of Satan himself."

It was not in Saxony merely that the thunders of Rome had produced alarm. A quiet family of Swabia, —a neutral family, saw its peace suddenly broken up. Bilibald Pirckheimer, of Nuremberg, one of the most distinguished men of his age, having early lost his beloved wife Crescentia, was united in the closest affection with his two young sisters, Charitas, abbess of St. Clair, and Clara, a nun of the same convent. These two pious females served God in solitude; and divided their time between study, the care of the poor, and preparation for eternity. Bilibald, who was a statesman, relaxed from public affairs by maintaining a correspondence with them. They were learned, read Latin, and studied the Fathers; but their favourite volume was the Holy Scriptures. They had never had any other teacher than their brother. The letters of Charitas are written in a delicate and amiable spirit. Tenderly attached to Bilibald, she took alarm at the least danger which threatened him. Pirckheimer, to dissipate the fears of this timid spirit, wrote a dialogue between Charitas and Veritas, (Charity and Truth), in which Veritas tries to strengthen Charitas. Nothing can be more touching, or better fitted to solace a tender and agonized heart.

What must have been the terror of Charitas when the rumour spread, that in the papal bull Bilibald's name was posted up beside that of Luther, on the doors of cathedrals! In fact, Eck, pushed on by blind fury, had associated with Luther six of the most distinguished men of Germany,—viz., Carlstadt, Feldkirchen, and Egranus, (who gave themselves very little concern about it), and Adelmann, Pirckheimer, and his friend Spengler, whose public functions made them particularly alive to the insult. There was great agitation in the convent of St. Clair. How shall the disgrace of Bilibald be borne? Nothing affects relatives more deeply than such trials. In vain did the city of Nuremberg, the Bishop of Bamberg, and even the dukes of Bavaria, interfere in behalf of Spengler and Pirckheimer: these noble-minded men were obliged to humble themselves before Dr. Eck, who made them feel all the importance of a Roman protonotary; and obliged them to write a letter to the pope, declaring that they adhered to the doctrines of Luther only in so far as they were conformable to Christian faith. At the same time Adelmann, with whom Eck had once had a scuffle on rising up from table after a discussion on the great question which then occupied all minds, was required to appear before the Bishop of Augsburg, and purge himself on oath of all participation in the Lutheran heresy. Still, however, anger and revenge had proved bad counsellors to Eck. The names of Bilibald and his friends damaged the bull. The character of these eminent men and their extensive connections, increased the general irritation.

Luther at first pretended to doubt the authenticity of the bull. "I learn," says he in the first work which he published after it, "that Eck has brought from Rome a new bull, which resembles him so much—is so stuffed with falsehood and error, that it might well be named Doctor Eck. He gives out that it is the work of the pope, whereas it is only a work of lies." After explaining his reasons for doubting its genuineness, Luther thus concludes: "I must with my own eyes see the lead, the seal, the tape, the conclusion, the signature of the bull—every part of it, in short, or I will not estimate all this clamour at the weight of a straw."

But no man doubted, not even Luther himself, that the bull was the pope's. Germany waited to see what the reformer would do. Would he stand firm? All eyes were fixed on Wittenberg. Luther did not keep his contemporaries long in suspense. On the 4th of November, 1520, he replied, with a discharge of thunder, by publishing his treatise "Against the Bull of Antichrist."

"What errors, what impostures," said he, "have crept in among the poor people under the cloak of the Church, and the pretended infallibility of the pope! how many souls have thus been lost! how much blood shed! what murders committed! what kingdoms ruined!"

Further on he ironically says: "I know very well how to distinguish between art and malice; and set very little value on a malice which has no art. To burn books is so easy a matter, that even children can do it; how much more the holy Father and his doctors. It would become them to shew greater ability than is requisite merely to burn books. . . . Besides, let them destroy my works! I desire nothing more; for all I wished was to guide men to the Bible, that they might, thereafter, lay aside all my writings. Good God! if we had the knowledge of Scripture, what need would there be for my writings? . . . I am free, by the grace of God; and bulls neither solace nor frighten me. My strength and consolation are where neither men nor devils can assail them."

Luther's tenth proposition, condemned by the pope, was in the following terms:—"No man's sins are pardoned if, when the priest absolves him, he does not believe that they are pardoned." The pope, in condemning it, denied that faith was necessary in the sacrament. "They maintain," exclaims Luther, "that we ought not to believe that our sins are pardoned when we are absolved by the priest. What, then, are we to do? Listen now, O Christians, to a new arrival from Rome. Condemnation is pronounced against this article of faith which we profess when we say, 'I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Holy Catholic Church, and the forgiveness of sins.' Did I know that the pope had really given this bull at Rome, (he did not doubt it,) and that it was not the invention of the arch- liar, Eck, I would cry aloud to all Christians, that they ought to hold the pope as the true Antichrist spoken of in Scripture. And if he would not desist from proscribing the faith of the Church, . . . then let the temporal sword resist him even sooner than the Turk!

. . . For the Turks allow belief; but the pope forbids it."

While Luther was speaking thus forcibly, his perils were increasing. The scheme of his enemies was to drive him out of Wittenberg. If Luther and Wittenberg are separated, both will be destroyed. A single stroke would thus disencumber Rome of both the heretical doctor and the heretical university. Duke George, the Bishop of Mersburg, and the theologians of Leipsic, were labouring underhand at this work. Luther, on being apprised of it, said, "I leave this affair in the hands of God." These proceedings were not without result: Adrian, professor of Hebrew at Wittenberg, suddenly turned against the doctor. It required great firmness in the faith to withstand the shock given by the Roman bull. There are characters which follow the truth only a certain distance, and such was Adrian. Frightened at the condemnation, he quitted Wittenberg, and repaired to Leipsic, to be near Dr. Eck.

The bull began to be executed. The voice of the pontiff of Christendom was not an empty sound. Long had fire and sword taught subjection to it. Faggot piles were prepared at his bidding, and everything indicated that a dreadful catastrophe was to put an end to the audacious revolt of the Augustine monk. In October, 1520, all the copies of Luther's works in the shops of the booksellers at Ingolstadt were seized, and put under seal. The Archbishop-elect of Mentz, moderate as he was, had to banish Ulrich of Hütten from his court, and imprison his printer. The papal nuncios having laid siege to the young emperor, Charles declared that he would protect the ancient religion; and in some of his hereditary possessions scaffolds were erected, on which the writings of the heretic were reduced to ashes. Princes of the Church and magistrates were present at these autos-da-fé. Aleander was quite elated with his success. "The pope," said he, in imitation of Pricrio, "may dethrone kings! He may, if he chooses, say to the emperor, Thou art only a tanner! He knows well how to bring one or two miserable grammarians to their senses. We will dispose, moreover, of Duke Frederick also." To hear the proud nuncio, one would have said that the pile of Mentz which consumed Luther's books was "le commencement de la fin," (the beginning of the end.) These flames, it was said at Rome, will carry terror into every quarter. Such, in truth, was the effect on many superstitious and timid spirits; but even in the hereditary states of Charles, where alone it was ventured to execute the bull, the people, and even the grandees, often answered these pontifical demonstrations with derision, or expressions of indignation. "Luther," said the doctors of Louvain, on presenting themselves before Margaret, Regent of the Netherlands,— "Luther is subverting the Christian faith." "Who is this Luther?" asked the princess.— "An ignorant monk."—"Well, then," replied she, "do you, who are learned, and in such numbers, write against him. The world will credit a multitude of learned men sooner than an isolated ignorant monk." The doctors of Louvain preferred an easier method. They caused a vast pile to be erected at their own expense. The place of execution was covered with spectators; and students and burghers were seen hastening through the crowd, their arms filled with large volumes, which they threw into the flames. Their zeal edified the monks and doctors; but the trick was afterwards discovered. Instead of the writings of Luther, they had thrown into the fire the "Sermones Discipuli, Tartaret," and other scholastic and popish books.

The Count of Nassau, viceroy of Holland, when the Dominicans were soliciting the favour of burning the doctor's books, said to them: "Go and preach the Gospel as purely as Luther, and you will have nobody to complain of." At a festival, attended by the leading princes of the empire, the reformer having become the subject of conversation, the Baron of Ravenstein said aloud: "In the space of four centuries only one Christian man has dared to lift his head, and the pope is wishing to put him to death."

Luther, conscious of the power of his cause, remained tranquil amid the tumult which the bull had excited. "Did you not urge me so keenly," said he to Spalatin, "I would be silent, well knowing that by the power and counsel of God this work must be accomplished." The timid man was anxious for speech, the strong man wished to be silent. It was because Luther discerned a power not visible to the eyes of his friend. "Be of good courage," continues the reformer; "Christ began these things, and Christ will accomplish them, though I should be put to flight or put to death. Jesus Christ is present here, and more powerful is He who is in us, than he who is in the world."

Decisive Steps by the Reformer—Luther's Appeal to a General Council—Struggle at Close Quarters—The Bull burned by Luther—Meaning of this bold act—Luther in the Academic Chair—Luther against the Pope—New Work by Melancthon—How Luther encourages his Friends—Progress of the Contest—Melancthon's Opinion of the Timid—Luther's Work on the Bible—Doctrine of Grace—Luther's Recantation.

BUT duty obliged him to speak, in order to manifest the truth to the world. Rome has struck, and he will make it known how he receives the blow. The pope has put him under the ban of the Church, and he will put the pope under the ban of Christendom. Up to this hour the pope's word has been omnipotent. Luther will oppose word to word, and the world will know which is the more powerful of the two. "I am desirous," said he, "to set my conscience at rest, by making men aware of the danger to which they are exposed." At the same time he prepares to renew his appeal to an universal council. An appeal from the pope to a council was a crime; and hence the mode in which Luther attempts to justify himself, is a new act of hostility to papal authority.

On the morning of the 17th November, a notary and five witnesses, of whom Cruciger was one, met at ten o'clock, in one of the halls of the Augustine convent in which the doctor resided. There the public officer, Sarcot of Eisleben, having seated himself to draw up the minute of his protest, the reformer, in presence of the witnesses, says, with a solemn tone:—

"Considering that a general council of the Christian Church is above the pope, especially in all that concerns the faith:

"Considering that the power of the pope is not above, but beneath Scripture, and that he has no right to worry the sheep of Christ, and throw them into the wolf's mouth:

"I, Martin Luther, Augustine, doctor of the Holy Scriptures at Wittenberg, do, by this writing, appeal for myself, and for all who shall adhere to me, from the most holy Pope Leo, to a future universal Christian council.

"I appeal from the said Pope Leo, first, as an unjust, rash, tyrannical judge, who condemns me without hearing me, and without explaining the grounds of his judgment; secondly, as a heretic, a strayed, obdurate apostate, condemned by the Holy Scriptures, inasmuch as he ordains me to deny that Christian faith is necessary in the use of the sacraments; thirdly, as an enemy, an antichrist, an adversary, a tyrant of the Holy Scripture, who dares to oppose his own words to all the words of God; fourthly, as a despiser, a calumniator, a blasphemous of the holy Christian Church and a free council, inasmuch as he pretends that a council is nothing in itself.

"Wherefore, I most humbly supplicate the most serene, most illustrious, excellent, generous, noble, brave, sage, and prudent lords, Charles, the Roman emperor, the electors, princes, counts, barons, knights, gentlemen, councillors, towns, and commonalties, throughout Germany, to adhere to my protestation, and join me in resisting the antichristian conduct of the pope, for the glory of God, the defence of the Church, and of Christian doctrine, and the maintenance of free councils in Christendom. Let them do so, and Christ our Lord will richly recompense them by His eternal grace. But if there are any who despise my prayer, and continue to obey that impious man, the pope, rather than God, I, by these presents, shake myself free of the responsibility. Having faithfully warned their consciences, I leave them, as well as the pope, and all his adherents, to the sovereign judgment of God."

Such is Luther's deed of divorce, such his answer to the papal bull. There is great seriousness in this declaration. The accusations which he brings against the pope are very grave, and are not made in a spirit of levity. This protestation spread over Germany, and was sent to the leading courts of Christendom.

Though the step which Luther had just taken seemed the very height of daring, he had a still bolder step in reserve. The monk of Wittenberg will do all that the pope dares to do. The son of the Medicis, and the son of the miner of Mansfeld, have descended into the lists; and in this mortal struggle, which shakes the world, not a blow is given by the one which is not returned by the other. On the 10th December, a notice appeared on the walls of Wittenberg, inviting the professors and students to meet at nine o'clock in the morning, at the east gate, near the holy cross. A great number of teachers and pupils assembled; and Luther, walking at their head, led the procession to the appointed spot. How many faggot piles has Rome kindled in the course of ages! Luther desires to make a better application of the great Roman principle. He only wishes to rid himself of some old papers, and the fire, he thinks, is the fit instrument for that. A scaffold had been prepared. One of the oldest masters of arts applied the torch. At the moment when the flames rose, the redoubtable Augustine, dressed in his frock, was seen to approach the pile, holding in his hands the Canon Law, the Decretals, the Clementines, the Extravagants of the popes, some writings of Eck and Emser, and the papal bull. The Decretals having first been consumed, Luther held up the bull, and saying, "Since thou hast grieved the Lord's Anointed, let the eternal fire grieve and consume thee," threw it into the flames. Never was war declared with more energy and resolution. Luther quietly took the road back to the town, and the crowd of doctors, professors, and students, after a loud cheer, returned with him to Wittenberg. "The Decretals," said Luther, "resemble a body with a head as soft as that of a maiden, limbs as full of violence as those of a lion, and a tail with as many wiles as a serpent. In all the papal laws there is not one word to teach us who Jesus Christ is. My enemies," continues he, "have been able, by burning my books, to injure the truth in the minds of the common people, and therefore I have burnt their books in my turn. A serious struggle has now commenced. Hitherto I have only had child's play with the pope. I began the work in the name of God; it will be terminated without me and by His power. If they burn my books, in which, to speak without vain-glory, there is more of the Gospel than in all the books of the pope, I am entitled, a fortiori, to burn theirs, in which there is nothing good."

Had Luther commenced the Reformation in this way, such a proceeding would doubtless have led to fatal results. Fanaticism would have been able to lay hold of it, and throw the Church into a course of disorder and violence. But the reformer's grave exposition of Scripture had fanned a prelude to his work. The foundations had been wisely laid; and now, the mighty stroke which he had just given, would not only expose him to no hazard, but even accelerate the hour when Christendom would be delivered from her chains.

Thus solemnly did Luther declare his separation from the pope and his church. After his letter to Leo he might think this necessary. He accepted the excommunication which Rome had pronounced. It made the Christian world aware that there was now mortal war between him and the pope. On reaching the shore he burnt his ships, and left himself no alternative but that of advancing to the combat.

Luther had returned to Wittenberg. Next day the academic hall was fuller than usual. Men's minds were excited. A feeling of solemnity prevailed throughout the audience, in expectation of an address from the doctor. He commented on the Psalms,—a task which he had commenced in March of the previous year. Having finished his lecture, he paused a few moments, and then said firmly: "Be on your guard against the laws and statutes of the pope. I have burnt the Decretals, but it is only child's play. It is time, and more than time, to burn the pope. I mean—he instantly resumed—the see of Rome, with all its doctrines and abominations." Then, assuming a more solemn tone, he said: "If you do not with all your heart combat the impious government of the pope, you cannot be saved. Whoever takes pleasure in the religion and worship of the papacy, will be eternally lost in the life to come."

"If we reject it," added he, "we may expect all kinds of dangers, and even the loss of life. But it is far better to run such risks in the world than to be silent! As long as I live I will warn my brethren of the sore and plague of Babylon, lest several who are with us fall back with the others into the abyss of hell."

It is scarcely possible to imagine the effect produced upon the audience by language, the energy of which still makes us wonder. "None of us," adds the candid student to whom we owe the fact, "at least if he be not a block without intelligence, ('as,' adds he in a parenthesis, 'all the papists are,')—none of us doubts that it contains the simple truth. It is evident to all the faithful that Dr. Luther is an angel of the living God, called to feed the long bewildered sheep of Christ with the Divine Word."

This discourse, and the act which crowned it, mark an important epoch in the Reformation. The Leipzig disension had detached Luther inwardly from the pope. But the moment when he burned the bull, was that in which he declared, in the most expressive manner, his entire separation from the Bishop of Rome and his church, and his attachment to the Church universal, as founded by the apostles of Jesus Christ. After three centuries, the fire which he kindled at the east gate is still burning.

"The pope," said he, "has three crowns; and they are these: the first is against God, for he condemns religion,—the second, against the emperor, for he condemns the secular power,—and the third, against society, for he condemns marriage." When he was reproached with inveighing too violently against the papacy, he replied: "Ah! I wish everything I testify against him were a clap of thunder; and every one of my words were a thunderbolt."

This firmness of Luther was communicated to his friends and countrymen. A whole nation rallied round him. The university of Wittenberg, in particular, always became more attached to the hero to whom it owed its importance and renown. Carlstadt raised his voice against "the raging lion of Florence," who tore divine and human laws to pieces, and trampled under foot the principles of eternal truth. At this time Melancthon also addressed the states of the empire, in a writing characterized by his usual elegance and wisdom. It was a reply to a treatise attributed to Emser, but published under the name of Rhadinus, a Roman theologian. Luther himself spoke not more forcibly; and yet there is a grace in Melancthon's words which gives them access to the heart.

After shewing, by passages of Scripture, that the pope is not superior to other bishops; "What prevents us," says he to the states of the empire, "from depriving the pope of the privilege which we have given him? It matters little to Luther that our riches,—i. e., the treasures of Europe, are sent to Rome. But what causes his grief and ours is, that the laws of the pontiffs and the reign of the pope, not only endanger the souls of men but utterly destroy them. Every man can judge for himself, whether or not it suits him to give his money for the maintenance of Roman luxury; but to judge of the things of religion and of sacred mysteries, is beyond the reach of the vulgar. Here, then, Luther implores your faith and zeal; and all pious men implore with him,—some with loud voice, and others with groans and sighs. Remember, princes of the Christian people, that you are Christians; and rescue the sad wrecks of Christianity from the tyranny of Antichrist. You are deceived by those who pretend that you have no authority over priests. The same spirit which animated Jehu against the priests of Baal, urges you, in imitation of that ancient example, to abolish the Roman superstition,—a superstition far more horrible than the idolatry of Baal." So spoke mild Melancthon to the princes of Germany.

Some cries of alarm were heard among the friends of the Reformation. Timid spirits, inclined to excessive moderation,—Staupitz in particular,—expressed the keenest anguish. "Till now," said Luther to him, "the whole affair has been mere sport. You yourself have said: 'Did God not do these things it is impossible they could be done.' The tumult becomes more and more tumultuous, and I do not think it will be quelled before the last day." Such was Luther's mode of encouraging the timid. The tumult has existed for three centuries, and is not quelled!

"The papacy," continued he, "is not now what it was yesterday and the day before. Let it excommunicate and burn my writings; . . . let it kill me!—it cannot arrest what is going forward. Something wonderful is at the door. I burnt the bull in great trembling, but now I experience more joy from it than from any action of my life."

We stop involuntarily, and delight to read in the great soul of Luther all that the future is preparing. "O my father," says he to Staupitz, in concluding, "pray for the Word of God and for me. I am heaved on the billows, and as it were whirled upon them."

War is thus declared on all sides. The combatants have thrown away their scabbards. The Word of God has resumed its rights, and deposes him who had gone the length of usurping God's place. Society is shaken throughout. No period is without egotistical men, who would willingly leave human society in error and corruption; but wise men, even the timid among them, think differently. "We know well," says the mild and moderate Melancthon, "that statesmen have a horror at everything like innovation; and it must be confessed, that in the sad confusion called human life, discord, even that which arises from the best of causes, is always accompanied with evil. Still, it is necessary that in the Church the Word of God take precedence of everything human. God denounces eternal wrath against those who strive to extinguish the truth; and therefore it was a duty incumbent on Luther—a Christian duty, which he could not evade—to rebuke the pernicious errors which disorderly men were circulating with inconceivable effrontery. If discord engenders many evils, (to my great grief I see it does)," adds sage Philip, "it is the fault of those who at the beginning circulated errors, and of those who, filled with diabolic hatred, are seeking at present to maintain them."

All, however, were not of the same opinion. Luther was loaded with reproaches,—the storm burst upon him from all sides. "He is quite alone," said some; "he teaches novelties," said others.

"Who knows," replied Luther, in accordance with the virtue given him from on high,—"who knows if God has not chosen me, and called me; and if they ought not to fear that, in despising me, they may be despising God himself? . . . Moses was alone on coming out of Egypt,—Elijah alone in the time of King Ahab,—Isaiah alone in Jerusalem,—Ezekiel alone at Babylon. . . . God never chose for a prophet either the high priest or any other great personage. He usually chose persons who were low and despised,—on one occasion he even chose a shepherd, (Amos.) At all times the saints have had to rebuke the great—kings, princes, priests, the learned—at the risk of their lives. And under the new dispensation has it not been the same? Ambrose in his day was alone; after him Jerome was alone; later still Augustine was alone. . . . I do not say that I am a prophet; but I say they ought to fear just because I am alone, and they are many. One thing I am sure of, the Word of God is with me, and is not with them.

"It is said also," continues he, "that I advance novelties, and that it is impossible to believe that all other doctors have for so long a period been mistaken.

"No, I do not preach novelties. But I say that all Christian doctrines have disappeared, even among those who ought to have preserved them,—I mean bishops and the learned. I doubt not, however, that the truth has remained in some hearts, should it even have been in infants in the cradle. Poor peasants, mere babes, now understand Jesus Christ better than the pope, the bishops, and the doctors.

"I am accused of rejecting the holy doctors of the Church. I reject them not; but since all those doctors try to prove their writings by Holy Scripture, it must be clearer and more certain than they are. Who thinks of proving an obscure discourse by one still more obscure? Thus, then, necessity constrains us to recur to the Bible, as all the doctors do, and to ask it to decide upon their writings; for the Bible is lord and master.

"But it is said men in power persecute him. And is it not clear from Scripture that persecutors are usually in the wrong, and the persecuted in the right; that the majority are always in favour of falsehood, and the minority in favour of truth? The truth has, at all times, caused clamour."

Luther afterwards reviews the propositions condemned in the bull as heretical, and demonstrates their truth by proofs drawn from Holy Scripture. With what force, in particular, does he now maintain the doctrine of grace!

"What!" says he, "will nature be able, before and without grace, to hate sin, avoid it, and repent of it; while that, even since grace is come, this nature loves sin, seeks it, desires it, and ceases not to combat grace, and to be irritated against it—a fact for which all the saints continually do groan? . . . It is as if it were said that a large tree, which I am unable to bend by exerting my utmost strength, bends of itself on my letting it go; or that a torrent, which walls and dykes cannot arrest, is arrested the instant I leave it to itself.

. . . No, it is not by considering sin and its consequences that we attain to repentance, but by contemplating Jesus Christ, His wounds, and boundless love. The knowledge of sin must result from repentance, and not repentance from the knowledge of sin. Knowledge is the fruit, repentance is the tree. With us the fruit grows upon the tree; but it would seem that, in the states of the holy father, the tree grows upon the fruit."

The courageous doctor, though he protests, also retracts some of his propositions. Surprise will cease when his mode of doing it is known. After quoting the four propositions on indulgences, condemned by the bull, he simply adds:

"In honour of the holy and learned bull, I retract all that I have ever taught touching indulgences. If my books have been justly burned, it must certainly be because I conceded something to the pope in the doctrine of indulgences; wherefore, I myself condemn them to the fire."

He also retracts in regard to John Huss. "I say now, not that some articles, but all the articles of John Huss are Christian throughout. The pope, in condemning Huss, condemned the Gospel. I have done five times more than he, and yet I much fear have not done enough. Huss merely says, that a wicked pope is not a member of Christendom; but I, were St. Peter himself sitting to-day at Rome, would deny that he was pope by the appointment of God."

Coronation of Charles V.—The Nuncio Aleander—Will Luther's Books be burnt?—Aleander and the Emperor—The Nuncios and the Elector—The Son of Duke John pleads for Luther—Luther's Calmness—The Elector protects Luther—Reply to the Nuncios—Erasmus at Cologne—Erasmus with the Elector—Declaration of Erasmus—Advice of Erasmus—System of Charles V.

THE powerful words of the reformer penetrated all minds, and contributed to their emancipation. The sparks of light which each word threw out were communicated to the whole nation. But a great question remained to be solved. Would the prince, in whose states Luther dwelt, favour the execution of the bull, or would he oppose it? The reply seemed doubtful. At that time the elector and all the princes of the empire were at Aix-la-Chapelle, where the crown of Charlemagne was placed upon the head of the youngest, but most powerful monarch of Christendom. Unprecedented pomp and magnificence were displayed in the ceremony. Charles V., Frederick, the princes, ministers, and ambassadors, immediately after repaired to Cologne. Aix-la-Chapelle, where the plague was raging, seemed to empty itself into this ancient town on the banks of the Rhine.

Among the crowd of strangers who pressed into the city, were the two papal nuncios, Marino Caraccioli and Jerome Aleander. Caraccioli, who had previously executed a mission to Maximilian, was appointed to congratulate the new emperor, and confer with him on matters of state. But Rome had become aware that, in order to succeed in extinguishing the Reformation, it was necessary to send into Germany a nuncio specially entrusted with the task, and with a character, address, and activity fitted to accomplish it. Aleander had been selected. This man, who was afterwards decorated with the cardinals' purple, seems to have been of rather an ancient family, and not of Jewish parentage, as has been said. The guilty Borgia called him to Rome to be secretary to his son, the Cæsar, before whose murderous sword all Rome trembled. "Like master like servant," says a historian, who thus compares Aleander to Alexander VI. This judgment seems too severe. After the death of Borgia, Aleander devoted himself to study with new ardour. His skill in Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic, gave him the reputation of being the most learned man of his age. He threw his whole soul into whatever he undertook. The zeal with which he studied languages was not a whit stronger than that which he displayed in persecuting the Reformation. Leo X. took him into his service. Protestant historians speak of his epicurean habits—Roman historians of the integrity of his life. He seems to have been fond of luxury, show, and amusement. "Aleander," says his old friend Erasmus, "lived in Venice, in high office, but in low epicureanism." He is admitted to have been violent in temper, prompt in action, full of ardour, indefatigable, imperious, and devoted to the pope. Eck is the blistering, intrepid champion of the school,—Aleander the proud ambassador of the arrogant court of the pontiffs. He seemed formed to be a nuncio.

Rome had made every preparation to destroy the monk of Wittenberg. The duty of assisting at the coronation of the emperor, as representative of the pope, was to Aleander only a secondary mission, fitted to facilitate his task by the respect which it secured to him. The essential part of his commission was to dispose Charles to crush the growing Reformation. In putting the bull into the hands of the emperor, the nuncio had thus addressed him: "The pope, who has succeeded with so many great princes, will have little difficulty in bringing three grammarians to order." By these, he meant Luther, Melancthon, and Erasmus. Erasmus was present at this audience.

No sooner had Aleander arrived at Cologne, than he proceeded, in concert with Caraccioli, to put everything in train for burning Luther's heretical writings throughout the empire; but more especially under the eyes of the princes of Germany, who were then assembled. Charles V. had already consented to its being done in his hereditary states. The minds of men were greatly agitated. "Such measures," it was said to the ministers of Charles, and to the nuncios themselves, "far from curing the evil, will only make it worse. Do you imagine that the doctrine of Luther exists only in the books which you throw into the flames? It is written where you cannot reach it—on the hearts of the population. If you will employ force, it must be that of innumerable swords, drawn to massacre an immense multitude. Some billets of wood, collected for the purpose of consuming some bits of paper, will do nothing; such weapons become not the dignity either of the emperor or the pontiff." The nuncio defended his faggot piles. "These flames," said he, "are a sentence of condemnation written in gigantic letters, and understood alike by those who are near, and those who are at a distance, by the learned and the ignorant, by those even who cannot read."

But, in reality, the nuncio's efforts were directed not against papers and books, but Luther himself. "These flames," resumed he, "are not sufficient to purify the infected air of Germany. If they deter the simple, they do not correct the wicked. The thing wanted is an edict from the emperor against Luther's head."

Aleander did not find the emperor so complying on the subject of the reformer's person, as on that of his books.

"Having just ascended the throne," said he to Aleander, "I cannot, without the advice of my councillors, and the consent of the princes, strike such a blow at an immense faction, surrounded by such powerful defenders. Let us first know what our father, the Elector of Saxony, thinks of the affair; after that, we shall see what answer to give to the pope." On the elector, therefore, the nuncios proceeded to try their wiles and the power of their eloquence.

On the first Sunday of November, after Frederick had attended mass in the convent of the Cordeliers, Caraccioli and Aleander requested an audience. He received them in the presence of the Bishop of Trent, and several of his councillors. Caraccioli first presented the papal brief. Milder than Aleander, he thought it best to gain the elector by flattery, and began to laud him and his ancestors. "In you," said he, "we hope for the salvation of the Roman Church and the Roman empire."

But the impetuous Aleander, wishing to come to the point, came briskly forward, and interrupted his colleague, who modestly gave way to him. "It is to me," said he, "and Eck, that Martin's affair has been entrusted. See the immense perils to which this man exposes the Christian commonwealth. If a remedy is not speedily applied the empire is destroyed. What ruined the Greeks if it was not their abandonment of the pope? You cannot remain united to Luther without separating from Jesus Christ. In the name of his holiness, I ask of you two things: first, to burn the writings of Luther; secondly, to punish him according to his demerits, or at least to give him up a prisoner to the pope. The emperor, and all the princes of the empire, have declared their readiness to accede to our demands; you alone still hesitate."

Frederick replied, by the intervention of the Bishop of Trent: "This affair is too grave to be decided on the spur of the moment. We will acquaint you with our resolution."

Frederick's position was difficult. What course will he adopt? On the one side are the emperor, the princes of the empire, and the chief pontiff of Christendom, from whose authority the elector has as yet no thought of withdrawing; on the other, a monk, a feeble monk; for his person is all that is asked. The reign of the emperor has just commenced, and will discord be thrown into the empire by Frederick, the oldest and the wisest of all the princes of Germany? Besides, can he renounce that piety which led him as far as the sepulchre of Christ?

Other voices were then heard. John Frederick, son of Duke John, and nephew of Frederick, the pupil of Spalatin, a young prince, seventeen years of age, who afterwards wore the electoral crown, and whose reign was marked by great misfortunes, had been inspired with a heartfelt love of the truth, and was strongly attached to Luther. When he saw him struck with the anathemas of Rome, he embraced his cause with the warmth of a young Christian and a young prince. He wrote to the doctor, he wrote also to his uncle, soliciting him to protect Luther against his enemies. At the same time, Spalatin, though indeed he was often very desponding, Pontanus, and the other councillors who were with the elector at Cologne, represented to him that he could not abandon the reformer.

Amid the general agitation only one man remained tranquil—that man was Luther. While others were trying to save him by the influence of the great, the monk, in his cloister at Wittenberg, thought that the great stood more in need of being saved by him. Writing to Spalatin, he says: "If the Gospel was of a nature to be propagated or maintained by the power of the world, God would not have entrusted it to fishermen. To defend the Gospel appertains not to the princes and pontiffs of this world. They have enough to do to shelter themselves from the judgments of the Lord and His Anointed. If I speak, I do it in order that they may obtain the knowledge of the Divine Word, and be saved by it."

Luther's expectation was not to be deceived. The faith which a convent of Wittenberg contained exercised its influence in the palaces of Cologne. The heart of Frederick, shaken, perhaps, for an instant, became gradually stronger. He was indignant that the pope, notwithstanding of urgent entreaties to investigate the matter in Germany, had condemned it at Rome, on the demand of the reformer's personal enemy; and that in his absence that enemy should have dared to publish in Saxony a bull which threatened the existence of the university and the peace of his people. Besides, the elector was convinced that Luther had been wronged. He shuddered at the thought of delivering an innocent man into the cruel hands of his enemies. Justice, rather than the pope,—such was the rule he adopted. He resolved not to yield to Rome. On the 4th November, when the Bishop of Trent, his councillors announced to them, on the part of the elector, that he was much grieved to see how Doctor Eck had taken the opportunity of his absence to involve in condemnation several persons not adverted to in the bull,—that it might be that, since his departure, an immense number of the learned and the ignorant, the clergy and the laity, had united in adhering to the cause and the appeal of Luther,—that neither his imperial majesty, nor any person, had shewn him that the writings of Luther had been refuted, and that the only thing now necessary was to throw them into the fire,—that he, moreover, demanded a safe conduct for Doctor Luther, to enable him to appear before learned, pious, and important judges.

After this declaration, Aleander, Caraccioli, and their suite, retired to deliberate. It was the first time the elector had publicly declared his intentions with regard to the reformer. The nuncios had anticipated a very different result. "Now," thought they, "that the elector, by persisting in playing his part of impartiality, would expose himself to dangers, the full extent of which cannot be foreseen, he will not hesitate to sacrifice the monk." So Rome had reasoned. But her schemes were destined to fail before a power to which she had not adverted—the love of justice and truth.

When again before the elector's councillors, "I would fain know," said the imperious Alexander, "what the elector would think, were one of his subjects to choose the King of France, or some other foreign prince for judge?" Seeing at length that the Saxon councillors were not to be shaken, he said: "We will execute the bull; we will prosecute and burn the writings of Luther. As to his person," added he, affecting a disdainful indifference, "the pope has no anxiety to dip his hand in the blood of the wretch."

News of the reply which the elector had given to the nuncios having reached Wittenberg, Luther's friends were overjoyed. Melancthon and Amsdorff, in particular, cherished the most flattering hopes. "The German nobility," said Melancthon, "will shape their course by the example of a prince which they follow in everything as their nestor. If Homer called his hero 'the wall of the Greeks,' why should not Frederick be called 'the wall of the Germans?'"

Erasmus—the oracle of courts, the torch of the schools, the light of the world—was then at Cologne, having been invited thither by several princes who wished to consult him. At the period of the Reformation, Erasmus was at the head of the true middle (juste milieu) party,—at least he thought he was, but erroneously; for when truth and error are in presence of each other, the right side is not the middle. He was the chief of that philosophical and university party which had for ages aspired to correct Rome, without being able to do so; he was the representative of human wisdom; but this wisdom was too weak to repress the arrogance of the papacy. The wisdom of God was necessary—that wisdom which the world often calls folly, but at the bidding of which mountains are crushed. Erasmus was unwilling either to throw himself into the arms of Luther, or to seat himself at the feet of the pope. He hesitated, and often vibrated between these two powers, sometimes attracted towards Luther, and then suddenly repelled towards the pope. He had declared for Luther in a letter to the Archbishop of Mentz, in which he had said: "The last spark of Christian piety seems ready to be extinguished. It is this that has moved Luther's heart; he cares neither for money nor honour." The publication of this letter by the imprudent Ulrich von Hütten, subjected Erasmus to so much annoyance, that he resolved to act with more prudence in future. Besides, he was accused of being in concert with Luther, whose unguarded speeches, moreover, offended him. "Almost all good people," said he, "are for Luther; but I see that we are on the high way to a revolt. I would not have my name coupled with his. It hurts me, and does him no good." "Be it so," replied Luther, "since it pains you, I promise never to mention your name, nor that of any of your friends." Such was the man to whom both the enemies and the friends of the reformer applied.

The elector, aware that the opinion of a man so much respected as Erasmus would carry great weight, invited the illustrious Dutchman to come to him. Erasmus complied. This was on the 5th of December. The friends of Luther saw this step not without secret apprehension. The elector was sitting before the fire, with Spalatin beside him, when Erasmus was introduced. "What think you of Luther?" immediately asked Frederick. The prudent Erasmus, surprised at the direct question, at first tried to evade it. He twisted his mouth, bit his lips, and said nothing. Then the elector, opening his eyes, (says Spalatin,) as he was wont to do when speaking to persons from whom he wished a precise answer, looked piercingly at Erasmus, who, not knowing how to disembarass himself, at last said, half in jest: "Luther has committed two great faults; he has attacked the pope's crown and the monks' belly." The elector smiled, but gave Erasmus to understand that he was in earnest. Then Erasmus, laying aside his reserve, said: "The source of all this dispute is the hatred of the monks against letters, and the fear they have of seeing an end put to their tyranny. What have they put in operation against Luther? Clamour, cabal, hatred, libels. The more virtuous and the more attached to the doctrines of the Gospel a man is, the less is he opposed to Luther. The harshness of the bull has excited the indignation of all good men; and nobody has been able to discover in it the meekness of a vicar of Jesus Christ. Out of so many universities, two only have attacked Luther; and even these have only condemned, not convicted him. Let not people deceive themselves; the danger is greater than some suppose. Things difficult and arduous are at hand. . . . To begin the reign of Charles with an act so hateful as the imprisonment of Luther, would be of sad augury. The world is thirsting for evangelical truth. Let us beware of culpably resisting it. Let the affair be examined by grave men of sound judgment; this would be more accordant with the dignity of the pope himself."

Thus spoke Erasmus to the elector. The reader will, perhaps, be astonished at his frankness; but Erasmus knew to whom he was speaking. Spalatin was delighted; and going out with Erasmus, accompanied him as far as the house of the Count of Nuemar, provost of Cologne, where the illustrious scholar was residing. Erasmus, in a fit of frankness, went into his room, took up the pen and wrote down the substance of what he had said to the elector, and gave it to Spalatin. But fear of Alexander soon took possession of the timid Erasmus; the courage which he had felt in the presence of the elector and his chaplain vanished; and he begged Spalatin to send back his too bold writing, lest it should fall into the hands of the terrible nuncio. It was too late.

The elector, feeling strong in the opinion of Erasmus, spoke in more decided terms to the emperor. Erasmus himself strove in nocturnal conferences, like Nicodemus of old, to persuade the councillors of Charles that it was necessary to remit the whole affair to impartial judges. Perhaps he had some hope of being named arbiter in this cause, which threatened to divide the Christian world. His vanity would have been flattered by the office. But, at the same time, not to lose himself at Rome, he wrote the most submissive letters to Leo, who replied in kind terms, and thereby put poor Aleander to the torture. From love to the pope, he could have sharply rebuked the pope. Erasmus communicated the pontiff's letters, because they added to his credit. The nuncio made a complaint at Rome. "Pretend," was the answer, "that you do not observe the naughtiness of that man. Prudence requires it—it is necessary to leave the door open for repentance."

Charles V. himself embraced a vacillating system, which consisted in flattering both the pope and the elector; and in seeming to incline alternately towards the one or the other, according to the wants of the moment. One of his ministers, whom he had sent to Rome on certain Spanish matters, had arrived at the very time when Eck was loudly prosecuting Luther's condemnation. The wily ambassador instantly saw the advantages which his master might derive from the Saxon monk, and on the 12th May, 1520, wrote the emperor, who was still in Spain: "Your Majesty should go into Germany, and there show some favour to one Martin Luther, who is at the court of Saxony, and, by his discourses, is giving much uneasiness to the court of Rome." Such, at the outset, was the light in which Charles viewed the matter. His object was not to know on which side truth or error lay, or to ascertain what the great interest of Germany demanded. What does policy require, and by what means can the pope be induced to support the emperor? This was the whole question, and at Rome was well known to be so. The ministers of Charles gave Aleander a hint of the plan which their master meant to follow. "The emperor," said they, "will act towards the pope as the pope acts towards the emperor; for he cares not to increase the power of his rivals, and, in particular, of the King of France." At these words the imperious nuncio gave vent to his indignation: "What!" replied he, "even should the pope abandon the emperor, must the emperor abandon religion? If Charles means thus to take his revenge, . . . let him tremble! This unprincipled course will turn against himself." The imperial diplomatists were not moved by the menaces of the nuncio.

CHAPTER XII.

Luther on Confession—True Absolution—Antichrist—Rally around Luther—Satires—Ulrich von Hutten—Lucas Cranach—The Carnival at Wittenberg—Stantz Intimidated—Luther's Labours—Luther's Humility—Progress of the Reformation.

If the legates of Rome failed with the mighty of the world, the inferior agents of the papacy succeeded in producing disturbance among the weak. The militia of Rome had heard the command of their chief. Fanatical priests employed the bull in alarming consciences; and honest, but ill-informed, ecclesiastics regarded it as a sacred duty to act conformably to the instructions of the pope. Luther had begun his struggle against Rome in the confessional, and in the confessional Rome gave battle to the adherents of the reformer. The bull, though openly contemned by the nation, became powerful in these solitary tribunals. "Have you read the writings of Luther?" demanded the confessors; "do you possess them? do you regard them as sound, or as heretical?" If the penitent hesitated to pronounce the anathema, the priest refused him absolution. Several consciences were troubled. The people were strongly agitated. This skillful manœuvre promised to restore to the papal yoke whole districts already gained to the Gospel. Rome congratulated herself on having, in the thirteenth century, erected a tribunal destined to bring the free consciences of Christians under subjection to the priests. While it continues in force her reign is not ended.

Luther became aware of these circumstances. Single-handed what will he do to defeat the manœuvre? The Word—the Word uttered loudly and boldly: such is his weapon. The Word will search out these alarmed consciences, these frightened souls, and strengthen them. A powerful impulse was required; and Luther's voice was heard addressing penitents with heroic boldness; and a noble disregard of all secondary considerations. "When you are asked," says he, "whether or not you approve my books, answer, 'You are a confessor; and not an inquisitor or a gaoler. My duty is to confess what my conscience dictates; yours not to probe and discover the secrets of my heart. Give me absolution, and thereafter dispute with Luther, the pope, and whomsoever you please; but do not connect the sacrament of peace with strife and combat.' If the confessor will not yield, then," continues Luther, "I would rather dispute with his absolution. Give yourself no uneasiness; if man will not absolve you, God will absolve you. Rejoice in that you are absolved by God himself; and present yourself without fear at the sacrament of the altar. The priest will have to account at the final judgment for the absolution which he shall have refused you. They may indeed refuse us the sacrament; but they cannot deprive us of the strength and grace which God has attached to it. God has placed salvation neither in their will nor in their power; but in our faith. Leave their sacrament, altar, priest, church: the Word of God condemned in the bull is more than all these things. The soul can dispense with the sacrament; but cannot live without the Word. Christ, the true Bishop, will himself undertake to nourish you spiritually."

Thus Luther's voice found its way into families, and alarmed consciences, imparting to them courage and faith. But it was not enough for him merely to defend himself; he felt it his duty to attack and return blow for blow. Ambrose Catherinns, a Roman theologian, had written against him. "I will stir up the bile of the Italian beast," said Luther; and he kept his word. In his reply, he proved, by the revelations of Daniel and St. John, by the epistles of St. Paul, St. Peter, and St. Jude, that the reign of Antichrist, predicted and described in the Bible, was the papacy. "I know for certain," says he in conclusion, "that our Lord Jesus Christ lives and reigns. Strong in this assurance, I would not fear several thousands of popes. May God at length visit you according to His infinite power, and cause the day of the glorious advent of His Son to shine,—that day in which He will destroy the wicked. And let all the people say, Amen!"

And all the people did say, Amen! A holy fear took possession of men's souls. They saw Antichrist seated on the pontifical throne. This new idea—an idea which derived great force from the prophetic description—being thrown by Luther into the midst of his age, gave Rome a dreadful shock. Faith in the Divine Word was substituted for that which, till then, the Church alone had obtained; and the power of the pope, which had long been adored by the people, became the object of their hatred and terror.

Germany replied to the papal bull by surrounding Luther with acclamation. The plague was in Wittenberg, and yet arrivals of new students daily took place; while from four to six hundred pupils regularly took their seats in the academic halls at the feet of Luther and Melancthon. The church of the convent and the town church were too small for the crowds eager to hear the words of the reformer. The prior of the Augustines was in terror lest these churches should give way under the pressure of the audience. But the movement was not confined within the walls of Wittenberg: it extended over Germany. Letters full of consolation and faith, from princes, noble and learned men, reached Luther from all quarters. He shewed the chaplain more than thirty of them.

One day the Margrave of Brandenburg, with several other princes, arrived at Wittenberg to visit Luther. "They wished to see the man," said the Margrave. In fact, all wished to see the man whose word alarmed the pope, and caused the pontiff of the West to totter on his throne.

The enthusiasm of Luther's friends increased from day to day. "Unparalleled folly of Emser!" exclaimed Melancthon, "to presume to measure weapons with our Hercules,—overlooking the finger of God in the actions of Luther, as the King of Egypt overlooked it in the hand of Moses." The mild Melancthon found strong expressions to excite those who seemed to him to retrograde or remain stationary. "Luther has stood up for the truth," wrote he to John Hess, "and yet you keep silence. He still breathes, he still prospers, though Leo is indignant, and roars with rage. Remember, it is impossible for Roman impiety to approve of the Gospel. How should this unhappy age be without its Judases, Caiaphases, Pilates, and Herods? Arm yourself, then, with the power of the Word of God against such adversaries."

All the writings of Luther, his Lord's Prayer, and especially a new edition of the German theology, were eagerly devoured. Reading societies were formed, for the purpose of procuring his works for the use of the members. Friends made new impressions of them, and circulated them by means of hawkers. They were also recommended from pulpits. A German church was demanded, one in which no dignity should in future be conferred on any one who was not able to preach to the people in German; and the German bishops of which should everywhere oppose the papal power.

Moreover, cutting satires, directed against the leading ultramontanists, were circulated throughout the provinces of the empire. The opposition united all its forces around this new doctrine, which give it precisely what it wanted, by justifying it in regard to religion. The greater part of the lawyers, weary of the quirks of the ecclesiastical tribunals, attached themselves to the Reformation; but its cause was keenly embraced, above all, by the Humanists. Ulrich von Hütten was indefatigable. He wrote letters to Luther, to the legates, and the leading men of Germany. "I tell you, and tell you again, O Marimus!" said he to the legate, Caraccioli, in one of his publications, "the mists with which you blinded us are cleared away—the Gospel is preached—the truth proclaimed—the absurdities of Rome treated with contempt—your ordinances languish and die—liberty begins."

Not contenting himself with prose, Hütten had recourse to verse also. He published his "Cry on the Burning by Luther." Appealing to Jesus Christ, he prayed Him to consume, with the brightness of His countenance, those who dared to deny His power. He began, moreover, to write in German. "Hitherto," said he, "I have written in Latin, a language which all could not comprehend; but now I address myself to my country." His German rhymes laid open, and enabled the people to read, the shameful and voluminous record of the sins of the Roman Court. But Hütten was unwilling to confine himself to mere words; he was impatient to bring his sword into the struggle; for he thought that by the swords and halberds of the many valiant warriors, of which Germany was proud, the vengeance of God was to be accomplished. Luther opposed his infatuated projects. "I would not," said he, "that men should fight for the Gospel by violence and carnage. I have written so to Hütten."

The celebrated painter, Lucas Cranaach, published, under the title of the "Passion of Christ and Antichrist," engravings which represented, on the one hand, the splendour and magnificence of the pope, and on the other, the humility and sufferings of the Redeemer. Luther wrote the inscriptions. These engravings, executed with great spirit, produced an astonishing effect. The people withdrew from a church which appeared so opposed to the spirit of its Founder. "This work," said Luther, "is excellent for the laity."

Several, in opposing the papacy, had recourse to arms, which ill accorded with the holiness of the Christian life. Emser, in replying to Luther's tract, entitled, "To the Goat of Leipsic," had published one entitled, "To the Bull of Wittenberg." The name was not ill chosen. But at Magdeburg, Emser's book was hung on the gallows, with this inscription: "The book is worthy of the place;" and a rod was placed beside it, to indicate the punishment which the author deserved. At Doebelin, there was written under the papal bull, in derision of its impotent thunders, "The nest is here, but the birds are flown."

At Wittenberg, the students, taking advantage of the carnival, clothed one of their number in a dress resembling that of the pope, and paraded him through the streets "pomposely, but rather too ludicrously," says Luther. On arriving at the public square, they went down to the banks of the river; and some of them, feigning a sudden attack, seemed to wish to throw the pope into the water; but the pope, having no liking for such a bath, took to his heels. His cardinals, bishops, and familiars, followed his example, dispersing over all the quarters of the town, while the students continued to pursue them. There was not a corner of Wittemberg where some Roman dignitary did not flee before the shouts and laughter of the inhabitants, who were all in motion. "The enemy of Christ," says Luther, "who sports both with kings and with Christ himself, well deserves to be thus sported with." In this we think him in error. Truth is too beautiful, and ought never to be made to walk through the mire. She ought to fight without such auxiliaries as songs, caricatures, and carnival frolics. It may be, that without these popular demonstrations her success would be less apparent; but it would be more pure, and consequently more durable. Be this as it may, the imprudent and passionate conduct of the court of Rome had excited universal antipathy; and the bull, by which the papacy thought to stifle everything, was itself the cause of general revolt.

Still the reformer's whole course was not one of exultation and triumph. Behind the car in which he was drawn by his zealous countrymen, transported with admiration, there was not wanting the slave appointed to remind him of his faulty. Some of his friends seemed disposed to call a halt. Staupitz, whom he called his father, seemed shaken. The pope had accused him, and Staupitz had declared his readiness to submit to the judgment of his holiness. "I fear," said Luther to him, "that in accepting the pope for judge, you will seem to throw off me and the doctrines which I have maintained. If Christ loves you, He will constrain you to retract your letter. Christ is condemned, spoiled, blasphemed; it is time not to fear, but to cry aloud. Wherefore, while you exhort me to humility, I exhort you to pride; for you have too much humility, just as I have too much of its opposite. I shall be called proud and avaricious, an adulterer, a murderer, an antipope, a man guilty of all crimes. It matters not, so long as they cannot accuse me of having kept an impious silence at the moment when the Lord was grieved, and said: I looked on my right hand, and beheld, but there was no man that would know me. (Ps. cxlii. 4.) The Word of Jesus Christ is not a Word of peace, but a sword. If you will not follow Jesus Christ, I will walk alone, advance alone, and gain the day."

Thus Luther, like the commander of an army, kept an eye on the whole field of battle; and while he urged fresh troops forward into the thickest of the fight, marked those who appeared faint-hearted, and recalled them to their post. His exhortations were everywhere heard. His letters rapidly succeeded each other. Three presses were constantly employed in multiplying his writings. His words had free course among the people, strengthened consciences which the confessionals had alarmed, raised up those ready to faint in convents, and maintained the rights of truth in the palaces of princes.

"Amid the tempests which assail me," wrote he to the elector, "I always hoped I would one day find peace. But I now see it was only a man's thought. Day after day the wave is rising, and I already stand in the midst of the ocean. The tempest breaks loose with fearful roar. With one hand I grasp the sword, and with the other build up the walls of Zion. Her ancient links are snapt asunder, broken by the hand which darted the thunders of excommunication against her." "Excommunicated by the bull," says he, "I am loosed from the authority of the pope and monastic laws. With joy I embrace the deliverance. But I lay aside neither the habit of the order nor the convent." And yet, amidst all this agitation, he never loses sight of the dangers by which his own soul is beset during the strife. He feels the necessity of keeping a watch upon himself. "You do well to pray for me," wrote he to Pellican, who was living at Bale. "I cannot devote enough of time to holy exercises. My life is a cross. You do well to exhort me to modesty. I feel the want of it; but I am not my own master; I know not what spirit rules me. I wish ill to nobody; but my enemies press me with such fury, that I am not sufficiently on my guard against the seductions of Satan. Pray, then, for me."

Thus both the reformer and the Reformation hastened on in the direction in which God called them. The movement extended. Men who might have been expected to be most faithful to the hierarchy, began to be shaken. "Even those," says Eck, ingeniously enough, "who hold of the pope the best benefices and the richest canonries, remain mute as fishes. Several among them even extol Luther as a man filled with the Spirit of God, and call the defenders of the pope sophists and flatterers." The Church, apparently great in power, supported by the treasures, the powers, and the armies of the world, but in reality emaciated and enfeebled, without love to God, without Christian life, without enthusiasm for the truth, found herself in presence of men, simple, but bold; men who, knowing that God is with those who combat for His Word, had no doubt of victory. Every age has experienced how powerful an idea is in penetrating the masses, in arousing nations, and, if need be, hurrying thousands to the field of battle, and to death; but if such is the influence of a human idea, what must be the power of an idea sent down from heaven when God opens the door of the human heart! The world has not often seen such a power in operation. It did see it, however, in the first days of Christianity, and in those of the Reformation; and it will see it in days yet to come. Men who disdained the world's wealth and grandeur, and were contented to lead a life of pain and poverty, began to move in behalf of the holiest thing upon the earth—the doctrine of faith and of grace. In this heaving of society all the religious elements were brought into operation, and the fire of enthusiasm hurried men boldly forward into a new life, an epoch of renovation, which had just opened so majestically, and towards which Providence was hastening the nations.

BOOK VII.

THE DIET OF WORMS—(JANUARY TO MAY) 1521.

CHAPTER I.

Conquests by the Word of God—The Diet of Worms—Difficulties—Charles Demands Luther—The Elector to Charles—State of Men's Minds—Alexander's Alarm—The Elector sets out without Luther—Alexander Awakens Rome—Excommunication of the Pope, and Communion with Christ—Fulmination of the Bull—Luther's Motives in the Reformation.

THE Reformation, which commenced with the struggles of an humble soul in the cell of a convent at Erfurt, had never ceased to advance. An obscure individual, with the Word of life in his hand, had stood erect in presence of worldly grandeur, and made it tremble. This Word he had opposed, first, to Tetzel and his numerous host; and these avaricious merchants, after a momentary resistance, had taken flight. Next, he had opposed it to the legate of Rome at Augsburg; and the legate, paralyzed, had allowed his prey to escape. At a later period he had opposed it to the champions of learning in the halls of Leipsic; and the astonished theologians had seen their syllogistic weapons broken to pieces in their hands. At last he had opposed it to the pope, who, disturbed in his sleep, had risen up upon his throne, and thundered at the troublesome monk; but the whole power of the head of Christendom this Word had paralyzed. The Word had still a last struggle to maintain. It behaved to triumph over the emperor of the West, over the kings and princes of the earth; and then, victorious over all the powers of the world, take its place in the Church, to reign in it as the pure Word of God.

The whole kingdom was agitated. Princes and nobles, knights and citizens, clergy and laity, town and country, all were engrossed. A mighty religious revolution, of which God himself was the prime mover, but which was also deeply rooted in the minds of the people, was threatening to overthrow the long venerated head of the Roman hierarchy. A new generation, of a grave, profound, active, and energetic spirit, filled the universities, towns, courts, and castles, the rural districts, and not infrequently cloisters also. The feeling that a great social transformation was at hand, animated all minds with holy enthusiasm. In what relation will the new emperor stand to this movement of the age? and what will be the issue of the mighty impulse, by which all feel that they are borne along?

A solemn diet was about to be opened. It was the first imperial assembly over which the youthful Charles was to preside. Nuremberg, where, in virtue of the Golden Bull, it ought to have been held, being desolated by the plague, it had been summoned to meet at Worms, on the 6th of January, 1521. Never had a diet been attended by so many princes. All desired to be present at this first act of the government of the young emperor, and to make a display of their power.

Among others, the young Landgrave, Philip of Hesse, who was afterwards to play so important a part in the Reformation, arrived at Worms in the middle of January, with six hundred cavaliers, among them men of renowned valour.

But there was a still more powerful motive which induced the electors, dukes, archbishops, landgraves, margraves, bishops, barons, and lords of the empire, as well as the deputies of towns, and the ambassadors of the kings of Christendom, at this moment, to throng the roads leading to Worms with their brilliant equipages. It had been announced that the diet would be occupied with the nomination of a council of regency to govern the empire during the absence of Charles, with the jurisdiction of the imperial chamber, and other important questions. But the public attention was particularly directed to another matter, which the emperor had also mentioned in his letter convening the diet,—viz., the Reformation. The great interests of politics trembled before the cause of the monk of Wittenberg. This cause was the principal subject of conversation among all personages who arrived at Worms.

Everything announced that the diet would be difficult and stormy. Charles, scarcely twenty years of age, pale and sickly, yet as skilful as any one in the graceful management of his horse and in breaking a lance, of a character imperfectly developed, and with a grave and melancholy, but still benevolent expression of countenance, gave no proof, as yet, of distinguished talent, and seemed not to have adopted a decided course. The able and active William of Croi, lord of Chièvres, who was his grand chamberlain, his governor, and prime minister, and possessed absolute authority at the court, died at Worms. Numerous ambitious projects were competing with each other. Many passions were in collision. The Spaniards and Belgians were eager to insinuate themselves into the councils of the young prince. The nuncios multiplied their intrigues, while the princes of Germany spoke out boldly. A struggle might have been foreseen, yet a struggle in which the principal part would be performed by the secret movements of factions.

Charles opened the diet on the 28th of January, 1521, being the festival of Charlemagne. He had a high idea of the importance of the imperial dignity. In his opening address he said, that no monarch could be compared to the Roman empire, to which of old almost the whole world had been subject; that, unhappily, the empire was now only the shadow of what it had been; but that he hoped, by means of his kingdoms and powerful alliances, to re-establish it in its ancient glory.

But numerous difficulties immediately presented themselves to the young emperor. How will he act, placed.

as he is, between the papal nuncio and the elector, to whom he owes his crown? How can he avoid dissatisfying Aleander or Frederick? The former urged the emperor to execute the papal bull, and the latter begged him to undertake nothing against the monk without giving him a hearing. Wishing to please these two opposite parties, the young prince, during a sojourn at Oppenheim, had written to the elector to bring Luther to the diet, assuring him that no injustice would be done him, that he would meet with no violence, and that learned men would confer with him.

This letter of Charles, accompanied by letters from Chièvres and the Count of Nassau, threw the elector into great perplexity. An alliance with the pope might at any instant become necessary to the young and ambitious emperor, and in that case it was all over with Luther. Frederick, by taking the reformer to Worms, was, perhaps, taking him to the scaffold; and yet the orders of Charles were express. The elector ordered Spalatin to acquaint Luther with the letters which he had received. "The enemy," said the chaplain to him, "is putting everything in operation to hasten on the affair."

Luther's friends trembled, but he trembled not. He was then in very feeble health; no matter. "If I cannot go to Worms in health," replied he to the elector, "I will make myself be carried; since the emperor calls me, I cannot doubt but it is a call from God himself. If they mean to employ violence against me, as is probable, (for assuredly it is not with a view to their own instruction that they make me appear,) I leave the matter in the hands of the Lord. He who preserved the three young men in the furnace, still lives and reigns. If He is not pleased to save me, my life is but a small matter; only let us not allow the Gospel to be exposed to the derision of the wicked, and let us shed our blood for it sooner than permit them to triumph. Whether would my life or my death contribute most to the general safety? It is not for us to decide. Let us only pray to God that our young emperor may not commence his reign with dipping his hands in my blood; I would far rather perish by the sword of the Romans. You know what judgments befel the Emperor Sigismund after the murder of John Huss. Expect everything of me save flight and recantation; I cannot fly, still less can I recant."

Before receiving this letter from Luther, the elector had taken his resolution. As he was advancing in the knowledge of the Gospel, he began to be more decided in his measures. Seeing that the conference of Worms could not have a happy result, he wrote to the emperor: "It seems to me difficult to bring Luther with me to Worms; relieve me from the task. Besides, I have never wished to take his doctrine under my protection; but only to prevent him from being condemned without a hearing. The legates, without waiting for your orders, have proceeded to take a step, insulting both to Luther and to me; and I much fear, that in this way they have hurried him on to an imprudent act, which might expose him to great danger were he to appear at the diet." The elector alluded to the pile which had consumed the papal bull.

But the rumour of Luther's journey to Worms had already spread. Men eager for novelty rejoiced at it.

The emperor's courtiers were alarmed; but no one felt so indignant as the papal legate. Aleander, on his journey, had seen how deep an impression the Gospel which Luther preached had made on all classes of society. Literary men, lawyers, nobles, the lower clergy, the regular orders, and the people, were gained to the Reformation. These friends of the new doctrine carried their heads erect, and were bold in their language; while fear and terror froze the partizans of Rome. The papacy still stood; but its props were shaking. A noise of devastation was already heard, somewhat resembling the creaking which takes place at the time when a mountain begins to slip.

Aleander, during his journey to Worms, was sadly annoyed. When he had to dine or sleep, neither literary men, nor nobles, nor priests, even among the supposed friends of the pope, durst receive him; and the proud nuncio was obliged to seek an asylum in taverns of the lowest class. He was thus in terror, and had no doubt that his life was in great danger. In this way he arrived at Worms; and thenceforth to his Roman fanaticism was added resentment for the personal injuries which he had received. He immediately put every means in operation to prevent the audacious compearance of the redoubtable Luther. "Would it not be scandalous," said he, "to see laics re-investigating a cause which the pope had already condemned?" Nothing alarms a Roman courtier so much as an investigation; and, moreover, an investigation to take place in Germany, and not at Rome. How humiliating even should Luther's condemnation be unanimously decided! And it was not even certain that such would be the result. Will not the powerful word of Luther, which has already done such havoc, involve many princes and nobles in inevitable ruin? Aleander, when before Charles, insisted, implored, threatened, and spoke out as nuncio of the head of the Church. Charles yielded; and wrote to the elector, that the time granted to Luther having already elapsed, the monk was under papal excommunication; and that, therefore, unless he were willing to retract his writings, Frederick must leave him at Wittemberg. Frederick had already quitted Saxony without Luther. "I pray the Lord to be favourable to our elector," were the words of Melancthon on seeing him depart; "on him our hopes of the restoration of Christendom repose. His enemies dare everything, καὶ πάντα λίθον κυρσομένους; but God will bring to nought the counsel of Abithophel. As for us, let us do our part in the combat by our lessons and our prayers." Luther was deeply grieved at being prohibited to appear at Worms.

Aleander did not consider it enough that Luther should not come to Worms—he wished him to be condemned. Returning incessantly to the charge before the princes, prelates, and different members of the diet, he accused the Augustine monk not only of disobedience and heresy, but also of sedition, rebellion, impiety, and blasphemy. The very accent in which he spoke betrayed the passions by which he was actuated; so that men exclaimed, It is hatred and love of vengeance, rather than zeal and piety, that excite him. However frequent, however vehement his discourses were, he made no converts.

Some pointed out to him that the papal bull had condemned Luther only conditionally; others did not altogether conceal the joy which they felt at seeing Roman pride humbled. The ministers of the emperor, on the one hand, and the ecclesiastical electors, on the other, affected great coldness,—the former, to make the pope more sensible how necessary it was for him to league with their master; the latter, in order to induce him to pay better for their favour. A conviction of Luther's innocence prevailed in the assembly; and Aleander could not restrain his indignation

CATHEDRAL, MENTZ.

But the coldness of the diet did not try the patience of the legate so much as the coldness of Rome. Rome, which had so long refused to take a serious view of the quarrel of the drunk German, had no idea that a bull of the sovereign pontiff could prove insufficient to make him humble and submissive. She had, accordingly, resumed her wonted security; no longer sending either bull or purses of money. But how was it possible without money to succeed in such a business? Rome must be awakened; and Aleander gives the alarm. Writing to the Cardinal de Medicis, he says: "Germany is detaching herself from Rome; and the princes are detaching themselves from the pope. A few delays more—a few more attempts at compromise, and the matter is past hope. Money! money! or Germany is lost."

At this cry Rome awakes: the servants of the papacy, laying aside their torpor, hastily forge their dreaded thunder at the Vatican. The pope issues a new bull; and the excommunication with which, till then, the heretical doctor had been merely threatened, is in distinct terms pronounced against him and all his adherents. Rome herself, breaking the last thread which still attached him to her Church, gave Luther greater freedom, and thereby greater power. Thundered at by the pope, he, with new affection, took refuge in Christ. Driven from the external temple, he felt more strongly that he was himself a temple inhabited by God.

"It is a glorious thing," said he, "that we sinners, in believing on Jesus Christ, and eating His flesh, have Him within us, with all His strength, power, wisdom, and justice, according as it is written, He who believeth in me, dwelleth in me and I in him. Admirable dwelling! marvellous tabernacle! far superior to that of Moses, and all magnificently adorned within with superb tapestry, veils of purple, and furniture of gold; while without, as on the tabernacle which God ordered to be constructed in the wilderness of Sinai, is seen only a rough covering of beavers' skins or goats' hair.¹ Christians often stumble, and in external appearance are all feebleness and disgrace. But no matter; within this infirmity and folly dwells secretly a power which the world cannot know, but which overcomes the world; for Christ remaineth in them. I have sometimes seen Christians walking with a halt, and in great weakness; but when the hour of combat or appearance at the world's bar arrived, Christ, of a sudden, acted within them; and they became so strong and resolute, that the devil, in dismay, fled before them."

LUTHER'S CELL, ERFURT.

In regard to Luther, such an hour was about to peal, and Christ, in whose communion he dwelt, was not to forsake him. Meanwhile, Rome naturally rejected him. The reformer and all his partizans, whatever their rank and power, were anathematized, and deprived personally, as well as in their descendants, of all their dignities and effects. Every faithful Christian, as he loved his soul's salvation, was ordered to shun the sight of the accursed crew. Wherever heresy had been introduced, the priests were, on Sundays and festivals,—at the hour when the churches were best filled,—solemnly to publish the excommunication. They were to carry away the vessels and ornaments of the altar, and lay the cross upon the ground; twelve priests, with torches in their hands, were to kindle them, and dash them down with violence, and extinguish them by trampling them with their feet; then the bishop was to publish the condemnation of the impious men; all the bells were to be rung; the bishops and priests were to pronounce anathemas and maledictions; and preach forcibly against Luther and his adherents.

Twenty-two days had elapsed since the excommunication had been published at Rome, and it was perhaps not yet known in Germany, when Luther, learning that there was again some talk of calling him to Worms, addressed the elector in a letter written in such terms that Frederick might communicate it to the diet. Luther wished to correct the erroneous impression of the princes, and frankly explain to this august tribunal the true nature of a cause which was so much misapprehended. "I rejoice with all my heart, most serene lord," said he, "that his imperial majesty means to bring this affair under consideration. I call Jesus Christ to witness, that it is the cause of Germany, of the Catholic Church, of the Christian world, and of God himself, . . . and not of any single man—and more especially such a man as I. I am ready to repair to Worms, provided I have a safe-conduct, and learned, pious, and impartial judges. I am ready to answer . . . for it is not in a spirit of rashness, or with a view to personal advantage, that I have taught the doctrine with which I am reproached; I have done it in obedience to my conscience, and to the oath which, as doctor, I took to the Holy Scriptures; I have done it for the glory of God, the safety of the Christian Church, the good of the German nation, and the extirpation of many superstitions, abuses, and evils, disgrace, tyranny, blasphemy, and impiety."

This declaration, in the solemn circumstances in which Luther made it, is deserving of our attention. We here see the motives which influenced him, and the primary causes which led to the renovation of Christian society. These were something more than monkish jealousy or a wish to marry.

CHAPTER II.

A Foreign Prince—Advice of Politicians—Conference between the Confessor and the Elector's Chancellor—Uselessness of these Manœuvres—Alexander's Activity—Luther's Sayings—Charles gives in to the Pope.

BUT all this was of no importance in the eyes of politicians. How high soever the idea which Charles entertained of the imperial dignity, it was not in Germany that his interests and policy centred. He was always a Duke of Burgundy, who, to several sceptres, added the first crown of Christendom. Strange! at the moment of her thorough transformation, Germany selected for her head a foreign prince, in whose eyes her wants and tendencies were only of secondary importance. The religious movement, it is true, was not indifferent to the young emperor; but it was important in his eyes only in so far as it menaced the pope. War between Charles and France was inevitable, and its chief seat was necessarily to be in Italy. An alliance with the pope thus became every day more necessary to the schemes of Charles. He would fain have either detached Frederick from Luther, or satisfied the pope without offending Frederick. Several of those about him manifested, in regard to the affairs of the Augustine monk, that cold disdain which politicians usually affect when religion is in question. "Let us avoid extremes," said they. "Let us trammel Luther by negotiations, and reduce him to silence by some kind of concession. The true course is to stifle the embers, not stir them up. If the monk is caught in the net, we have gained the day. By accepting a compromise, he will be interdicted and undone. For appearance, some external reforms will be devised; the elector will be satisfied, the pope will be gained, and affairs will resume their ordinary course."

Such was the project of the confidential councillors of the emperor. The doctors of Wittemberg seem to have divined this new policy. "They are trying in secret to gain men's minds," said Melancthon, "and are working in darkness." John Glapio, the confessor of Charles V.,—a man of rank, a skilful courtier, and an intriguing monk,—undertook the execution of the project. Glapio possessed the entire confidence of Charles, who, in accordance with Spanish manners, left to him almost entirely the management of matters relating to religion. As soon as Charles was appointed emperor, Leo X. had assiduously endeavoured to gain Glapio by favours, to which the confessor was strongly alive. There was no way in which he could make a better return to the pope's kindness than by reducing heresy to silence, and he, accordingly, set about the task.

One of the elector's councillors was Chancellor Gregory Bruck, or Pontanus, a man of great intelligence, decision, and courage, who knew more of theology than all the doctors, and whose wisdom was a match for the wiles of the monks at the emperor's court. Glapio, aware of the influence of the chancellor, asked an interview with him; and coming up to him as if he had been the friend of the reformer, said to him, with an expression of good will: "I was delighted when, on reading the first productions of Luther, I found him a vigorous stock, which had pushed forth noble branches, and which gave promise to the Church of the most precious fruits. Several before him, it is true, made the same discoveries; still, none but he has had the noble courage to publish the truth without fear. But when I read his book on the 'Captivity of Babylon,' I felt as if beaten and bruised from head to foot." "I don't believe," added the monk, "that Luther acknowledges himself to be the author. I do not find in it either his style or his science." . . . After some discussion, the confessor continued: "Introduce me to the elector, and I will, in your presence, explain to him the errors of Luther."

The chancellor replied: "That the business of the diet did not leave any leisure to his highness, who, moreover, did not meddle with the affair." The monk was vexed when his request was denied. "By the way," said the chancellor, "as you say there is no evil without a remedy, will you explain yourself?"

Assuming a confidential air, the confessor replied:

"The emperor earnestly desires to see such a man as Luther reconciled to the Church, for his books (before the publication of his treatise on the 'Captivity of Babylon') rather pleased his majesty. . . . It must, doubtless, have been Luther's rage at the bull which dictated that work. Let him declare that he did not wish to disturb the peace of the Church, and the learned of all nations will rally around him. . . . Procure me an audience of his highness."

The chancellor waited upon Frederick. The elector being well aware that any kind of recantation was impossible, replied: "Tell the confessor that I cannot comply with his request; but do you continue the conference."

Glapio received this message with great demonstrations of respect; and, changing the attack, said: "Let the elector name some confidential persons to deliberate on this affair."

Chancellor.—"The elector does not profess to defend the cause of Luther."

Confessor.—"Very well, do you, at least, discuss it with me. . . . Jesus Christ is my witness, that all I do is from love to the Church, and to Luther, who has opened so many hearts to the truth."

The chancellor having refused to undertake what was the reformer's own task, was preparing to retire.

"Stay," said the monk to him.

Chancellor.—"What, then, is to be done?"

Confessor.—"Let Luther deny that he is the author of the 'Captivity of Babylon.'"

Chancellor.—"But the papal bull condemns all his other works."

Confessor.—"It is because of his obstinacy. If he retracts his book, the pope, in the plenitude of his power, can easily restore him to favour. What hopes may we not cherish, now that we have so excellent an emperor!"

Perceiving that these words made some impression on the chancellor, the monk hastened to add: "Luther always insists on arguing from the Bible. The Bible! . . . it is like wax, and may be stretched and bent at pleasure. I undertake to find in the Bible opinions still more extraordinary than those of Luther. He is mistaken when he converts all the sayings of Jesus into commandments." Then, wishing to work also on the fears of the chancellor, he added: "What would happen if to-day or to-morrow the emperor were to try the effect of arms? . . . Think of it." He then allowed Pontanus to retire.

The confessor prepared new snares. "After living ten years with him," said Erasmus, "we should not know him."

"What an excellent book that of Luther's on 'Christian Liberty,'" said he to the chancellor, when he saw him a few days after; "what wisdom! what talent! what intellect!—it is just the style in which a true scholar ought to write. Let unexceptionable persons be chosen on either side, and let the pope and Luther refer to their judgment. No doubt Luther has the best of it on several articles. I will speak to the emperor himself on the subject. Believe me, I do not say these things to you on my own suggestion. I have told the emperor that God will chastise him, as well as all the princes, if the Church, which is the spouse of Jesus Christ, is not washed from all the stains by which she is polluted. I have added, that God himself had raised up Luther, and had ordered him to rebuke men sharply, using him as a rod to punish the sins of the world."

The chancellor hearing these words, (they convey the impressions of the time, and shew what was then thought of Luther even by his opponents,) thought it right to express his astonishment that more respect was not shewn to his master. "Deliberations on this subject," said he, "are daily carried on before the emperor, and the elector is not invited to them. It seems strange that the emperor, who owes him some gratitude, excludes him from his councils."

Confessor.—"I have been present only once at these deliberations, and I have heard the emperor resist the solicitations of the nuncios. Five years hence it will be seen how much Charles shall have done for the reformation of the Church."

"The elector," replied Pontanus, "is ignorant of the emperor's intentions. He should be invited, that he may hear them stated."

The confessor answered with a deep sigh: "I call God to witness how ardently I desire to see the Reformation of Christendom accomplished."

To lengthen out the affair, and, meanwhile, keep Luther's mouth shut, was all that Glapio had in view. At all events Luther must not come to Worms. A dead man returning from the other world, and appearing in the midst of the diet, would not have alarmed the nuncios, and monks, and whole host of the pope, so much as the sight of the Wittenberg doctor.

"How many days does it take to come from Wittenberg to Worms?" asked the monk at the chancellor, affecting an air of indifference; then, begging Pontanus to present his very humble respects to the elector, he departed.

Such were the manoeuvres of the courtiers. The firmness of Pontanus outwitted them. This upright man was immovable as a rock in all negotiations. Moreover, the Roman monks fell into the very snares which they were laying for their enemies. "The Christian," says Luther, in his figurative language, "is like a bird fastened near a trap. The wolves and foxes go round and round, and make a dart upon it to devour it, but fall into the pit and perish; while the timid bird remains alive. Thus, holy angels guard us; and devouring wolves, hypocrites, and persecutors, cannot do us any harm." Not only were the confessor's artifices unavailing; but, moreover, his admissions confirmed Frederick in the belief that Luther was in the right, and that it was his duty to defend him.

The hearts of men became every day more inclined towards the Gospel. A prior of the Dominicans proposed that the emperor, the kings of France, Spain, England, Portugal, Hungary, and Poland, the pope, and the electors, should name representatives by whom the matter should be decided. "Never," said he, "has reference been made to the pope alone." The general feeling became such, that it seemed impossible to condemn Luther without a hearing and regular conviction.

Alexander became uneasy, and displayed more than wonted energy. It is no longer merely against the elector and Luther that he has to contend. He is horrified at the secret negotiations of the confessor, the proposition of the prior, the consent of Charles's ministers, and the extreme coldness of Roman piety among the most devoted friends of the pope, "so that one would have thought," says Pallavicini, "that a torrent of ice had passed over them." He had at length received gold and silver from Rome; and held in his hand energetic briefs, addressed to the most powerful personages in the empire. Afraid that his prey might escape, he felt that now was the time to strike a decisive blow. He despatched the briefs, showered gold and silver with liberal hand, dealt out the most enticing promises, "and provided," says the cardinal historian, "with this triple weapon, he strove anew to turn the wavering assembly of the electors in favour of the pope." He laboured, above all, to encircle the emperor with his snares. Availing himself of the differences between the Belgian and the Spanish ministers, he laid close siege to the prince. All the friends of Rome, awakened by his voice, urged young Charles with solicitations. "Every day," wrote the elector to his brother John, "deliberations are held against Luther: the demand is, that he be put under the ban of the pope and the emperor; in all sorts of ways attempts are made to hurt him. Those who parade about with their red hats,—the Romans, with all their sect, labour in the task with indefatigable zeal."

In fact Aleander urged the condemnation of the reformer with a violence which Luther terms "marvellous fury." The apostate nuncio, as Luther calls him, hurried by passion beyond the bounds of prudence, one day exclaimed: "If you mean, O Germans, to shake off the yoke of Roman obedience, we will act so, that, setting the one against the other, as an exterminating sword, you will all perish in your own blood." "Such," adds the reformer, "is the pope's method of feeding the sheep of Christ."

Luther himself spoke a very different language. He made no demand of a personal nature. "Luther is ready," said Melancthon, "to purchase the glory and advancement of the Gospel with his life." But he trembled at the thought of the disasters of which his death might be the signal. He saw a people led astray, and perhaps avenging his martyrdom in the blood of his enemies, especially the priests. He recoiled from the fearful responsibility. "God," said he, "arrests the fury of His enemies; but should it break forth, . . . a storm will burst upon the priests similar to that which ravaged Bohemia. . . . I am clear of it; for I have earnestly besought the German nobility to arrest the Romans by wisdom, and not by the sword. To war upon priests—a body without courage and strength—is to war upon women and children."

Charles did not withstand the solicitations of the nuncio. His Belgian and Spanish devotion had been developed by his preceptor Adrian, who afterwards occupied the pontifical throne. The pope had addressed a brief to him, imploring him to give legal effect to the bull by an imperial edict. "In vain," said he to him, "shall God have invested you with the sword of supreme power, if you do not employ it both against infidels, and also against heretics, who are far worse than infidels." One day, accordingly, in the beginning of February, at the moment when everything was ready at Worms for a brilliant tournament, and after the emperor's tent had actually been erected, the princes who were preparing to attend the fête, were summoned to repair to the imperial palace. There the papal bull was read to them; and they were presented with a stringent edict, enjoining the execution of it. "If you have anything better to propose," added the emperor in the usual form, "I am ready to hear you."

Animated debates then began in the diet. "The monk," wrote the deputy of one of the German free towns, "gives us a great deal to do. Some would like to crucify him, and I don't think that he will escape; the only thing to be feared is, that he may rise again on the third day." The emperor had thought he would be able to publish his edict without opposition on the part of the states; but it was not so. Men's minds were not prepared, and it was necessary to gain the diet. "Convince this assembly," said the young monarch to the nuncio. This was just what Aleander desired; and he received a promise of being admitted to the diet on the 13th February.

CHAPTER III.

Aleander Admitted to the Diet—Aleander's Address—Luther Accused—Rome Defended—Appeal to Charles against Luther—Effect of the Nuncio's Address.

THE nuncio prepared for the solemn audience. The task was important, but Aleander was worthy of it. The ambassador of the sovereign pontiff was surrounded with all the splendour of his office; he was, moreover, one of the most eloquent men of his age. The friends of the Reformation looked forward to the sitting not without fear. The elector, under the pretext of indisposition, kept away; but he ordered some of his councillors to attend and give heed to the nuncio's address.

On the appointed day Aleander proceeded to the hall of the assembled princes. Men's minds were excited; several thought of Anas or Caiaphas repairing to Pilate's judgment hall to demand the life of Him who was perverting the nation, (Luke xxiii. 2.) "At the moment when the nuncio was about to step across the threshold, the officer of the diet," says Pallavicini, "came briskly up to him, took him by the breast, and pushed him back." "He was a Lutheran at heart," adds the Roman historian. If the story is true, it doubtless betrays strange passion in the officer; but, at the same time, gives an idea of the powerful influence which Luther's doctrine had produced even on the doorkeepers of the imperial council. Proud Aleander, haughtily drawing himself up, moved on, and entered the hall. Never had Rome been called to make her apology before so august an assembly. The nuncio placed before him the judicial documents which he judged necessary,—the works of Luther, and the papal bulls. Silence being called, he spoke as follows:—

"Most august emperor!—most puissant princes!—most excellent deputies!—I come before you to maintain a cause for which my heart burns with the most ardent affection. The subject is, the preservation on my master's head of that tiara which is revered by all,—the maintenance of that papal throne, for which I am ready to give my body to the flames, could the monster who has engendered the growing heresy be consumed by the same pile, and mingle his ashes with mine.¹

"No! the disagreement between Luther and Rome turns not on the interests of the pope. Luther's books are before me, and any man with eyes in his head may perceive that the holy doctrines of the Church are the object of his attack. He teaches that those only communicate worthily whose consciences are filled with sadness and confusion for their sins; and that there is no justification in baptism, without faith in the promise of which baptism is the pledge. He denies the necessity of our works to obtain celestial glory. He denies that we have liberty and power to observe natural and Divine law. He affirms that we sin necessarily in all our actions. Did ever the arsenal of hell send forth arrows better fitted to loose the reins of modesty? . . . He preaches the abolition of religious vows. Can more sacrilegious impiety be imagined? . . . What desolation will not be seen in the world, when those who ought to be the leaven of the people shall have thrown aside their sacred vestments, abandoned the temples which re-echoed with their holy hymns, and plunged into adultery, incest, and dissoluteness! . . .

"Shall I enumerate all the crimes of this audacious monk? He sins against the dead, for he denies purgatory; he sins against heaven, for he says he would not believe an angel from heaven; he sins against the Church, for he pretends that all Christians are priests; he sins against the saints, for he despises their venerable writings; he sins against the councils, for he terms that of Constance an assembly of demons; he sins against the world, for he forbids the punishment of death to be inflicted on any one who has not committed a mortal sin. Some say he is a pious man. . . . I have no wish to attack his life, I would only remind this assembly that the devil deceives men by semblances of truth."

Aleander having spoken of the condemnation of purgatory by the Council of Florence, laid the papal bull on this council at the feet of the emperor. The Archbishop of Mentz took it up, and handed it to the archbishops of Cologne and Trèves, who received it reverently, and passed it to the other princes. The nuncio, having thus accused Luther, now proceeded to the second point, which was to justify Rome.

"At Rome, says Luther, they promise one thing with the lip, and do its opposite with the hand. If this fact is true, must not the inference be the very reverse of what he draws from it? If the ministers of a religion live conformably to its precepts, it is a proof that it is false. Such was the religion of the ancient Romans. . . . Such is that of Mohammed, and that of Luther himself; but such is not the religion which the pontiffs of Rome teach us. Yes, the doctrine which they confess condemns all as faulty, several as culpable, and some even (I say it candidly) as criminal. . . . This doctrine delivers their actions to the censure of men during their life, and to historical infamy after their death. Now, what pleasure, what advantage, I ask, could the pontiffs have found in inventing such a religion?

"The Church, it will be said, was not governed in primitive times by Roman pontiffs—what must the conclusion be? With such arguments they might persuade men to live on acorns, and princesses to be their own washerwomen."

But it was against his adversary—the reformer—that the nuncio chiefly directed his attack. Full of indignation against those who said that he ought to be heard, he exclaimed: "Luther will not allow any one to instruct him. The pope summoned him to Rome; but he did not obey. The pope summoned him to Augsburg before his legate; and he would not appear without a safe-conduct from the emperor,—i. e., until the hands of the legate were tied, and nothing left free to him but his tongue. Ah!" said Aleander, turning towards Charles V., "I supplicate your imperial majesty not to do what would issue in disgrace. Interfere not with a matter of which laics have no right to take cognizance. Do your own work. Let Luther's doctrine be interdicted throughout the empire: let his writings be everywhere burnt. Fear not: there is enough in the writings of Luther to burn a hundred thousand heretics. . . . And what have we to fear? . . . The populace? Before the battle they seem terrible from their insolence; in the battle they are contemptible from their cowardice. Foreign princes? The King of France has prohibited Luther's doctrine from entering his kingdom; while the King of Great Britain is preparing a blow for it with his royal hand. You know what the feelings of Hungary, Italy, and Spain are, and none of your neighbours, how great soever the enmity he may bear to yourself, wishes you anything so bad as this heresy. If the house of our enemy is adjacent to our own, we may wish him fever, but not pestilence. . . . Who are all these Lutherans? A huddle of insolent grammarians, corrupt priests, disorderly monks, ignorant advocates, degraded nobles, common people, misled and perverted. Is not the Catholic party far more numerous, able, and powerful? A unanimous decree of this assembly will enlighten the simple, give warning to the imprudent, determine those who are hesitating, and confirm the feeble. . . . But if the axe is not laid to the root of this poisonous shrub, if the fatal stroke is not given to it, then . . . I see it covering the heritage of Jesus Christ with its branches, changing the vineyard of the Lord into a howling forest, transforming the kingdom of God into a den of wild beasts, and throwing Germany into the frightful state of barbarism and desolation to which Asia has been reduced by the superstition of Mohammed."

The nuncio ceased. He had spoken for three hours. The torrent of his eloquence had moved the assembly.

"The princes, shaken and alarmed," says Cochlæus, "looked at each other; and murmurs were soon heard from different quarters against Luther and his partisans." Had the mighty Luther been present, had he been permitted to answer the discourse, had he, availing himself of the concession forced from the Roman orator by the remembrance of his old master, the infamous Borgia, been permitted to shew that these arguments, designed to defend Rome, constituted her condemnation, and that the doctrine which gave proof of her iniquity was not invented by him, as the orator said, but was the very religion which Christ had given to the world, and which the Reformation was establishing in its primitive lustre,—could he have presented an exact and animated picture of the errors and abuses of the papacy, and shewn how it had perverted the religion of Jesus Christ into an instrument of aggrandisement and rapine,—the effect of the nuncio's harangue would have been neutralized at the moment of its delivery; but nobody rose to speak. The assembly remained under the impression of the address, and, excited and carried away, shewed themselves ready violently to eradicate the heresy of Luther from the soil of the empire.

Still the victory was only apparent. It was the will of God that Rome should have an opportunity of displaying her reasons and her strength. The greatest of her orators had addressed the assembled princes, and said all that Rome had to say. But the last effort of the papacy was the very thing which was destined to become, in regard to several of those who witnessed it, the signal of her defeat. If, in order to secure the triumph of truth, it is necessary to proclaim it aloud, so, in order to secure the destruction of error, it is sufficient to publish it without reserve. Neither the one nor the other, in order to accomplish its course, should be concealed. The light judges all things.

CHAPTER IV.

Sentiments of the Princes—Speech of Duke George—Character of the Reformation—A hundred and one Grievances—Charles yields—Tactics of Alexander—The Grandees of Spain—Luther's Peace—Death and not Retraction.

A FEW days sufficed to wear off these first impressions, as always happens when an orator shrouds the emptiness of his arguments in high-sounding phrases.

The majority of the princes were ready to sacrifice Luther; but none were disposed to sacrifice the rights of the empire, and the redress of German grievances. There was no objection to give up the insolent monk who had dared to speak so loud; but it was wished to make the pope so much the more sensible of the justice of a reform which was demanded by the heads of the kingdom. Accordingly, it was the greatest personal enemy of Luther—Duke George of Saxony—who spoke most energetically against the encroachments of Rome. The grandson of Podiebrad, king of Bohemia, repulsed by the doctrines of grace which the reformer proclaimed, had not yet abandoned the hope of seeing a moral and ecclesiastical reform; and what irritated him so much against the monk of Wittenberg, was, that he had spoiled the whole affair by his despised doctrines. But now, seeing the nuncio sought to confound Luther and reform in one common condemnation, George suddenly stood up among the assembled princes, and, to the great astonishment of those who knew his hatred to the reformer, said: "The diet must not forget the grievances of which it complains against the court of Rome. What abuses have crept into our states! The annats which the emperor granted freely for the good of Christendom now demanded as a debt,—the Roman courtiers every day inventing new ordinances, in order to absorb, sell, and farm out ecclesiastical benefices,—a multitude of transgressions winked at,—rich offenders unworthily tolerated, while those who have no means of ransom are punished without pity,—the popes incessantly bestowing expectancies and reversions on the inmates of their palace, to the detriment of those to whom the benefices belong,—the commendams of abbeyes and convents of Rome conferred on cardinals, bishops, and prelates, who appropriate their revenues, so that there is not one monk in convents which ought to have twenty or thirty,—stations multiplied without end, and indulgence shops established in all the streets and squares of our cities, shops of St. Anthony, shops of the Holy Spirit, of St. Hubert, of St. Cornelius, of St. Vincent, and many others besides,—societies purchasing from Rome the right of holding such markets, then purchasing from their bishop the right of exhibiting their wares, and, in order to procure all this money, draining and emptying the pockets of the poor,—the indulgence, which ought to be granted solely for the salvation of souls, and which ought to be merited only by prayers, fastings, and the salvation of souls, sold at a regular price,—the officials of the bishops oppressing those in humble life with penances for blasphemy, adultery, debauchery, the violation of this or that feast day, while, at the same time, not even censuring ecclesiastics who are guilty of the same crimes,—penances imposed on the penitent, and artfully arranged, so that he soon falls anew into the same fault, and pays so much the more money. . . . Such are some of the crying abuses of Rome; all sense of shame has been cast off, and one thing only is pursued . . . money! Hence, preachers who ought to teach the truth, now do nothing more than retail lies—lies, which are not only tolerated, but recompensed, because the more they lie the more they gain. From this polluted well comes forth all this polluted water. Debauchery goes hand in hand with avarice. The officials cause women to come to their houses under divers pretexts, and strive to seduce them, sometimes by menaces, sometimes by presents; or, if they cannot succeed, injure them in their reputation. Ah! the scandals caused by the clergy precipitate multitudes of poor souls into eternal condemnation! There must be a universal reform, and this reform must be accomplished by summoning a general council. Wherefore, most excellent princes and lords, with submission I implore you to lose no time in the consideration of this matter." Several days after Alexander's address, Duke George produced the list of grievances which he had enumerated. This important document is preserved in the archives of Weimar.

Luther had not spoken more forcibly against the abuses of Rome; but he had done something more. The duke pointed out the evil; Luther had, along with the evil, pointed out both the cause and the cure. He had shewn that the sinner receives the true indulgence, that which comes from God, solely by faith in the grace and merits of Jesus Christ; and this simple but powerful doctrine had overturned all the markets established by the priests. "How can one become pious?" asked he one day. "A Cordelier will reply, Put on a grey hood, and tie a cord round your waist. A Roman will reply, Hear mass, and fast. But a Christian will say, Faith in Christ alone justifies and saves. Before works we must have eternal life. After we are born anew, and made children of God by the Word of grace, then it is we do good works."

The duke spoke the language of a secular prince—Luther the language of a reformer. The great sore of the Church was, that she had devoted herself entirely to externals; had made all her works and her graces to consist of outward and material things. Indulgences had carried this to its extreme point, and pardon (the most spiritual thing in Christianity) had been purchased in shops like meat and drink. The great work of Luther consisted in his availing himself of this extreme point in the degeneracy of Christendom, in order to bring back the individual and the Church to the primitive source of life, and to re-establish the reign of the Holy Spirit within the sanctuary of the heart. Here, as often happens, the cure sprung out of the disease, and the two extremes met. Henceforward the Church, which during so many ages had been developed externally by ceremonies, observances, and human practices, began again to be developed within by faith, hope, and charity.

The duke's address produced the greater effect from his opposition to Luther being well known. Other members of the diet stated different grievances. The ecclesiastical princes themselves supported these complaints. "We have a pontiff," said they, "who spends his life in hunting and pleasure. The benefices of Germany are given at Rome to huntsmen, domestics, grooms, stable-boys, body servants, and other people of that class; ignorant unpolished people, without capacity, and entire strangers to Germany." The diet appointed a commission to collect all these grievances. Their number was found to be a hundred and one. A deputation, consisting of secular and ecclesiastical princes, presented the list to the emperor, imploring him to give redress, as he had engaged to do at his election. "How many Christian souls are lost?" said they to Charles V. "How many deprecations, how much extortion, are caused by the scandals with which the spiritual chief of Christendom is environed? The ruin and dishonour of our people must be prevented. Therefore, we all, in a body, supplicate you most humbly, but also most urgently, to ordain a general reformation, to undertake it, and to accomplish it." There was, at this time, in Christian society an unseen power influencing princes and their subjects, —a wisdom from above dragging forward even the adversaries of the Reformation, and preparing that emancipation whose appointed hour had at length arrived.

Charles could not be insensible to these remonstrances of the empire. Neither himself nor the nuncio had expected them. His confessor had even denounced the vengeance of heaven against him if he did not reform the Church. The emperor immediately withdrew the edict which ordered Luther's writings to be committed to the flames in every part of the empire, and in its place substituted a provisional order remitting these books to the magistrates.

This did not satisfy the assembly, who were desirous that the reformer should appear. It is unjust, said his friends, to condemn Luther without having heard him, and without knowing from himself whether he is the author of the books which are proposed to be burnt. His doctrine, said his opponents, has so taken possession of men's hearts, that it is impossible to arrest their progress without hearing him. There need be no discussion with him. If he avows his writings, and refuses to retract them, then all of us—electors, princes, states of the whole empire, true to the faith of our ancestors—will, in a body, aid your majesty, by all the means in our power, in the execution of your decrees.

Alexander, alarmed, dreading both the intrepidity of Luther and the ignorance of the princes, immediately set himself to the task of preventing the reformer's compareance. He went from the ministers of Charles, to the princes who were most disposed to favour the pope, and from these princes to the emperor himself. "It is unlawful," said he, "to bring into question what the sovereign pontiff has decided. There will be no discussion with Luther, you say; but, continued he, will not the power of this audacious man—will not the fire of his eye, and the eloquence of his tongue, and the mysterious spirit which animates him, be sufficient to excite some sedition? Several already venerate him as a saint; and you, everywhere, meet with his portrait surrounded with a halo of glory, as round the head of the Blessed. If it is determined to cite him, at least let it be without giving him the protection of public faith." These last words were meant to frighten Luther, or prepare his ruin.

The nuncio found easy access to the grantees of Spain. In Spain, as in Germany, the opposition to the Dominican inquisitors was national. The yoke of the inquisition, which had been discontinued for a time, had just been re-established by Charles. A numerous party in the Peninsula sympathized with Luther; but it was not so with the great, who, on the banks of the Rhine, again met with what they had hated beyond the Pyrenees. Inflamed with the most violent fanaticism, they were bent on annihilating the new heresy. In particular, Frederick, duke of Alba, was transported with rage whenever the subject of Reformation was mooted. His wish would have been to wade in the blood of all its adherents. Luther had not yet been called to appear; and yet his mere name was already agitating all the grantees of Christendom then assembled at Worms.

The man who was thus agitating the mighty of the earth was the only one who seemed to be at peace.

The news from Worms were alarming. Even Luther's friends were frightened. "Nothing now is left us but our wishes and our prayers," wrote Melancthon to Spalatin. "Oh! if God would deign to ransom the safety of the Christian people by my blood." But Luther was a stranger to fear. Shutting himself up in his peaceful cell, he sat down to meditate, applying to himself the words of Mary, the mother of our Lord, when she exclaimed: My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour. For He that is mighty has done for me great things; and holy is His name. He has shewn strength with His arm; He hath put down the mighty from their seats, and exalted them of low degree, (Luke i. 46-55.) The following are some of the thoughts which filled Luther's heart: He that is mighty . . . says Mary. Oh! how great boldness on the part of a young girl! With a single word she strikes all the strong with languor, all the mighty with feebleness, all the wise with folly, and all those whose name is glorious on the earth, with ignominy; and lays at the feet of God all strength, all power, all wisdom, all glory. His arm, continues she; and she thus appeals to that power by which He acts of himself, and without the agency of His creatures,—a mysterious power, operating in secrecy and in silence, until His purpose is accomplished. Hence destruction comes before any one is aware of its approach; hence elevation, when no one is thinking of it. He leaves His children in oppression and feebleness, so that each of them says to himself, 'We are all lost!' Then, however, they are most strong. For it is where the power of man ends, that the power of God begins. Only let faith wait upon Him. . . . And, on the other hand, God permits His adversaries to increase their power and grandeur. He withdraws from them the aid of His strength, and leaves them to be inflated with their own. He leaves them void of His eternal wisdom, and lets them fill themselves with their wisdom of a day. And while they rise up in the greatness of their might, the arm of the Lord keeps back, and their work . . . vanishes like a soap bubble when it bursts in the air."

It was on the 10th of March, at the moment when his name was filling the imperial city with alarm, that Luther finished this exposition of the "Magnificat."

He was not allowed to remain tranquil in his retreat. Spalatin, in conformity to the orders of the elector, sent him a note of the articles of which it was proposed to demand a retraction from him. A retraction after the refusal at Augsburg! . . . "Fear not," he wrote to Spalatin, "that I will retract a single syllable, since their only argument is to insist that my writings are opposed to the rites of what they call the Church. If the Emperor Charles summon me merely for the purpose of retracting, I will answer him that I will remain here; and it will be just the same thing as if I had been to Worms and come back again. But if, on the contrary, the emperor chooses to summon me in order that I may be put to death, I am ready to repair at his call; for, with the help of Christ, I will not desert His Word on the battle-field. I know it; these bloody men will never rest till they have deprived me of life. Oh, that none but papists would become guilty of my blood!"

CHAPTER V.

Will a Safe-conduct be given?—Safe-conduct—Will Luther go?—Holy Thursday at Rome—The Pope and Luther.

At length the emperor decided. The appearance of Luther before the diet seemed the only thing fitted to bring this affair, which occupied the whole empire, to some kind of termination. Charles V. resolved to cite him, but without giving him a safe-conduct. Here Frederick again began to act as his protector. Everybody saw the danger which threatened the reformer. Luther's friends, says Cochleus, were afraid that he would be delivered up to the pope, or that the emperor himself would put him to death as unworthy, on account of his obstinate heresy, that any faith should be kept with him. On this subject there was a long and keen debate among the princes. Struck, at last, with the general agitation then prevailing almost throughout the whole population of Germany, and afraid that, as Luther passed along, some sudden tumult or dangerous sedition might break forth, (doubtless in favour of the reformer,) the princes deemed it wise to calm men's minds on this account; and not only the emperor, but also the Elector of Saxony, Duke George, and the Landgrave of Hesse, through whose states he had to pass, each gave him a safe-conduct.

On the 6th March, 1521, Charles V. signed the following summons addressed to Luther:—

"Charles, by the grace of God, elected Roman Emperor, always Augustus, &c., &c.

"Honourable, dear, and pious! We, and the states of the holy empire, having resolved to make an inquest touching the doctrine and the books which you have published for some time past, have given you, to come here and return to a place of safety, our safe-conduct, and that of the empire, here subjoined. Our sincere desire is, that you immediately prepare for this journey, in order that, in the space of twenty-one days, mentioned in our safe-conduct, you may be here certainly, and without fail. Have no apprehension of either injustice or violence. We will firmly enforce our safe-conduct under-written; and we expect that you will answer to our call. In so doing, you will follow our serious advice.

"Given at our imperial city of Worms, the sixth day of March, in the year of our Lord, 1521, and in the second year of our reign. CHARLES.

"By order of my Lord the Emperor, with his own hand, Albert, Cardinal of Mentz, Arch-chancellor.

"NICOLAS ZWYL."

The safe-conduct enclosed in this letter bore the following address:—"To the honourable, our dear and pious Doctor Martin Luther, of the order of the Augustines."

It began thus:—

"We, Charles, fifth of the name, by the grace of God elected Roman Emperor, always Augustus, King of Spain, of the Two Sicilies, of Jerusalem, Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, &c., Arch-duke of Austria, Duke of Burgundy, Count of Hapsburg, Flanders, the Tyrol," &c., &c.

Then the king of so many nations, giving to wit that he had summoned before him an Augustine monk, named Luther, ordered all princes, lords, magistrates, and others, to respect the safe-conduct which he gave him, under pain of punishment by the emperor and the empire.

Thus the emperor gave the title of "dear, honourable, and pious," to a man at whose head the Church had launched her excommunication. It had been wished, in the drawing up of the document, to remove all distrust from the mind of Luther and his friends. Gaspard Sturm was appointed to carry this message to the reformer, and accompany him to Worms. The elector, dreading the public indignation, wrote, on the 12th March, to the magistrates of Wittenberg, to see to the safety of the emperor's officer, and, if deemed necessary, to provide him with a guard. The herald set out.

Thus the designs of God were accomplished. God was pleased to set upon a hill that light which He had kindled in the world; and emperors, kings, and princes, without knowing it, were forthwith in motion to execute His design. It is easy for Him to exalt the lowest to the highest. An act of His power suffices to raise the humble child of Mansfeld from an obscure hut to the palace where kings are assembled. In regard to Him, there is nothing small, nothing great. When He wills it, Charles V. and Luther meet face to face.

But will Luther obey this citation? His best friends were in doubt. The elector, on the 25th March, wrote his brother: "Doctor Martin is summoned hither, but I know not if he will come. I cannot augur any good of it." Three weeks later (16th April) this excellent prince, seeing the danger increase, wrote anew to Duke John: "There is a proclamation against Luther. The cardinals and bishops attack him with much severity. May God turn all to good! Would to God I could procure him an equitable reception!"

While these things were passing at Worms and Wittenberg, the papacy was reiterating its blows. On the 28th of March, the Thursday before Easter, Rome resounded with a solemn excommunication. At this season it is usual to publish the dreadful bull in Cona Domini, which is only a long series of imprecations. On that day the avenues to the church in which the sovereign pontiff was to officiate were occupied, at an early hour, by the papal guards, and by a crowd of people who had flocked from all parts of Italy to receive the benediction of the holy father. The square in front of the Basilisk was decorated with branches of laurel and myrtle; wax tapers were burning on the balcony of the church, and the ostensorium was raised upon it. All at once bells make the air re-echo with solemn sounds; the pope, clothed in his pontifical robes, and carried in a chair, appears on the balcony; the people kneel, all heads are uncovered, the colours are lowered, the muskets grounded, and a solemn silence reigns. Some moments after, the pope slowly stretches out his hands, raises them towards heaven, then bends them slowly towards the ground, making the sign of the cross. This movement is repeated thrice, and the air echoes anew with the ringing of bells, which intimate the pope's benediction to the surrounding country; then priests advance with impetuosity, holding lighted torches, which they reverse, brandish, and throw about with violence, to represent the flames of hell; the people are moved and agitated; and the words of malediction are heard from the height of the temple.

When Luther was informed of this excommunication, he published the teur of it, with some remarks, written in that caustic style in which he so much excelled. Although this publication did not appear till afterwards, we will here give some idea of it. Let us hear the high priest of Christendom on the balcony of his Basilisk, and the monk of Wittenberg answering him from the bosom of Germany.

CATHEDRAL OF WORMS.

There is something characteristic in the contrast of the two voices.

The Pope.—"Leo Bishop."

Luther.—"Bishop . . . as a wolf is a shepherd; for the bishop ought to exhort according to the doctrine of salvation, not belch out imprecations and maledictions."

The Pope.—" . . . Servant of all the servants of God."

Luther.—"In the evening, when we are drunk; but in the morning we call ourselves Leo, lord of all the lords."

The Pope.—"The Roman bishops, our predecessors, have been wont, on this festival, to employ the weapons of righteousness."

Luther.—"Which, according to you, are excommunication and anathema; but according to St. Paul, patience, meekness, and charity." (2 Cor. vi. 7.)

The Pope.—"According to the duty of the apostolic office, and to maintain the purity of Christian faith."

Luther.—"In other words, the temporal possessions of the pope."

The Pope.—"And its unity, which consists in the union of the members with Christ their head, . . . and with His vicar."

Luther.—"For Christ is not sufficient; one more than He is necessary."

The Pope.—"To guard the holy communion of the faithful, we follow the ancient custom, and excommunicate and anathematize, on the part of God Almighty, the Father."

Luther.—"Of whom it is said, God sent not His Son into the world to condemn 'he world,'" (John iii. 17.)

The Pope.—" . . . And the Son and the Holy Spirit, and according to the power of the apostles Peter and Paul, . . . and our own."

Luther.—"And myself! says the ravenous wolf, as if the power of God were too feeble without him."

The Pope.—"We curse all heretics,—the Garasi,¹ the Patari, the Pauperes of Lyons, the Arnoldists, the Speronists, the Passagians, the Wicklifites, the Hussites, the Fratricelli."

Luther.—"For they wished to possess the Holy Scriptures, and insisted that the pope should be sober, and preach the Word of God."

The Pope.—"And Martin Luther recently condemned by us for a similar heresy, as well as all his adherents, and all, whosoever they be, that shew him any favour."

Luther.—"I thank thee, most gracious pontiff, for condemning me in common with all these Christians. I count it an honour to have my name proclaimed at Rome, during the feast, in so glorious a manner, and carried over the world with the names of all those humble confessors of Jesus Christ."

The Pope.—"Likewise, we excommunicate and curse all pirates and corsairs."

Luther.—"Who, then, is the greatest of pirates and corsairs, if it be not he who robs souls, chains them, and puts them to death?"

The Pope.—"Particularly those who sail upon our sea."

Luther.—"OUR sea! . . . Saint Peter, our predecessor, said: Silver and gold have I none, (Acts iii. 6.) Jesus Christ said: The kings of the Gentiles exercise lordship over them; but it shall not be so with you, (Luke xxii. 25.) But if a waggon loaded with hay must, on meeting with a drunken man, give way to him, a fortiori must St. Peter and Jesus Christ himself give way to the pope!"

The Pope.—"Likewise, we excommunicate and curse all who falsify our bulls, and our apostolic letters."

Luther.—"But the letters of God, the Scriptures of God, all the world may condemn and burn."

The Pope.—"Likewise, we excommunicate and curse all who detain provisions which are on the way to Rome."

Luther.—"He barks and bites like a dog threatened to be deprived of his bone."

The Pope.—"Likewise, we condemn and curse all who keep back judicial rights, fruits, tithes, revenues, appertaining to the clergy."

Luther.—"For Jesus Christ has said: Whosoever will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also, (Matt. v. 40;) and this is our commentary upon the passage."

The Pope.—"Whatever be their station, dignity, order, power, or rank,—be they even bishops or kings."

Luther.—"For there will arise false teachers among you, who will despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities, saith the Scripture," (Jude 8.)

The Pope.—"Likewise we condemn and curse all those who in any kind of way attack the city of Rome, the kingdom of Sicily, the islands of Sardinia and Corsica, the patrimony of St. Peter in Tuscany, the duchy of Spoleto, the margravate of Ancona, the Campagna, the cities of Ferrara and Benevento, or any other city or country appertaining to the Church of Rome."

Luther.—"O Peter, poor fisherman! where did you get Rome and all those kingdoms? I salute you, Peter, king of Sicily! . . . and fisherman at Bethsaida!"

The Pope.—"We excommunicate and curse all chancellors, councillors, parliaments, procurators, governors, officials, bishops, and others, who oppose our letters of exhortation, invitation, prohibition, mediation, execution," &c.

Luther.—"For the holy see seeks only to live in idleness, magnificence, and debauchery, to command, storm, deceive, lie, insult, and commit all sorts of wickedness in peace and safety. . . .

"O Lord, arise!—it is not as the papists pretend. Thou hast not forsaken us, nor is thy favour turned away from us."

So spake Leo X. at Rome, and Luther at Wittenberg.

The pontiff having finished his anathemas, the parchment on which they were written was torn in pieces, and the fragments thrown to the people. Immediately there was a great rush among the crowd, all pressing forward, and striving to get hold of a morsel of the terrible bull.

Such were the holy relics which the papacy offered to her faithful on the eve of the great day of grace of expiation. The multitude soon dispersed, and the vicinity of the Basilisk resumed its wonted stillness. Let us return to Wittenberg.

CHAPTER VI.

Luther's Courage—Bugsenhagen at Wittenberg—Executions in Pomerania—Melancthon wishes to set out with Luther—Amsdorff—Schrift—Snaeven—Hatten to Charles V.

It was the 24th of March. The imperial herald, Gaspard Sturm, having at length passed the gates of the town where Luther was, presented himself before the doctor, and put the summons of Charles V. into his hands. A grave and solemn moment for the reformer! All his friends were in consternation. No prince, not even excepting Frederick the Wise, had as yet declared in his favour. Knights, it is true, uttered menaces; but the mighty Charles despised them. Still Luther was not troubled. "The papists," said he, on seeing the anguish of his friends, "have no wish for my arrival at Worms, they only wish my condemnation and death. No matter, pray not for me, but for the Word of God. Before my blood is cold, thousands throughout the world will be called to answer for having shed it. The most holy adversary of Christ, the father, master, and generalissimo of homicides, insists on having my life. Amen! Let the will of the Lord be done. Christ will give me His Spirit to vanquish these ministers of error. I despise them during my life, and will triumph over them by my death. They are doing all they can at Worms to compel me to retract. Here, then, will be my retraction: I once said, that the pope was the vicar of Christ; now, I say that he is the enemy of the Lord, and the apostle of the devil." And when he learned that all the pulpits of the Franciscans were resounding with imprecations and maledictions against him, he exclaimed: "Oh! what wondrous joy it gives me!" He knew that he had done the will of God, and that God was with him; why, then, should he not set out boldly? This purity of intention, this liberty of conscience, is a hidden power of incalculable might, which never fails the servant of God, and which makes him more invincible than helmets and armed hosts could make him.

At this time arrived at Wittenberg a man who, like Melancthon, was destined to be Luther's friend through life, and to console him at the moment of his departure. It was a priest of thirty-six years of age, named Bugenhagen, who had fled from the severities with the Bishop of Camin, and Prince Bogislas of Pomerania, persecuted the friends of the Gospel of all classes—clergy, citizens, and literati. Of a senatorial family at Wollin in Pomerania,—from which he is commonly called "Pomeranus,"—Bugenhagen, at twenty years of age, began to teach at Treptow. Youth flocked to hear him, while nobles and learned men vied with each other for his society. He was a diligent student of the Holy Scriptures, and prayed to God to instruct him. One day, towards the end of December, 1520, when he was supping with several friends, Luther's treatise on the "Captivity of Babylon" was put into his hands. After turning it over, he exclaimed: "Many heretics have infested the Church since our Saviour died, but never was there one more pestilential than the author of this work." Having taken the book home with him, and read it over and over, his views entirely changed; new truths presented themselves to his mind, and returning some days afterwards to his companions, he said to them: "The whole world is fallen into Cimierian darkness. This man, and none but he, sees the truth." "Some priests, a deacon, even the abbot himself, received the pure doctrine of salvation, and preaching it with power, soon," says a historian, "turned away their hearers from human superstitions to the sole efficacious merit of Jesus Christ." Then persecution burst forth. Several were already immured in dungeons, when Bugenhagen escaped from his enemies, and arrived at Wittenberg. "He suffers for the love of the Gospel," immediately wrote Melancthon to the elector's chaplain; "where could he fly, if not to our asylum, to the protection of our prince?"

But none received Bugenhagen with so much delight as Luther. It was arranged between them that, immediately after the reformer's departure, Bugenhagen should begin to expound the Psalms. Thus, Divine Providence brought this powerful mind to aid in supplying the place of him whom Wittenberg was going to lose. Placed a year after at the head of the church of this town, Bugenhagen presided over it for thirty-six years. Luther distinguished him by the name of The Pastor.

Luther behoved to depart. His alarmed friends thought, that unless God miraculously interposed, he was going to death. Melancthon, who had left his native country, had become attached to Luther with all the affection of his soul. "Luther," said he, "is to me in place of all my friends. I feel him to be greater and more admirable than I can express. You know how Alcibiades admired his Socrates;¹ but I admire Luther in a higher sense, for he is a Christian." Then he added the simple, but beautiful expression: "Every time I contemplate him, I find him even greater than himself." Melancthon wished to follow Luther in his dangers. But their common friends, and, doubtless, the doctor himself, were against it. Must not Philip supply the place of his friend? and, should that friend never return, who would direct the cause of the Reformation? "Ah! would to God," said Melancthon, resigned, but grieved,— "would to God I had been allowed to go with him."

The ardent Amstorf immediately declared that he would accompany the doctor. His strong soul felt a pleasure in exposing itself to danger. His high bearing enabled him to appear fearless before an assembly of kings. The elector had invited to Wittenberg, as professor of law, Jerome Schurf, the son of a physician of St. Gall, a celebrated man, of great meekness of temper, and a very intimate friend of Luther. "He has not yet summoned up courage," said Luther, "to pronounce sentence of death on a single malefactor." Yet this timid individual volunteered to act as the doctor's counsel on this dangerous journey. A young Danish student, named Peter Suaven, who boarded with Melancthon, and afterwards distinguished himself by his labours in Pomerania and Denmark, also declared that he would accompany his master. The youth in schools were entitled to have their representative beside the champion of truth.

Germany was moved at the thought of the dangers which threatened the representative of her people, and found a voice well fitted to express her fears. Ulrich von Hutten shuddered at the thought of the blow about to be struck at his country; and, on the 1st of April, wrote directly to Charles V, as follows: "Most excellent emperor, you are on the point of destroying us, and yourself with us. What is intended in this affair of Luther, but just to destroy our liberty, and abridge your power? There is not throughout the whole breadth of the empire a good man who does not feel the liveliest interest in this business. The priests alone are in arms against Luther, because he is opposed to their excessive power, their shameful luxury, their depraved lives, and has pleaded for the doctrine of Christ, his country's freedom, and purity of manners.

¹ "Alcibiades was persuaded that the demon of Socrates was assistance which the gods sent to instruct and save."—Plutarch's Life of Alcibiades.

"O emperor! dismiss from your presence those orators of Rome, those bishops and cardinals who would prevent everything like reform. Did you not observe the sadness of the people on seeing you, on your arrival, approach the people surrounded by those wearers of red hats, by a herd of priests, and not a band of valiant warriors?"

"Do not give up your sovereign majesty to those who would trample it under their feet! Have pity on us! Do not in your ruin drag the whole nation along with you! Place us amid the greatest perils, under the swords of the enemy and the canon's mouth; let all nations conspire against us; let all armies assail us, so that we may be able openly to manifest our valour, and not be thus vanquished and enslaved in the dark, like women, without arms and without a struggle. . . . Ah! our hope was that you would deliver us from the yoke of the Romans, and overthrow the pontifical tyranny. God grant that the future may turn out better than the commencement."

"All Germany kneels before you; she supplicates you with tears, implores your aid, your pity, your faith, and, by the holy memory of those Germans, who, when the whole world was subjugated to Rome, refused to bend their head before that proud city, conjures you to save her, restore her to herself, deliver her from slavery, and avenge her of her tyrants!"

So spoke Germany to Charles V through the instrumentalty of the knight. The emperor paid no attention to the letter; perhaps threw it disdainfully from him to one of his secretaries. He was a Fleming, and not a German. Personal aggrandisement—not the liberty and glory of the empire—was the object of all his desires.

CHAPTER VII.

Departure for the Diet of Worms—Luther's Adieu—His Condemnation—Published—Cavalcade near Erfurt—Meeting of Jonas and Luther—Luther in his old Convent—Luther Preaches at Erfurt—Incident—Faith and Works—Concourse of People—Luther's Courage—Luther to Spalatin—Halt at Frankfurt—Fears at Worms—Plan of the Imperialists—Luther's Firmness.

THE 2nd of April had arrived, and Luther behoved to take leave of his friends. After writing a note to Lange, to intimate that he would spend the following Thursday or Friday at Erfurt, he bade adieu to his colleagues. Turning to Melancthon, he said to him, in a tone which betrayed emotion: "If I do not return, and my enemies put me to death, O my brother, cease not to teach, and remain firm in the truth. Labour in my stead, since I shall not be able to labour any longer for myself. If you live, it matters little though I perish." Then, committing himself to the hand of Him who is faithful and true, Luther took his seat, and quitted Wittenberg. The town council had provided him with a modest carriage with a cloth covering, which might be put on or off at pleasure. The imperial herald, clad in his insignia, and wearing the imperial eagle, was on horseback in front, followed by his servant. Next followed Luther, Schurff, Amsdorff, and Suaven, in their carriage. The friends of the Gospel, the citizens of Wittenberg, in deep emotion, were invoking God, and shedding tears. Such was Luther's departure.

He soon observed that the hearts of those whom he met were filled with gloomy forebodings. At Leipsic no honour was paid to him. He only received the usual present of wine. At Naumburg he met a priest, probably J. Langer, a man of stern zeal, who carefully preserved in his study the portrait of the famous Jerome Savonarola of Ferrara, who was burnt at Florence in 1498, by order of Pope Alexander VI., as a martyr to liberty and morality, as well as a confessor of evangelical truth. Having taken the portrait of the Italian martyr, the priest came up to Luther, and held out the portrait to him without speaking. Luther understood what the dumb figure intimated; but his intrepid soul remained firm. "It is Satan," said he, "who, by these terrors, would fain prevent a confession of the truth from being made in the assembly of the princes, because he foresees the blow which this will give to his kingdom." "Adhere firmly to the truth which thou hast perceived," said then the priest to him gravely, "and thy God will also adhere firmly to thee."

Having spent the night at Naumburg, where the burgo-master had hospitably entertained him, Luther arrived next evening at Weimar. He was scarcely a moment there when he heard loud cries in all directions. They were publishing his condemnation. "Look!" said the herald to him. He looked, and his astonished eyes beheld imperial messengers traversing the town, and posting up the imperial edict, which ordered his writings to be laid before the magistrates. Luther had no doubt that these harsh measures were exhibited beforehand, to deter him from coming, that he might afterwards be condemned for having refused to appear. "Well, doctor, will you go on?" said the imperial herald to him in alarm.—"Yes," replied Luther, "though put under interdict in every town, I will go on: I confide in the emperor's safe-conduct."

At Weimar Luther had an audience of the elector's brother, Duke John, who was then residing there. The prince invited him to preach. He consented; and from his heart, now under deep emotion, came forth the words of life. John Voit, the friend of Frederick Myconius, a Franciscan monk, heard him; and being converted to evangelical doctrine, quitted the convent two years after. At a later period he became professor of theology at Wittenberg. The duke gave Luther the money necessary for his journey.

From Weimar the reformer proceeded to Erfurt. It was the town of his youth; and he hoped to see his friend Lange, provided, as he had written him, he could enter the town without danger. He was still three or four leagues off, near the village of Nora, when he saw a troop of horsemen appear in the distance. Were they friends, or were they enemies? Shortly Crotus, the rector of the university, Eobanus Hesse, Melancthon's friend, whom Luther called the king of poets, Euricus Cordus, John Draco, and others, to the number of forty, members of the senate, the university, and the municipality, all on horseback, saluted him with acclamation. A multitude of the inhabitants of Erfurt covered the road, and gave loud expression to their joy. All were eager to see the mighty man who had ventured to declare war against the pope.

A young man of twenty-eight, named Justus Jonas, had got the start of the party. Jonas, after studying law at Erfurt, had been appointed rector of the university in 1519. Illumined by the evangelical light, which then radiated in all directions, he felt desirous to become a theologian. "I believe," wrote Erasmus to him, "that God has elected you as an instrument to spread the glory of His Son Jesus." All Jonas's thoughts were turned to Wittenberg and Luther. Some years before, when only a student of law, being of an active enterprising spirit, he had set out on foot, accompanied by some friends; and in order to reach Erasmus, then at Brussels, had traversed forests invested by robbers, and towns ravaged by the plague. Will he not now confront other dangers in order to accompany the reformer to Worms? He earnestly begged the favour, and Luther consented. Thus met these two doctors, who were to labour through life in the renovation of the Church. Divine Providence gathered around Luther men destined to be the light of Germany: the Melanctons, the Amsdorffs, the Bugenhagens, the Jonases. On his return from Worms, Jonas was appointed provost of the Church of Wittenberg, and doctor in theology. "Jonas," said Luther, "is a man whose life would deserve to be purchased at a large price, in order to detain him on the earth." No preacher ever surpassed him in the gift of captivating his hearers. "Pomeranus is an expositor," said Melancton, "and I am a dialectician,—Jonas is an orator. The words flow from his lips with surpassing grace; and his eloquence is overpowering. But Luther is beyond us all." It seems that nearly about the same time a companion of Luther's childhood, one of his brothers, joined the escort.

The deputation turned their steeds, and horsemen and footmen surrounding Luther's carriage, entered the town of Erfurt. At the gate, in the squares and streets, where the poor monk had so often begged his bread, the crowd of spectators was immense. Luther dismounted at the Augustine convent, where the Gospel had consoled his heart. Lange received him with joy; Usingen, and some of the more aged fathers, shewed great coolness. There was a general desire to hear him preach; and though he was interdicted from doing it, the herald himself could not resist the desire, and consented.

Sunday after Easter the Augustine church at Erfurt was crowded. That friar who formerly opened the doors and swept the church, mounted the pulpit, and having opened the Bible, read these words: Peace be with you. And when He had so said, He shewed them His hands and His side, (John xx. 19, 20.) "All the philosophers, doctors, and writers," said he, "have exerted themselves to shew how man may obtain eternal life, and have not succeeded. I will now tell you."

This has, in all ages, been the great question; accordingly, Luther's hearers redoubled their attention.

"There are two kinds of works," continued the reformer; "works foreign to ourselves,—these are good works; and our own works,—these are of little value. One builds a church; another goes on a pilgrimage to St. James's or St. Peter's; a third fasts, prays, takes the cowl, walks barefoot; a fourth does something else. All these works are nothing, and will perish; for our own works have no efficacy in them. But I am now going to tell you what is the genuine work. God raised a man again from the dead, even the Lord Jesus Christ, that He might crush death, destroy sin, and shut the gates of hell. Such is the work of salvation. The devil thought that he had the Lord in his power when he saw Him between the two thieves, suffering the most ignominious martyrdom, accused of God and men. . . . But the Divinity displayed its power, and annihilated sin, death, and hell. . . .

"Christ has vanquished,—this is the grand news,—and we are saved by His work, not by our own. The pope gives a very different account. But I maintain that the holy mother of God herself was saved neither by her virginity nor maternity, neither by her purity nor her works; but solely by means of faith, and by the works of God." . . .

While Luther was speaking, a sudden noise was heard,—one of the galleries gave a crack, and seemed as if it were going to give way under the pressure of the crowd. Some rushed out, and others sat still, terror-struck. The orator stopped for a moment, and then, stretching out his hand, exclaimed, with a loud voice: "Fear nothing! there is no danger; the devil is seeking, in this way, to prevent me from proclaiming the Gospel; but he shall not succeed." At these words, those who were running out, stopped astonished and rivetted to the spot; the assembly calmed, and Luther, without troubling himself with the attempts of the devil, continued: "You will, perhaps, say to me, You tell us a great deal about faith. Tell us, also, how we can obtain it. Yes; well, I will tell you. Our Lord Jesus Christ says: Peace be with you; behold my hands,—in other words, 'Behold, O man! it is I—I alone—who have taken away thy sin, and ransomed thee; and now thou hast peace, saith the Lord.'

"I did not eat the fruit of the tree," resumed Luther; "neither did you eat it; but we received the sin which Adam has transmitted to us, and are guilty of it. In like manner, I did not suffer on the cross, nor did you suffer on it; but Christ suffered for us; we are justified by the work of God, and not by our own. . . . I am (saith the Lord) thy righteousness and thy redemption."

"Let us believe the Gospel, let us believe St. Paul, and not the letters and decretals of the popes."

Luther, after having preached faith as the means of the sinner's justification, preaches works as the consequence and evidence of salvation.

"Since God has saved us," continues he, "let us so order our works that he may take pleasure in them. Art thou rich?—let thy wealth be useful to the poor. Art thou poor?—let thy service be useful to the rich. If thy toil is useful only to thyself, the service which thou pretendest to render to God is mere falsehood."

There is not a word in the sermon on Luther himself; no allusion to the circumstances in which he is placed; nothing on Worms, on Charles, or the nuncios; he preaches Christ, and Christ only. At this moment, when the world has its eyes upon him, he is not in the least occupied with himself; and herein is the mark of a genuine servant of God.

Luther set out from Erfurt, and passed through Gotha, where he again preached. Myconius adds, that at the moment when the people were coming out from the sermon, the devil detached from the pediment of the church some stones which had not budged for two centuries. The doctor slept in the convent of the Benedictines, at Reinhardtsbrunn, and thence proceeded to Eisenach, where he felt indisposed. Amsdorff, Jonas, Schurff, and all his friends, were alarmed. He was bled; and the greatest possible attention was paid him. Even the schultheiss of the town, John Oswald, hastened to him with a cordial. Luther, after drinking it, fell asleep, and was thereby so far recovered that he was able to proceed on the following day.

Wherever he passed the people flocked to see him. His journey was a kind of triumphal procession. Deep interest was felt in beholding the intrepid man who was on the way to offer his head to the emperor and the empire. An immense concourse surrounded him. "Ah!" said some of them to him, "there are so many cardinals and so many bishops at Worms, they will burn you; they will reduce your body to ashes, as was done with that of John Huss." But nothing terrified the monk. "Were they to make a fire," said he, "that would extend from Worms to Wittemberg, and reach even to the sky, I would walk across it in the name of the Lord; I would appear before them; I would walk into the jaws of this Behemoth, and break his teeth, and confess the Lord Jesus Christ."

One day, when just going into an inn, and while the crowd were as usual pressing around him, an officer came up to him and said: "Are you the man who undertakes to reform the papacy? How will you succeed?"—"Yes," replied Luther, "I am the man. I confide in Almighty God, whose word and command I have before me." The officer, affected, gave him a milder look, and said: "Dear friend, there is something in what you say. I am the servant of Charles; but your Master is greater than mine. He will aid you and guard you." Such was the impression which Luther produced. Even his enemies were struck at the sight of the multitudes that thronged around him, though they have painted the journey in different colours. At length the doctor arrived at Frankfort, on Sunday, 14th April.

News of Luther's advance had reached Worms. The friends of the pope had thought he would not obey the summons of the emperor. Albert, cardinal-archbishop of Mentz, would have given anything to stop him by the way; and new schemes were set on foot for this purpose.

Luther, on his arrival at Frankfort, took some repose, and then announced his approach to Spalatin, who was at Worms with the elector. It is the only letter which he wrote during his journey. "I am getting on," says he, "though Satan has striven to stop me on the way by sickness. From Eisenach to this I have never been without a feeling of languor, and am still completely worn out. I learn that Charles has published an edict to frighten me. But Christ lives, and we shall enter Worms in spite of all the barriers of hell and all the powers of the air. Therefore make ready my lodging."

The next day Luther visited the learned school of William Nesse, a celebrated geographer of that time. "Be diligent," said he to the scholars, "in the reading of the Scriptures, and the investigation of truth." Then, placing his right hand on the head of one of the children, and his left on another, he pronounced a blessing on the whole school.

While Luther blessed the young, he was also the hope of the old. Catherine of Holzhausen, a widow advanced in years, and serving God, went to him and said: "My father and mother told me that God would raise up a man who should oppose the papal vanities, and save the Word of God. I hope you are that man, and I wish you, for your work, the grace and the Holy Spirit of God."

These were by no means the sentiments universally entertained at Frankfort. John Cochleus, dean of the church of Notre Dame, was one of those most devoted to the Roman Church. On seeing Luther pass through Frankfort on his way to Worms, he could not suppress his fears. He thought the Church was in want of devoted defenders; and scarcely had Luther quitted the town, than Cochleus set out in his track, ready, as he says, to give his life in defence of the honour of the Church.

There was great alarm in the camp of the pope's friends. The heresiarch was at hand,—every day, every hour brought him nearer Worms. If he entered, all was perhaps lost. The Archbishop Albert, the confessor Glapio, and all the politicians about the emperor, felt uneasy. How can the arrival of this monk be prevented? It is impossible to carry him off, for he has the emperor's safe-conduct. Stratagem alone can arrest him. These intriguers immediately arranged the following plan. The emperor's confessor and his high chamberlain, Paul of Arnoldsdorff, quit Worms in great haste, and proceed about ten leagues distant, to the castle of Ebernburg, the residence of Francis de Seckingen, the knight who had offered Luther an asylum. Bucer, a young Dominican, chaplain to the Elector-Palatine, and who had been gained to the evangelical doctrine at the Heidelberg discussion, had then taken refuge in "this hotel of the just." The knight, who had no great knowledge of the affairs of religion, was easily imposed upon, while the disposition of the Palatine chaplain favoured the designs of the confessor. In fact, Bucer was inclined to pacific measures. Distinguishing between fundamental and secondary points, he thought he might sacrifice the latter to unity and peace.

The chamberlain and confessor begin their attack. They give Seckingen and Bucer to understand that it is all over with Luther if he goes to Worms. They assure him that the emperor is ready to send certain learned men to Ebernburg, there to confer with the doctor. "Under your charge," say they to the knight, "the two parties will be placed." "We are at one with Luther on all essential points," say they to Bucer: "only some secondary points remain; and as to these you will be mediator." The knight and the chaplain are shaken. The confessor and chamberlain continue. "The invitation addressed to Luther must come from you," say they to Seckingen; "and let Bucer be the bearer of it." Everything was arranged according to their wish. Let Luther only be credulous enough to come to Ebernburg; his safe-conduct will soon expire, and then, who will be able to defend him?

Luther had arrived at Oppenheim. His safe-conduct was available only for three days longer. He sees a troop of horsemen approaching, and soon recognises at their head the Bucer with whom he had such intimate conference at Heidelberg. "These horsemen belong to Francis of Seckingen," said Bucer to him, after the first expressions of friendship. "He sends me to you to conduct you to his strong castle. The emperor's confessor is desirous of a conference with you. His influence over Charles is unbounded; everything may be arranged. But beware of Alexander!" Jonas, Arnoldsdorff, and Schurrff, knew not what to think; Bucer insisted; but Luther hesitated not. "I continue my journey," was his answer to Bucer; "and if the emperor's confessor has anything to say to me, he will find me at Worms. I go where I am called."

Meanwhile Spalatin himself began to be troubled and afraid. Surrounded at Worms by the enemies of the Reformation, he heard them saying that no respect should be paid to the safe-conduct of a heretic. He became alarmed for his friend; and at the moment when the latter was approaching the town, a messenger presented himself, and said to him, on the part of the chaplain, "Don't enter Worms!" This from his best friend, the elector's confidant, Spalatin himself! Luther, unmoved, turns his eye on the messenger, and replies: "Go and tell your master, that were there as many devils in Worms as there are tiles upon the roofs, I would enter." Never, perhaps, was Luther so grand. The envoy returned to Worms with his extraordinary message. "I was then intrepid," said Luther a few days before his death; "I feared nothing. God can give man such boldness; I know not if at present I would have as much liberty and joy."—"When the cause is good," adds his disciple Mathesius, "the heart expands, giving courage and energy to evangelists and soldiers."

At length, on the morning of the 16th April, Luther perceived the walls of the ancient city. All were looking for him, and there was only one thought in Worms. The young noblemen, Bernard of Hirschfeld and Albert of Lindenau, with six cavaliers, and other gentlemen in the suite of the princes, to the number of a hundred—if we may believe Pallavicini—unable to restrain their impatience, galloped to meet him, and surrounded him, in order to escort him at the moment of his entry. He approached. Before him pranced the imperial herald, decked in all the insignia of his office. Next came Luther in his humble carriage. Jonas followed on horseback, surrounded by the cavaliers. A large crowd was waiting in front of the gates. It was near mid-day when he passed those walls which so many persons had foretold him he should never leave. It was the dinner hour; but the moment when the sentinel stationed in the cathedral steeple tolled the signal, everybody ran into the street to see the monk. Thus was Luther in Worms.

Two thousand persons accompanied him through the streets: there was a rush to meet him. The crowd was increasing every moment, and was much larger than when the emperor made his entry. Suddenly, relates a historian, a man clad in a singular dress, and carrying a large cross before him, as is usual at funerals, breaks off from the crowd, advances towards Luther, and then, in a loud voice, and with the plaintive cadence which is used in saying mass for the repose of the souls of the dead, chants the following stanzas, as if he had been determined that the very dead should hear them:—

Advenisti, O desiderabilis!
Quem expectamus in tenebris! 1

1 Thou hast arrived—thou whom we longed and waited for in darkness.

Luther's arrival is celebrated by a requiem. If the story is true, it was the court fool of one of the dukes of Bavaria who gave Luther one of those warnings, remarkable at once for wisdom and irony, of which so many instances are furnished by these individuals. But the clamour of the multitude soon drowned the De Profundis of the cross-bearer.

The train could scarcely proceed through the moving mass. At length the imperial herald stopped before the hotel of the Knights of Rhodes. Here lodged two of the elector's councillors,—Frederick of Thun and Philip of Feilitsch, as well as the marshal of the empire, Ulrich of Pappenheim. Luther got out of his carriage, and, on alighting, said: "The Lord will be my defence." . . . "I entered Worms," said he afterwards, "in a covered car in my frock. Everybody ran into the street to see Friar Martin."

The news of his arrival filled the Elector of Saxony and Alexander with alarm. The young and elegant Archbishop Albert, who held a mean between those two parties, was amazed at Luther's boldness. "Had I not had more courage than he," said Luther, "it is true I never should have been seen in Worms."

Charles V. immediately assembled his council. The councillors in the emperor's confidence repaired in haste to the palace, for they, too, were in dismay. "Luther is arrived," said Charles; "what must be done?"

Modo, bishop of Palermo and chauceilor of Flanders, —if we are to receive Luther's own statement,—replied: "We have long consulted on this subject. Let your imperial majesty speedily get rid of this man. Did not Sigismund cause John Huss to be burnt? There is no obligation either to give or observe a safe-conduct to a heretic." "No," said Charles; "what has been promised must be performed." There was nothing for it, therefore, but to make the reformer appear.

While the councils of the great were thus agitated on the subject of Luther, there were many men in Worms who rejoiced that they were able at length to behold this illustrious servant of God. In the first rank among them was Capito, chaplain and councillor to the Archbishop of Mentz. This remarkable man, who, a short time before, had preached the Gospel in Switzerland with great freedom,¹ thought it due to the place which he then occupied to pursue a course which exposed him to a charge of cowardice from the Evangelists, and of dissimulation from the Romans. He had, however, preached the doctrine of faith clearly at Mentz; and on his departure, had succeeded in supplying his place by a young preacher full of zeal, named Hedio. In this town—the ancient see of the primate of the German Church—the Word of God was not bound. The Gospel was eagerly listened to; in vain did the monks strive to preach the Gospel after their own way, and employ all the means in their power in order to arrest the general impulse; they had no success. But Capito, even while he preached the new doctrine, laboured to continue in friendship with those who persecuted it. He flattered himself, with others of the same sentiments, that he would thus be of great utility to the Church. To hear them talk, it might have been supposed that, if Luther was not burnt, if all the Lutherans were not excommunicated, it was owing entirely to Capito's influence over the Archbishop Albert. Coehleus, dean of Frankfort, arriving at Worms almost at the same time with Luther, immediately waited upon Capito, who being, apparently at least, on very good terms with Alexander, introduced Coehleus to him, thus serving as a connecting link between the two greatest enemies of the reformer. Capito, doubtless, thought that he would do great service to the cause of Christ by all this management; but it cannot be said that any good resulted from it. The event almost always belies these calculations of human wisdom, and proves that a decided course, while it is the most frank, is also the most wise.

Meanwhile, the crowd continued around the hotel of Rhodes, at which Luther had alighted. Some looked upon him as a prodigy of wisdom, and others as a monster of iniquity. The whole town wished to see him. The first hours were left him to recover from his fatigue, and converse with his most intimate friends; but as soon as evening came, counts, barons, knights, gentlemen, ecclesiastics, and citizens, flocked in upon him. All, even his greatest enemies, were struck with the bold step he had taken, the joy which appeared to animate him, the power of his eloquence, and the lofty elevation and enthusiasm which made the influence of this simple monk almost irresistible. Many attributed this grandeur to something within him partaking of the Divine; while the friends of the pope loudly declared that he was possessed with a devil. Call followed call, and the crowd of curious visitors kept Luther standing to a late period of the night.

The next morning (Friday, 17th April.) Ulrich of Pappenheim, hereditary marshal of the empire, summoned him to appear at four o'clock, p.m., in presence of his imperial majesty and the states of the empire. Luther received the summons with profound respect.

Thus everything is fixed, and Luther is going to appear for Jesus Christ before the most august assembly in the world. He was not without encouragement. The ardent knight, Ulrich von Hütten, was then in the castle of Ebernburg. Not being able to appear at Worms,—for Leo X. had asked Charles to send him to Rome bound hand and foot,—he desired to stretch out a friendly hand to Luther; and on the same day (17th April) wrote to him, borrowing the words of a king of Israel: "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble; the name of the God of Jacob defend thee: send thee help from the sanctuary, and strengthen thee out of Zion: remember all thy offerings, and accept thy burnt sacrifice." (Psalm xx.) O dearly beloved Luther! my respected father, fear not, and be strong. The council of the wicked has beset you; they have opened their mouths upon you like roaring lions. But the Lord will rise up against the wicked and scatter them. Fight, then, valiantly for Christ. As for me, I also will fight boldly. Would to God I were permitted to see the wrinkling of their brows. But the Lord will cleanse His vine, which the wild boar of the forest has laid waste. . . . May Christ preserve you!"

Bucer did what Hütten was unable to do; he came from Ebernburg to Worms, and remained the whole time beside his friend.

Four o'clock having struck, the marshal of the empire presented himself. It was necessary to set out, and Luther made ready. He was moved at the thought of the august congress before which he was going to appear. The herald walked first; after him the marshal; and last the reformer. The multitude thronging the streets was still more numerous than on the previous evening. It was impossible to get on; it was in vain to cry, Give place!—the crowd increased. At length, the herald, seeing the impossibility of reaching the town hall, caused some private houses to be opened, and conducted Luther through gardens and secret passages to the place of meeting. The people, perceiving this, rushed into the houses on the steps of the monk of Wittemberg, or placed themselves at the windows which looked into the gardens, while great numbers of persons got up on the roofs. The tops of the houses, the pavement, every place above and below, was covered with spectators.

MARTIN BUCER.

Arrived at length at the town, Luther and those who accompanied him were again unable, because of the crowd, to reach the door. Give way! give way! Not one stirred. At last the imperial soldiers forced a passage for Luther. The people rushed forward to get in after him, but the soldiers kept them back with their halberds. Luther got into the interior of the building, which was completely filled with people. As well in the antechambers as at the windows there were more than five thousand spectators,—German, Italian, Spanish, &c. Luther advanced with difficulty. As he was at length approaching the door which was to bring him in presence of his judges, he met a valiant knight,—the celebrated general, George of Freundsberg,—who, four years afterwards, at the head of the German lansquenets, couched his lance on the field of Pavia, and bearing down upon the left wing of the French army, drove it into the Tessino, and, in a great measure, decided the captivity of the King of France.

The old general, seeing Luther pass, clapped him on the shoulder, and shaking his head, whitened in battle, kindly said to him: "Poor monk! poor monk! you have before you a march, and an affair, the like to which neither I nor a great many captains have ever seen in the bloodiest of our battles. But if your cause is just, and you have full confidence in it, advance in the name of God, and fear nothing. God will not forsake you." A beautiful homage borne by warlike courage to courage of intellect. It is the saying of a king: He that ruleth his spirit is greater than he that taketh a city, (Proverbs xvi. 32.)

At length, the doors of the hall being opened, Luther entered, and many persons not belonging to the diet made their way in along with him. Never had man appeared before an assembly so august. The Emperor Charles V., whose dominions embraced the old and the new world; his brother, the Archduke Ferdinand; six electors of the empire, whose descendants are now almost all wearing the crown of kings; twenty-four dukes, the greater part of them reigning over territories of greater or less extent, and among whom are some bearing a name which will afterwards become formidable to the Reformation, (the Duke of Alva, and his two sons;) eight margraves; thirty archbishops, bishops, or prelates; seven ambassadors, among them those of the kings of France and England; the deputies of ten free towns; a great number of princes, counts, and sovereign barons; the nuncios of the pope;—in all, two hundred and four personages. Such was the court before which Martin Luther appeared.

This appearance was in itself a signal victory gained over the papacy. The pope had condemned the man; yet here he stood before a tribunal which thus far placed itself above the pope. The pope had put him under his ban, debarring him from all human society, and yet here he was convened in honourable terms, and admitted before the most august assembly in the world. The pope had ordered that his mouth should be for ever mute, and he was going to open it before an audience of thousands, assembled from the remotest quarters of Christendom. An immense revolution had thus been accomplished by the instrumentality of Luther Rome was descending from her throne—descending at the bidding of a monk.

Some of the princes, seeing the humble son of the miner of Mansfeld disconcerted in presence of the assembly of kings, kindly approached him, and one of them said: Fear not them who can kill the body, but cannot kill the soul. Another added: When you will be brought before kings it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you. Thus the reformer was consoled, in the very words of his Master, by the instrumentality of the rulers of the world.

During this time the guards were making way for Luther, who advanced till he came in front of the throne of Charles V. The sight of the august assembly seemed for a moment to dazzle and overawe him. All eyes were fixed upon him. The agitation gradually calmed down into perfect silence. "Don't speak before you are asked," said the marshal of the empire to him, and withdrew.

After a moment of solemn stillness, John of Eck, the chancellor of the Archbishop of Trèves,—a friend of Aleander, and who must not be confounded with the theologian of the same name,—rose up and said, in a distinct and audible voice, first in Latin, and then in German: "Martin Luther, his sacred and invincible imperial majesty has cited you before his throne, by the advice and counsel of the states of the holy Roman empire, in order to call upon you to answer these two questions: First, Do you admit that these books were composed by you?"—At the same time the imperial orator pointed to about twenty books lying on the table in the middle of the hall, in front of Luther. "I did not exactly know how they had procured them," says Luther, in relating the circumstance. It was Aleander who had taken the trouble. "Secondly," continued the chancellor: "Do you mean to retract these books and their contents, or do you persist in the things which you have advanced in them?"

Luther, without hesitation, was going to reply in the affirmative to the former question, when his counsel, Jerome Schurff, hastily interfering, called out: "Read the titles of the books." The chancellor, going up to the table, read the titles. The list contained several devotional works not relating to controversy.

After the enumeration, Luther said, first in Latin, and then in German:

"Most gracious emperor!—gracious princes and lords!

"His imperial majesty asks me two questions.

"As to the first, I acknowledge that the books which have been named are mine: I cannot deny them.

"As to the second, considering that is a question which concerns faith and the salvation of souls,—a question in which the Word of God is interested; in other words, the greatest and most precious treasure either in heaven or on the earth,—I should act imprudently were I to answer without reflection. I might say less than the occasion requires, or more than the truth demands, and thus incur the guilt which our Saviour denounced when He said: Whoso shall deny me before men, him will I deny before my Father who is in heaven. Wherefore, I pray your imperial majesty, with all submission, to give me time, that I may answer without offence to the Word of God."

This reply, far from countenancing the idea that there was any hesitation in Luther, was worthy of the reformer and the assembly. It became him to shew calmness and circumspection in so grave a matter, and to refrain, on this solemn moment, from everything that might seem to indicate passion or levity. Moreover, by taking a suitable time, he would thereby the better prove the immovable firmness of his resolution. History shews us many men who, by a word uttered too hastily, brought great calamities on themselves, and on the world. Luther curbs his naturally impetuous character,—restrains a tongue always ready to give utterance,—is silent when all the feelings of his heart are longing to embody themselves in words. This self-restraint, this calmness, so extraordinary in such a man, increased his power a hundred-fold, and put him into a position to answer afterwards with a wisdom, power, and dignity, which will disappoint the expectation of his enemies, and confound their pride and malice.

Nevertheless, as he had spoken in a respectful and somewhat subdued tone, several thought he was hesitating, and even afraid. A ray of hope gleamed into the souls of the partisans of Rome. Charles, impatient to know the man whose words shook the empire, had never taken his eye off him. Now turning towards one of his courtiers, he said with disdain: "Assuredly, that is not the man who would ever make me turn heretic." Then, rising up, the young emperor withdrew with his ministers to the council chamber; the electors with the princes were closeted in another; and the deputies of the free towns in a third. The diet, when it again met, agreed to grant Luther's request. It was a great mistake in men under the influence of passion. "Martin Luther," said the Chancellor of Trèves, "his imperial majesty, in accordance with the goodness which is natural to him, is pleased to grant you another day; but on condition that you give your reply verbally, and not in writing."

Then the imperial herald advanced and reconducted Luther to his hotel. Menaces and cheers succeeded each other as he passed along. The most unfavourable reports were circulated among Luther's friends. "The diet is dissatisfied," said they; "the envoys of the pope triumph; the reformer will be sacrificed." Men's passions grew hot. Several gentlemen hastened to Luther's lodgings. "Doctor," asked they in deep emotion, "how does the matter stand? It is confidently said that they mean to burn you." "That won't be," continued they, "or they shall pay for it with their lives."—"And that would have been the result," said Luther, twenty years later, at Eisleben, when quoting these expressions.

On the other hand, Luther's enemies were quite elated. "He has asked time," said they; "he will retract. When at a distance he spoke arrogantly; but now his courage fails him. . . . He is vanquished."

Luther, perhaps, was the only tranquil person in Worms. A few moments after his return from the diet, he wrote to the imperial councillor, Cuspianus: "I write you from the midst of tumult, (meaning, probably, the noise of the crowd outside his hotel;) I have, within this hour, appeared before the emperor and his brother. I have acknowledged the authorship, and declared that to-morrow I will give my answer concerning retraction. By the help of Jesus Christ, not one iota of all my works will I retract."

The excitement of the people, and of the foreign troops, increased every hour. While parties were proceeding calmly to the business of the diet, others were coming to blows in the streets. The Spanish soldiers, proud and merciless, gave offence by their insolence to the burghers of the town. One of these satellites of Charles, finding in a bookseller's shop the papal bull, with a commentary on it by Hütten, took and tore it to pieces, and then trampled the fragments under his feet. Others, having discovered several copies of Luther's "Captivity of Babylon," carried them off and tore them. The people, indignant, rushed upon the soldiers, and obliged them to take flight. On another occasion, a Spanish horseman, with drawn sword, was seen in one of the principal streets of Worms in pursuit of a German who was fleeing before him, while the people durst not interfere.

Some politicians thought they had discovered a method of saving Luther. "Recant your errors in doctrine," said they to him; "but persist in all you have said against the pope and his court, and you are safe." Aleander shuddered at this advice. But Luther, immovable in his purpose, declared that he set little value on a political reform, if not founded on faith.

The 18th of April having arrived, Glapio, the Chancellor Eck, and Aleander, met at an early hour, by order of Charles V., to fix the course of procedure in regard to Luther.

Luther had been for a moment overawed by the evening before when he had to appear before so august an assembly. His heart had been agitated at the sight of so many princes, before whom great kingdoms humbly bent the knee. The thought that he was going to refuse obedience to men whom God had invested with sovereign power, gave him deep concern; and he felt the necessity of seeking strength from a higher source. "He who, attacked by the enemy, holds the shield of faith," said he one day, "is like Perseus holding the head of the Gorgon, on which whoever looked, that moment died. So ought we to hold up the Son of God against the snares of the devil." On this morning of the 18th April, he had moments of trouble, when the face of God was hid from him. His faith becomes faint; his enemies seem to multiply before him; his imagination is overpowered. . . . His soul is like a ship tossed by a violent tempest,—now plunged to the depths of the sea, and again mounting up towards heaven. At this hour of bitter sorrow, when he drinks the cup of Christ, and feels, as it were, in a garden of Gethsemane, he turns his face to the ground, and sends forth broken cries—cries which we cannot comprehend, unless we figure to ourselves the depth of the agony from which they ascended up to God: "God Almighty!—God Eternal!—how terrible is the world! how it opens its mouth to swallow me up! and how defective my confidence in thee! How weak the flesh! how powerful Satan! If I must put my hope in that which the world calls powerful, I am undone! . . . The knell is struck, and judgment is pronounced! . . . O God!—O God! O thou, my God! assist me against all the wisdom of the world! Do it: thou must do it. . . . Thou alone; . . . for it is not my work, but thine. I have nothing to do here,—I have nothing to do contending thus with the mighty of the world! I, too, would like to spend tranquil and happy days. But the cause is thine; and it is just and everlasting! O Lord! be my help. Faithful God! immutable God! I trust not in any man. That were vain. All that is of man vacillates! All that comes of man gives way! O God! O God! dost thou not hear? . . . My God! art thou dead? . . . No; thou canst not die! Thou only hidest thyself! Thou hast chosen me for this work! I know it. Act, then, O God! . . . Stand by my side, for the sake of thy well-beloved Son Jesus Christ, who is my defence, my buckler, and my fortress!"

After a moment of silence and wrestling, he continues thus: "Lord, where standest thou? . . . O my God, where art thou? . . . Come! come! I am ready! . . . I am ready to give up my life for thy truth . . . patient as a lamb. For the cause is just, and it is thine! . . . I will not break off from thee, either now or through eternity! . . .

And though the world should be filled with devils, though my body—which, however, is the work of thy hands—should bite the dust, be racked on the wheel, cut in pieces. . . . ground to powder, . . . my soul is thine. Yes, thy Word is my pledge. My soul belongs to thee, and will be eternally near thee. . . . Amen. . . . O God, help me! . . . Amen."

This prayer explains Luther and the Reformation. History here lifts the veil of the sanctuary, and shews us the secret place whence strength and courage were imparted to this humble man, who was the instrument of God in emancipating the soul and the thoughts of men, and beginning a new era. Luther and the Reformation are here seen in actual operation. We perceive their most secret springs. We discover where their power lay. This meditation by one who is sacrificing himself to the cause of truth, is found among the collection of pieces relating to Luther's appearance at Worms, under Number XVI., among safe-conducts, and other documents of a similar description. Some of his friends, doubtless, extended it, and so have preserved it to us. In my opinion, it is one of the finest documents on record.

Luther, after he had thus prayed, found that peace of mind without which no man can do anything great. He read the Word of God; he glanced over his writings, and endeavoured to put his reply into proper shape. The thought that he was going to bear testimony to Jesus Christ and His Word, in presence of the emperor and the empire, filled his heart with joy. The moment of appearance was drawing near; he went up with emotion to the sacred volume, which was lying open on his table, put his left hand upon it, and lifting his right toward heaven, swore to remain faithful to the Gospel, and to confess his faith freely, should he even seal his confession with his blood. After doing so, he felt still more at peace.

At four o'clock the herald presented himself, and conducted him to the place where the diet sat. The general curiosity had increased, for the reply behoved to be decisive. The diet being engaged, Luther was obliged to wait in the court, in the middle of an immense crowd, who moved to and fro like a troubled sea, and pressed the reformer with its waves. The doctor spent two long hours amid this gazing multitude. "I was not used," says he, "to all these doings and all this noise." It would have been a sad preparation for an ordinary man. But Luther was with God. His eye was serene, his features unruffled; the Eternal had placed him upon a rock. Night began to fall, and the lamps were lighted in the hall of the diet. Their glare passed through the ancient windows and shone into the court. Everything assumed a solemn aspect. At last the doctor was introduced. Many persons entered with him; for there was an eager desire to hear his answer. All minds were on the stretch, waiting impatiently for the decisive moment which now approached. This time Luther was free, calm, self-possessed, and shewed not the least appearance of being under constraint. Prayer had produced its fruits. The princes having taken their seats,—not without difficulty, for their places were almost invaded,—and the monk of Wittenberg again standing in front of Charles V., the chancellor of the Elector of Trèves rose up, and said:—

“Martin Luther! you yesterday asked a delay, which is now expired. Assuredly it might have been denied you, since every one ought to be sufficiently instructed in matters of faith, to be able always to render an account of it to whosoever asks,—you above all, so great and able a doctor of Holy Scripture.

Now, then, reply to the question of his majesty, who has treated you with so much mildness: Do you mean to defend your books out and out, or do you mean to retract some part of them?”

These words, which the chancellor had spoken in Latin, he repeated in German.

“Then Doctor Martin Luther,” say the Acts of Worms, “replied in the most humble and submissive manner. He did not raise his voice; he spoke not with violence, but with candour, meekness, suitability, and modesty, and yet with great joy and Christian firmness.”

“Most serene emperor! illustrious princes! gracious lords!” said Luther, turning his eyes on Charles and the assembly, “I this day appear humbly before you, according to the order which was given me yesterday; and by the mercies of God, I implore your majesty and august highnesses, to listen kindly to the defence of a cause which I am assured is righteous and true. If, from ignorance, I am wanting in the usages and forms of courts, pardon me; for I was not brought up in the palaces of kings, but in the obscurity of a cloister.

Yesterday, two questions were asked me on the part of his imperial majesty: the first, if I was the author of the books whose titles were read; the second, if I was willing to recall or to defend the doctrine which I have taught in them. I answered the first question, and I adhere to my answer.

As to the second, I have composed books on very different subjects. In some, I treat of faith and good works in a manner so pure, simple, and Christian, that my enemies even, far from finding anything to censure, confess that these writings are useful, and worthy of being read by the godly. The papal bull, how severe soever it may be, acknowledges this. Were I then to retract these, what should I do? . . . Wretch! I should be alone among men, abandoning truths which the unanimous voice of my friends and enemies approves, and opposing what the whole world glories in confessing.

In the second place, I have composed books against the papacy—books in which I have attacked those who, by their false doctrine, their bad life, and scandalous example, desolate the Christian world, and destroy both body and soul. Is not the fact proved by the complaints of all who fear God? Is it not evident that the human laws and doctrines of the popes, entangle, torture, martyr the consciences of the faithful; while the clamant and never-ending extortions of Rome engulf the wealth and riches of Christendom, and particularly of this illustrious kingdom?

Were I to retract what I have written on this subject, what should I do? . . . What but fortify that tyranny, and open a still wider door for these many and great iniquities? Then, breaking forth with more fury than ever, these arrogant men would be seen increasing, usurping, raging more and more. And the yoke which weighs upon the Christian people would, by my retraction, not only be rendered more severe, but would become, so to speak, more legitimate; for by this very retraction, it would have received the confirmation of your most serene majesty, and of all the states of the holy empire. Good God! I should thus be, as it were, an infamous cloak, destined to hide and cover all sorts of malice and tyranny.

Thirdly, and lastly, I have written books against private individuals who wished to defend Roman tyranny and to destroy the faith. I confess frankly that I have perhaps attacked them with more violence than became my ecclesiastical profession. I do not regard myself as a saint; but no more can I retract these books: because, by so doing, I should sanction the impiety of my opponents, and give them occasion to oppress the people of God with still greater cruelty.

“Still I am a mere man, and not God; and I will defend myself as Jesus Christ did. He said: If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil, (John xviii. 23.) How much more should I, who am but dust and ashes, and so apt to err, desire every one to state what he can against my doctrine!

Wherefore, I implore you, by the mercies of God, you, most serene emperor, and you, most illustrious princes, and all others of high or low degree, to prove to me by the writings of the prophets and the apostles that I am mistaken. As soon as this shall have been proved, I will forthwith retract all my errors, and be the first to seize my writings and cast them into the flames.

What I have just said shews clearly, I think, that I have well considered and weighed the dangers to which I expose myself; but, far from being alarmed, it gives me great joy to see that the Gospel is now, as in former times, a cause of trouble and discord. This is the characteristic and the destiny of the Word of God. I came not to send peace, but a sword, said Jesus Christ, (Matt. x. 34.) God is wonderful and terrible in working: let us beware, while pretending to put a stop to discord, that we do not persecute the holy Word of God, and bring in upon ourselves a frightful deluge of insurmountable dangers, present disasters, and eternal destruction. . . . Let us beware that the reign of this young and noble prince, the Emperor Charles, on whom, under God, we build such high hopes, do not only begin, but also continue and end under the most fatal auspices. I might cite examples taken from the oracles of God,” continues Luther, speaking in presence of the greatest monarch in the world with the noblest courage; “I might remind you of the Pharaohs, the kings of Babylon and of Israel, who never laboured more effectually for their ruin than when by counsels, apparently very wise, they thought they were establishing their empire. God removeth the mountains, and they know not, (Job iv. 5.)

If I speak thus, it is not because I think such great princes have need of my counsels, but because I wish to restore to Germany what she has a right to expect from her children. Thus, commending myself to your august majesty, and your serene highnesses, I humbly supplicate you not to allow the hatred of my enemies to bring down upon me an indignation which I have not deserved."¹

Luther had spoken these words in German, modestly, but also with much warmth and firmness. He was ordered to repeat them in Latin. The emperor had no liking for German. The imposing assembly which surrounded the reformer, the noise and excitement, had fatigued him. "I was covered with perspiration," says he, "heated by the crowd, standing in the midst of the princes." Frederick de Thun, confidential councillor of the Elector of Saxony, stationed by his master's order behind the reformer, to take care that he was not taken by surprise, or overborne, seeing the condition of the poor monk, said to him: "If you cannot repeat your address, that will do, doctor." But Luther, having paused a moment to take breath, resumed, and pronounced his address in Latin, with the same vigour as at first.

"This pleased the Elector Frederick exceedingly," relates the reformer.

As soon as he had ceased, the Chancellor of Trèves, the orator of the diet, said to him, indignantly: "You have not answered the question which was put to you. You are not here to throw doubt on what has been decided by councils. You are asked to give a clear and definite reply. Will you, or will you not, retract?" Luther then replied, without hesitation: "Since your most serene majesty, and your high mightinesses, call upon me for a simple, clear, and definite answer, I will give it; and it is this: I cannot subject my faith either to the pope or to councils, because it is clear as day, that they have often fallen into error, and even into great self-contradiction. If, then, I am not disapproved by passages of Scripture, or by clear arguments,—if I am not convinced by the very passages which I have quoted, and so bound in conscience to submit to the Word of God, I neither can nor will retract anything, for it is not safe for a Christian to speak against his conscience." Then, looking around on the assembly before which he was standing, and which held his life in its hands, "HERE I AM," says he, "I CANNOT DO OTHERWISE: GOD HELP ME! AMEN."

Thus Luther, constrained to obey his faith, led by his conscience to death, impelled by the noblest necessity, the slave of what he believes, but in this slavery supremely free, like to the ship tossed by a fearful tempest, which, in order to save something more precious than itself, is voluntarily allowed to dash itself to pieces against a rock, pronounces these sublime words, which have not lost their thrilling effect after the lapse of three centuries; thus speaks a monk before the emperor and the magnates of the empire; and this poor and feeble individual, standing alone, but leaning on the grace of the Most High, seems greater and stronger than them all. His Word has a power against which all these mighty men can do nothing. The empire and the Church, on the one side, the obscure individual on the other, have been confronted. God had assembled these kings and prelates that He might publicly bring their wisdom to nought. They have lost the battle, and the consequences of their defeat will be felt in all nations, and during all future ages.

The assembly were amazed. Several princes could scarcely conceal their admiration. The emperor, changing his first impression, exclaimed: "The monk speaks with an intrepid heart and immovable courage." The Spaniards and Italians alone felt disconcerted, and soon began to deride a magnanimity which they could not appreciate.

After the diet had recovered from the impression produced by the address, the chancellor resumed: "If you do not retract, the emperor and the states of the empire will consider what course they must adopt towards an obstinate heretic." At these words Luther's friends trembled; but the monk again said: "God help me; for I can retract nothing."

Luther then withdraws, and the princes deliberate. Every one felt that the moment formed a crisis in Christendom. The yea or nay of this monk was destined, perhaps for ages, to determine the condition of the Church and the world. It was wished to frighten him; but the effect had been to place him on a pedestal in presence of the nation. It was meant to give more publicity to his defeat; and all that had been done was to extend his victory. The partisans of Rome could not submit to bear their humiliation. Luther was recalled, and the orator thus addressed him: "Martin, you have not spoken with the modesty which became your office. The distinction you have made between your books was useless, for if you retract those which contain errors, the empire will not allow the others to be burnt. It is extravagant to insist on being refuted from Scripture, when you revive heresies which were condemned by the universal Council of Constance. The emperor, therefore, orders you to say simply, Do you mean to maintain what you have advanced, or do you mean to retract any part of it—yes or no?"—"I have no other answer than that which I have already given," replied Luther calmly. He was now understood. Fira as a rock, all the billows of human power had dashed against him in vain. The vigour of his eloquence, his intrepid countenance, the flashing of his eye, the immovable firmness imprinted in bold lineaments on his German features, had produced the deepest impression on this illustrious assembly. There was no longer any hope. Spaniards, Belgians, and even Romans, were mute. The monk was victorious over earthly grandeur. He had negatived the Church and the empire. Charles rose up, and all the assembly with him. "The diet will meet to-morrow morning to hear the emperor's decision," said the chancellor with a loud voice.

CHAPTER IX.

Victory.—Tumult and Calm—Duke Erick's Glass of Beer—The Elector and Spalatin.—Message from the Emperor—Wish to Violate the Safe-conduct—Strong Opposition—Enthusiasm for Luther—Voice for Conciliation—The Elector's Fear—Assemblage at Luther's Lodging—Philip of Hesse.

It was night, and each regained his dwelling in the dark. Two imperial officers were ordered to accompany Luther. Some persons imagining that his fate was decided, and that they were conducting him to prison, which he should leave only for the scaffold, an immense tumult arose. Several gentlemen exclaimed: "Are they taking him to prison?"—"No," replied Luther, "they are accompanying me to my hotel." At these words the tumult calmed. Then some Spaniards of the emperor's household, following this bold champion, hissed and jeered at him as he passed along the streets, while others howled like wild beasts deprived of their prey. Luther remained firm and peaceful.

Such was the scene at Worms. The intrepid monk, who had hitherto hurled defiance at his enemies, spake, when in the presence of those who had thirsted for his blood, with calmness, dignity, and humility. There was no exaggeration, no human enthusiasm, no anger; he was peaceful amid the strongest excitement; modest, while resisting the powers of the earth; great, in presence of all the princes of the world. In this we have an irrefragable proof that Luther was then obeying God,—not following the suggestions of his own pride. In the hall of Worms there was One greater than Luther and Charles. Jesus Christ has said: When they deliver you up, take no thought how or what you shall speak. For it is not ye that speak. Never, perhaps, was this promise so manifestly fulfilled.

A deep impression had been produced on the heads of the empire. Luther had observed this, and it had increased his courage. The servants of the pope were angry at John Eck for not having oftener interrupted the guilty monk. Several princes and nobles were gained to a cause which was maintained with such conviction. In some, it is true, the impression was evanescent; but, on the other hand, several who till then had concealed their sentiments, henceforth displayed great courage.

Luther had returned to his hotel, and was reposing from the fatigue of the severe service in which he had been engaged. Spalatin and other friends were around him, and all were giving thanks to God. While they were conversing, a valet entered, bearing a silver vase full of Eimbeck beer. "My master," said he, presenting it to Luther, "begs you to refresh yourself with this draught of beer." "What prince is it," asked Luther, "who so graciously remembers me?" It was old Duke Eric of Brunswick. The reformer was touched by the offering thus made him by so powerful a prince; one, too, belonging to the papal party. "His highness," continued the valet, "was pleased to taste the draught before sending it to you." Luther, being thirsty, poured out the duke's beer, and after drinking it, said: "As Duke Eric has this day remembered me, so may the Lord Jesus Christ remember him in the day of his final combat." The present was in itself of little value; but Luther, wishing to shew his gratitude to a prince who had thought of him at such a moment, gave him what he had—a prayer. The valet returned with the message to his master. The old duke, in his last moments, remembered the words, and addressing a young page, Francis de Kramm, who was standing at his bedside, said to him: "Take the Gospel and read it to me." The child read the words of Christ, and the soul of the dying man was refreshed. Whosoever, says the Saviour, shall give to one of you a cup of cold water in my name, because you are my disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward.

The valet of the Duke of Brunswick was no sooner gone than a message from the Elector of Saxony ordered Spalatin to come to him instantly. Frederick had come to the diet full of disquietude. He thought that, in presence of the emperor, Luther's courage might give way; and he had, accordingly, been deeply moved by the reformer's firmness. He was proud of having taken such a man under his protection. When the chaplain arrived, the table was covered, and the elector was going to sit down to supper with his court—the valets having already brought in the vase for washing the hands. The elector seeing Spalatin enter, immediately beckoned him to follow, and when alone with him in his bedchamber, said to him, with deep emotion: "Oh! how well Father Luther spoke before the emperor and all the states of the empire! My only fear was, that he would be too bold." Frederick then formed a resolution to protect the doctor in future with greater courage.

Aleander saw the impression which Luther had produced. There was no time, therefore, to be lost. The young emperor must be induced to act vigorously. The moment was favourable, for there was immediate prospect of war with France. Leo X., wishing to enlarge his states, and caring little for the peace of Christendom, caused two treaties to be secretly negotiated at the same time,—the one with Charles against Francis, and the other with Francis against Charles. By the former he stipulated with the emperor for Parma, Placenza, and Ferrara; by the latter, he stipulated with the king for a part of the kingdom of Naples, of which Charles was thus to be deprived. Charles felt the importance of gaining over Leo, in order that he might have him as an ally against his rival of France. Luther was an easy price to pay for the friendship of the mighty pontiff.

The day after Luther's appearance he caused a message to be read to the diet, which he had written in French, with his own hand. "Sprung," said he, "from the Christian emperors of Germany, from the Catholic kings of Spain, the archdukes of Austria, and the dukes of Burgundy, who are all illustrious as defenders of the Roman faith, it is my firm purpose to follow the example of my ancestors. A single monk, led astray by his own folly, sets himself up in opposition to the faith of Christendom. I will sacrifice my dominions, my power, my friends, my treasure, my body, my blood, my mind, and my life, to stay this impiety. I mean to send back the Augustine, Luther, forbidding him to cause the least tumult among the people; thereafter, I will proceed against him and his adherents as against declared heretics, by excommunication and interdiction, and all means proper for their destruction. I call upon the members of the states to conduct themselves like faithful Christians."

This address did not please everybody. Charles, young and impassioned, had not observed the ordinary forms; he ought previously to have asked the opinion of the diet. Two extreme views were immediately declared. The creatures of the pope, the Elector of Brandenburg, and several ecclesiastical princes, demanded that no regard should be paid to the safe-conduct which had been given to Luther. "The Rhine," said they, "must receive his ashes, as a century ago it received the ashes of John Huss." Charles, if we may believe a historian, afterwards bitterly repented that he had not followed this dastardly counsel. "I confess," said he, towards the close of his life, "that I committed a great fault in allowing Luther to live. That heretic having offended a greater Master than I, even God himself, I was not obliged to keep my promise to him. I might, nay, I ought to have forgotten my word, and avenged the insult which he offered to God; because I did not put him to death, the heresy has not ceased to gain strength. His death would have strangled it in the cradle."¹

This horrible proposition filled the elector and all Luther's friends with terror. "The execution of John Huss," said the elector-palatine, "brought too many calamities on Germany, to allow such a scaffold to be erected a second time." "The princes of Germany," exclaimed George of Saxony, himself the irreconcilable enemy of Luther, "will not allow a safe-conduct to be violated. This first diet, held by our new emperor, will not incur the guilt of an act so disgraceful. Such perfidy accords not with old German integrity." The princes of Bavaria, also devoted to the Church of Rome, joined in this protestation. The death scene which Luther's friends had already before their eyes appeared to be withdrawn.

The rumour of these debates, which lasted for two days, spread over the town. Parties grew warm. Some gentlemen, partisans of reform, began to speak strongly against the treachery demanded by Aleander. "The emperor," said they, "is a young man whom the papists and bishops lead at pleasure by their flattery." Pallavicini makes mention of four hundred nobles who were ready to maintain Luther's safe-conduct with the sword. On Saturday morning placards were found posted up on the houses and public places, some against Luther, and others in his favour. One of them merely contained the energetic words of Ecclesiastes: Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child! Seeking in it was said, had assembled, at some leagues from Worms, behind the impregnable ramparts of his fortress, a large body of knights and soldiers, and only waited the issue of the affair that he might know how to act. The popular enthusiasm, not only in Worms, but also in the most distant towns of the empire, the intrepidity of the knights, the attachment of several princes to the reformer, all must have made Charles and the diet comprehend that the step demanded by the Romans might compromise the supreme authority, excite revolts, and even shake the empire. It was only a simple monk that they proposed to burn; but the princes and partisans of Rome, taken all together, had neither power nor courage enough to do it. Doubtless, also, Charles V., their young emperor, had still a fear of perjury. This would seem indicated by an expression which, if some historians speak true, he uttered on this occasion: "Were fidelity and good faith banished from the whole world, they ought to find an asylum in the hearts of princes." It is said he forgot this when on the brink of the grave. But there were other motives which might have had their influence on the emperor. The Florentine Vettori, a friend of Leo X. and of Machiavelli, affirms, that Charles spared Luther only that he might keep the pope in check.

On the Saturday's sitting, the violent counsels of Aleander were negatived. There was a feeling in favour of Luther, and a wish to save the simple-hearted man whose confidence in God was so affecting; but there was a wish also to save the Church. The diet shuddered equally at the consequences which would result from the triumph and from the destruction of the reformer. Proposals of conciliation were heard, and it was suggested that a new attempt should be made with the doctor of Wittenberg. The Archbishop-elect of Mentz himself, the young and extravagant Albert, more devout than courageous, says Pallavicini, had taken alarm on seeing the interest which the people and the nobility shewed in the Saxon monk. His chaplain, Capito, who, during his residence at Bâle, had been intimate with the evangelical priest of Zurich, named Zwingle,—the intrepid defender of the truth, of whom we have already had occasion to speak,—had also, doubtless, represented to Albert the righteousness of the reformer's cause. The worldly archbishop had one of those returns to Christian sentiment which his life occasionally exhibits, and agreed to go to the emperor and ask him to allow one last attempt. But Charles flatly refused. On Monday, 22d April, the princes met in a body to renew the solicitations of Albert. "I will not depart from what I have decreed," replied the emperor. "I will not commission any person to go officially to Luther." "But," added he, to the great scandal of Aleander, "I give this man three days to reflect; during this time any one may, as an individual, give him suitable advice." This was all that was asked. The reformer, thought they, elevated by the solemnity of his public appearance, will yield in a more friendly conference; and, perhaps, be saved from the abyss into which he is ready to fall.

The Elector of Saxony knew the contrary; accordingly, he was in great fear. "If it were in my power," wrote he next day to his brother, Duke John, "I would be ready to support Luther. You could not believe to what a degree I am attacked by the partisans of Rome. If I could tell you all, you would hear very strange things. They are bent on his ruin, and however slight interest any one shews for his person, he is immediately decreed as a heretic. May God, who forsakes not the righteous cause, bring all to a good end!" Frederick, without shewing the strong affection which he felt for the reformer, contented himself with not losing sight of any of his movements.

It was not so with men of all ranks then in Worms. Many fearlessly gave vent to their sympathy. From the Friday, a crowd of princes, counts, barons, knights, gentlemen, ecclesiastics, laics, and common people, surrounded the hotel where the reformer lodged,—they came in and went out, and could not see enough of him. He was become the man in Germany. Even those who doubted not that he was in error, were touched by the nobleness of soul which had led him to sacrifice his life at the bidding of his conscience. With several of the personages present at Worms, and forming the flower of the nation, Luther had occasionally conversations full of that salt with which his sayings were always seasoned. None left him without feeling animated with a generous enthusiasm for the truth. George Vogler, the private secretary of the Margrave Casimir of Brandenburg, writing to a friend, says: "What things I should have to tell you! What conversations, full of piety and kindness, Luther has had with myself and others! How winning that man is!"

One day a young prince of seventeen came prancing into the court of the hotel,—it was Philip, who had been reigning for two years in Hesse. The young landgrave was of an active and enterprising character, of a wisdom beyond his years, a martial spirit, and an impetuous temper, seldom allowing himself to be guided by any ideas but his own. Struck with Luther's addresses, he wished to have a nearer view of him. "As yet, however," says Luther, in relating his visit, "he was not for me." He dismounted, and without any other formality, came up into the reformer's room, and addressing him, said: "Well, dear doctor, how goes it?"—"Gracious lord," replied Luther, "I hope it will go well." "From what I learn," resumed the landgrave, laughing, "you teach, doctor, that a wife may quit her husband, and take another, when the former is found to be too old!" The people of the imperial court had told this story to the landgrave. The enemies of the truth never fail to circulate fabulous accounts of the lessons of Christian teachers. "No, my lord," replied Luther gravely, "let your highness not speak so, if you please." Thereupon, the prince briskly held out his hand to the doctor, shook his cordially, and said: "Dear doctor, if you are in the right, may God assist you." On this he left the room, again mounted his horse, and rode off. This was the first interview between these two men, who were afterwards to stand at the head of the Reformation, and to defend it,—the one with the sword of the Word, and the other with the sword of kings.

It was the Archbishop of Trèves, Richard de Greifenklau, who, with permission of Charles V., had undertaken the office of mediator. Richard, who was on an intimate footing with the Elector of Saxony, and a good Roman Catholic, was desirous to arrange this difficult affair, and thereby at once do a service to his friend and to the Church. On Monday evening, 22d April, just as Luther was going to sit down to table, a messenger of the archbishop came to say, that the prelate wished to see him the day after to-morrow, (Wednesday,) at six o'clock in the morning.

CHAPTER X.

Conference with the Archbishop of Trèves—Wehe's advice to Luther—Luther's Replies—Private Conversation—Visit of Cochleus—Supper at the Archbishop's—Attempt on the Hotel of Rhodes—A Council Proposed—Last Interview between Luther and the Archbishop—Visit to a Sick Friend—Luther Ordered to quit Worms.

THAT day the chaplain and the imperial herald, Sturm, were both at Luther's before six o'clock in the morning. Aleander had caused Cochleus to be called at four. The nuncio had not been slow in discovering in the man who had been presented to him by Capito, a devoted servant of Rome, on whom he could calculate as on himself. Not being able to be present at this interview, Aleander wished to have a substitute at it. "Be present at the Archbishop of Trèves," said he to the Dean of Frankfort. "Do not enter into discussion with Luther; but content yourself with paying the closest attention to everything that is said, so as to be able to bring me back a faithful report. The reformer, on arriving with some friends at the house of the archbishop, found him surrounded by the margrave, Joachim of Brandenburg and Augsburg, several nobles, deputies from free towns, lawyers, and theologians,—among whom were Cochleus and Jerome Wehe, chancellor of Baden. The latter, an able lawyer, wished a reformation in manners and discipline. He went even further. "The Word of God," said he, "which has so long been hid under the bushel, must reappear in all its lustre." This conciliatory individual was entrusted with the conference. Turning kindly towards Luther, he said to him: "We did not make you come in order to dispute with you, but in order to give you brotherly advice. You know how carefully the Scripture requireth us to guard against the flying arrow, and the devil that walketh at noon-day. This enemy of the human race has instigated you to publish things contrary to religion. Think of your own safety, and that of the empire. Take care that those whom Jesus Christ has ransomed, by His own death, from death eternal, be not seduced by you, and perish for ever. . . . Do not set yourself up against holy councils. If we do not maintain the decrees of our fathers, there will be nothing but confusion in the Church. The distinguished princes now listening to me take a particular interest in your safety. But if you persist, the emperor will banish you from the empire, and no place in the world will be able to offer you an asylum. . . . Reflect on the fate which awaits you."

"Most serene princes!" replied Luther, "I give you thanks for your solicitude, for I am only a poor man, and am too humble to be exhorted by such high lords." Then he continued: "I have not blamed all the councils, but only that of Constance; because, in condemning this doctrine of John Huss,—viz., that the Christian Church is the assembly of those who are predestinated to salvation,—it condemned this article of our creed, I believe in the holy Catholic Church; and the Word of God itself. My lessons, it is said, give offence," added he. "I answer, that the Gospel of Christ cannot be preached without offence. How, then, should this fear or apprehension of danger detach me from the Lord, and from this Divine Word, which is the only truth? No, rather give my body, my blood, and my life!" . . .

The princes and doctors having deliberated, Luther was recalled, and Wehe mildly resumed: "It is necessary to honour princes, even when they are mistaken, and to make great sacrifices to charity." Then he said, in a more urgent tone: "Cast yourself upon the judgment of the emperor, and have no fear."

Luther.—"I consent, with all my heart, that the emperor, the princes, and even the humblest Christian, shall examine and judge my books; but on one condition, and it is, that they take the Word of God for their standard. Men have nothing else to do but to obey. My conscience is dependent upon it, and I am captive under its authority."

The Elector of Brandenburg.—"I understand you perfectly, doctor. You will not acknowledge any judge but the Holy Scripture?"

Luther.—"Yes, my lord, exactly. That is my last word."

PHILIP OF HESSE.

Then the princes and doctors withdrew; but the worthy Archbishop of Trèves could not resolve to abandon his undertaking. "Come," said he to Luther, as he passed into his private room, and, at the same time, ordered John Eck and Cochleus, on the one side, and Schurff and Amsdorff on the other, to follow them. "Why appeal incessantly to the Holy Scriptures?" said Eck keenly; "out of it all heresies have sprung." But Luther, says his friend Mathesius, remained immovable, like a rock resting on the true rock,—the Word of the Lord. "The pope," replied he, "is no judge in things pertaining to the Word of God. Every Christian must see and understand for himself how he ought to live and die." The parties separated. The partisans of the papacy felt Luther's superiority, and attributed it to there being nobody present who could answer him. "If the emperor," says Cochleus, "had acted wisely in calling Luther to Worms, he would also have called theologians who might have refuted his errors."

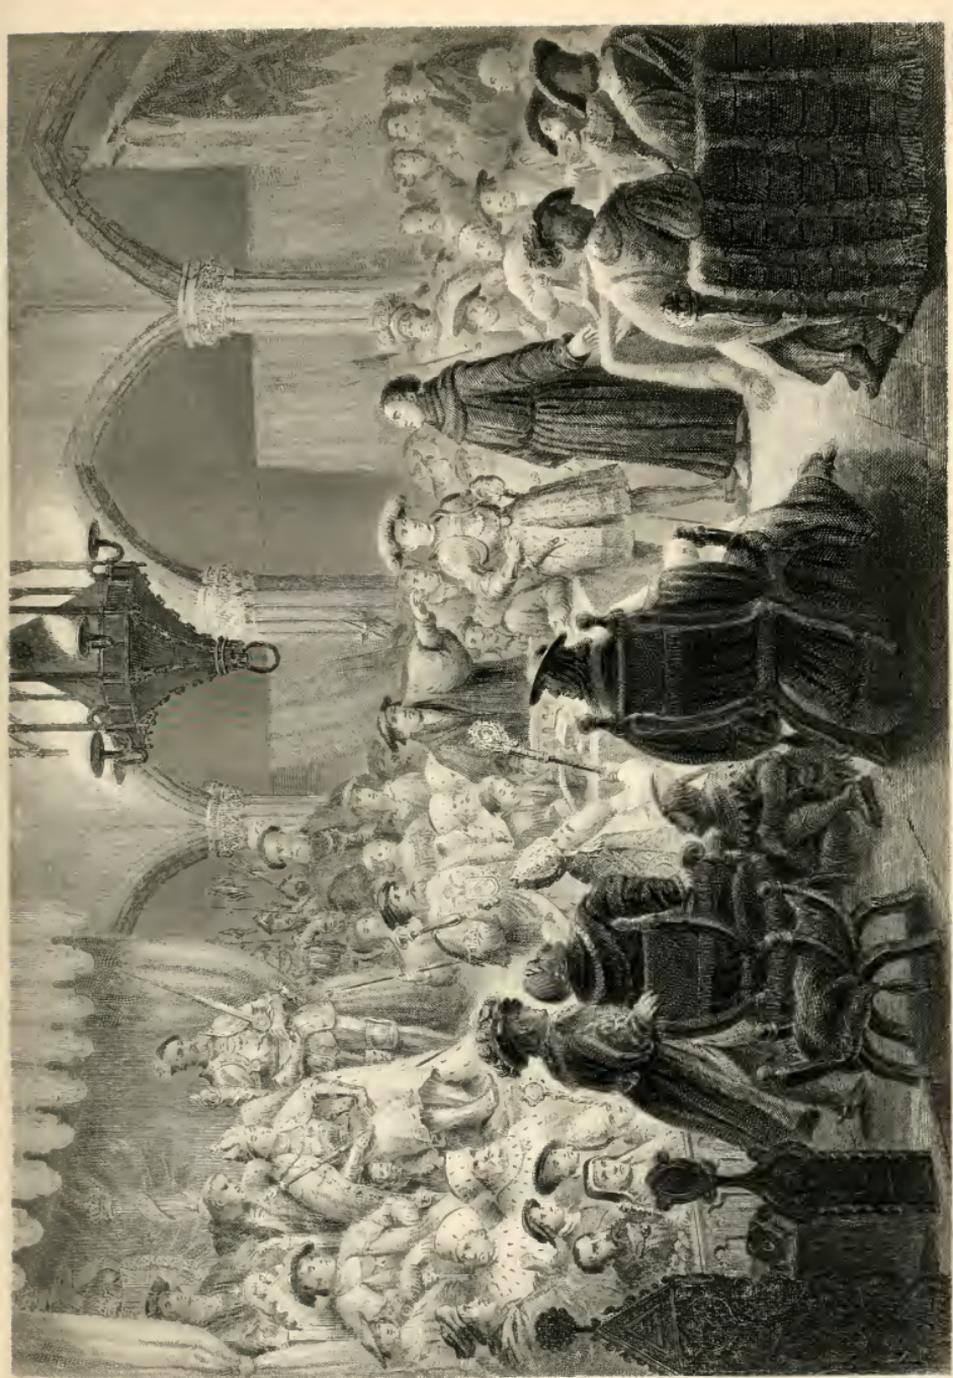

The Archbishop of Trèves repaired to the diet, and announced the ill success of his mediation. The surprise of the young emperor equalled his indignation. "It is time," said he, "to put an end to this affair." The archbishop asked two days more, and the whole diet seconded him. Charles V. yielded. Aleander, transported with rage, uttered the bitterest invectives.

While these things were passing at the diet, Cochleus was burning with eagerness to gain a victory denied to prelates and kings. Though he had, from time to time, thrown in a few words at the archbishops, the order which he had received from Aleander had laid him under restraint. He resolved to compensate himself, and had no sooner given an account of his mission to the papal nuncio, than he presented himself at Luther's lodging. He accosted him as a friend, and expressed the grief which he felt at the emperor's resolution. After dinner, the conversation grew animated. Cochleus pressed Luther to retract. He declined by a nod. Several nobles, who were at table, had difficulty in restraining themselves. They were indignant that the partisans of Rome should wish not to convince the reformer by Scripture, but constrain him by force. Cochleus, impatient under these reproaches, says to Luther: "Very well, I offer to dispute publicly with you, if you renounce the safe-conduct." All that Luther demanded was a public debate. What ought he to do? "To renounce the safe-conduct was to be his own destroyer; to refuse the challenge of Cochleus, was to appear doubtful of his cause. The guests regarded the offer as a perfidious scheme of Aleander, whom the Dean of Frankfort had just left. Vollrat of Watzdorff, one of the number, freed Luther from the embarrassment of this puzzling alternative. This baron, who was of a boiling temperament, indignant at a snare which aimed at nothing less than to give up Luther into the hands of the executioner, started up, seized the terrified priest, and pushed him to the door. There would even have been bloodshed, had not the other guests risen up from the table, and interposed their mediation between the furious baron and the trembling Cochleus, who withdrew, in confusion, from the hotel of the Knights of Rhodes.

The expression had no doubt escaped the dean in the heat of discussion, and was not a premeditated scheme between him and Aleander to make Luther fall into a perfidious snare. Cochleus denies that it was, and we have pleasure in giving credit to his testimony, though it is true he had come to Luther's from a conference with the nuncio.

In the evening, the Archbishop of Trèves entertained those who had been present at the morning conference. He thought it might be a means of calming down their minds, and bringing them nearer each other. Luther, who was so intrepid and immovable before arbiters or judges, had, in private society, a good humour and gaiety, which seemed to promise anything that might be asked of him. The archbishop's chancellor, who had shewn so much sternness in his official capacity, joined in the attempt, and, towards the end of the repast, drank Luther's health. He was preparing to return the honour,—the wine was poured out, and he was, according to his custom, making the sign of the cross on his glass, when suddenly the glass burst in his hands, and the wine was spilt upon the table. The guests were in consternation. "There must be poison in it,"¹ said some of Luther's friends, quite loud. But the doctor, without being moved, replied with a smile: "Dear friends, either this wine was not destined for me, or it would have been hurtful to me." Then he calmly added: "The glass burst, no doubt, because, in washing, it had been too soon plunged in cold water." These simple words, in the circumstances in which they were uttered, have some degree of grandeur, and bespeak unalterable peace. We cannot suppose that the Roman Catholics could have wished to poison Luther, especially at the house of the Archbishop of Trèves. This repast neither estranged nor approximated the parties. The reformer's resolution came from a higher source, and could not be influenced either by the hatred or the favour of men.

On Thursday morning, (25th April,) Chancellor Wehe and Doctor Peutinger of Angsburg, imperial councillor, who had shewn great affection for Luther ever since his interview with De Vio, repaired to the hotel of the Knights of Rhodes. The Elector of Saxony sent Frederick De Thun and another of his councillors to be present at the conference. "Put yourself in our hands," earnestly said Wehe and Peutinger, who would willingly have sacrificed everything to prevent the division which was about to rend the Church. "This affair will be terminated in a Christian manner; we give you our word for it."—"In two words," said Luther to them, "here is my answer: I renounce the safe-conduct. I place in the hands of the emperor my person and my life; but the Word of God, . . . never!" Frederick De Thun, affected, rose and said to the deputies: "Is it not enough? Is not the sacrifice great enough?" Then declaring that he would hear nothing more, he took his leave. Wehe and Peutinger, hoping to have better success with the doctor, came and sat down on each side of him. "Throw yourself upon the diet," said they to him.—"No," replied Luther, "for cursed be the man that trusteth in man," (Jeremiah xvii. 5.) Wehe and Peutinger redoubled their counsels and attacks, pressing more closely on the reformer. Luther, worn out, rose up and put an end to the interview, saying: "I will not allow any man to set himself above the Word of God."—"Reflect once more," said they to him on retiring; "we will return after mid-day."

They, in fact, did return; but convinced that Luther would not yield, they brought a new proposal. Luther had refused to be judged first by the pope, then by the emperor, then by the diet. There remained one judge to whom he himself had once appealed—a general council. No doubt such a proposal would have been scouted by Rome; but it was the last plank for escape. The delegates offered Luther a council; and he had it in his power to accept it unfettered by any precise definition. Years might have elapsed before the difficulties which the calling of a council would have encountered on the part of the pope could have been obviated. To the Reformation and the reformer a gain of years would have gained everything. God and time would then have done the rest. But Luther preferred the straight course to every other; he would not save himself at the expense of truth, though all that might have been necessary was to disguise it by keeping silence. "I consent," replied he; "but (this was equivalent to a refusal of the council) on condition that the council will judge only according to the Holy Scriptures."

Peutinger and Wehe, thinking that a council could not judge otherwise, hastened, overjoyed, to the archbishop. "Dr. Martin," said they, "submits his books to a council." The archbishop was going to carry the good news to the emperor, when some doubt occurring to him, he sent for Luther.

Richard of Griefenklau was alone when the doctor arrived. "Dear doctor," said the archbishop, with much cordiality and kindness, "my doctors assure me that you consent, without reservation, to submit your cause to a council."—"My lord," replied Luther, "I can bear everything, but cannot abandon the Holy Scriptures." The archbishop then perceived that Wehe and Peutinger had not explained themselves properly. Never could Rome consent to a council bound to decide according to Scripture. "It was just," says Pallavicini, "to insist that a weak eye should read very small writing, and at the same time deny the use of spectacles." The good archbishop sighed. "It was well," said he, "I made you come. What would have become of me had I immediately gone to the emperor with the news?"

The immovable firmness, the stern rectitude of Luther, are, no doubt, astonishing; but they will be comprehended and respected by all who know the claims of God. Seldom has a nobler homage been paid to the immutable Word of heaven, and that at the risk of life and liberty by the man who paid it.

"Well," said the venerable prelate to Luther, "do you yourself then point out a remedy."

Luther, (after a moment's silence.)—"My lord, I know no other than that of Gamaliel: If this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it, lest haply ye be found even to fight against God. Let the emperor, the electors, the princes, and the states of the empire, deliver this answer to the pope."

FRANKFORT.

Archbishop.—"At least retract some articles."

Luther.—"Provided it be not those which the Council of Constance condemned."

Archbishop.—"Ah! I fear they are the very ones which will be asked."

Luther.—"Then, sooner sacrifice my body and my life,—better allow my legs and arms to be cut off than abandon the clear and genuine Word of God."

The archbishop at length understood Luther. "You may withdraw," said he to him, always with the same gentleness. "Your lordship," resumed Luther, "will be so good as to see that his majesty cause the safe-conduct necessary for my return to be expedited."—"I will see to it," replied the good archbishop, and they parted.

So ended these negotiations. The whole empire had assailed this man with the most urgent entreaties, and the most fearful menaces, and this man had never flinched. His refusal to bend under the iron arm of the pope emancipated the Church, and commenced a new era. The intervention of Providence was evident; and the whole presents one of those grand historical scenes in which the majestic form of the Divinity appears conspicuously displayed.

Luther withdrew in company with Spalatin, who had arrived at the archbishop's during the course of the visit. John von Minkwitz, one of the Elector of Saxony's councillors, had fallen sick at Worms. The two friends repaired to his lodging, and Luther administered the tenderest consolation to the sick man. "Adieu!" said he to him, on leaving, "to-morrow I shall quit Worms."

Luther was not mistaken. He had not been three hours returned to the hotel of the Knights of Rhodes when Chancellor Eck and the chancellor of the emperor, with a notary, made their appearance.

The chancellor said to him: "Martin Luther, his imperial majesty, the electors, princes, and states of the empire, having exhorted you to submission again and again, and in various manners, but always in vain, the emperor, in his quality of advocate and defender of the Catholic faith, sees himself obliged to take other steps. He, therefore, orders you to return to your home in the space of twenty-one days; and prohibits you from disturbing the public peace by the way, either by preaching or writing."

Luther was well aware that this message was the first step in his condemnation. "It has happened as Jehovah pleased," said he meekly. "Blessed be the name of Jehovah!" Then he added: "Before all things, very humbly and from the bottom of my heart, I thank his majesty, the electors, princes, and other states of the empire, for having listened to me with so much kindness. I have desired, and do desire one thing only—a reformation of the Church agreeably to Holy Scripture. I am ready to do everything, and suffer everything, in humble submission to the will of the emperor. Life and death, honour and disgrace, are all alike to me. I make only one reservation—the preaching of the Gospel; for, says St. Paul, the Word of God cannot be bound." The deputies withdrew.

On the morning of Friday (26th April) the reformer's friends and several nobles met at his lodgings. They were gratified at seeing the Christian constancy which he had opposed to Charles and the empire, and to recognize in him the features of the ancient portrait:

"Justum no tenacem propositi virum,
Non civium ardor prava jubentium,
Non vultus instans tyranni,
Mente quare sollicita."

They wished once more, perhaps for ever, to bid adieu to this intrepid monk. Luther took a frugal meal. Now he must take leave of his friends, and flee far from them, under a sky surcharged with storms. He wished to pass this solemn moment in the presence of God. He lifted up his soul and blessed those who were around him. Ten in the morning having struck, Luther quitted the hotel with the friends who had accompanied him to Worms. Twenty gentlemen on horseback surrounded his carriage. A great crowd accompanied him beyond the walls. The imperial herald, Sturm, rejoined him some time after at Oppenheim, and the following day they reached Frankfurt.

CHAPTER XI.

Luther's Departure—Journey from Worms—Luther to Cranach—Luther to Charles V.—Luther with the Abbot of Hirschfeld—The Curate of Eisenach—Several Princes Leave the Diet—Charles Signs Luther's Condemnation—The Edict of Worms—Luther with his Parents—Luther attacked and carried off—The Ways of God—Wartburg—Luther a Prisoner.

LUTHER having thus escaped from these walls of Worms, which threatened to become his tomb, his whole heart gave glory to God. "The devil himself," said he, "guarded the citadel of the pope. But Christ has made a large breach in it; and Satan has been forced to confess that the Lord is mightier than he."

"The day of the diet of Worms," says the pious Mathesius, the disciple and friend of Luther, "is one of the greatest and most glorious days given to the world before its final close." The battle fought at Worms re-echoed far and wide; and while the sound travelled over Christendom,—from the regions of the North to the mountains of Switzerland, and the cities of England, France, and Italy,—many ardently took up the mighty weapon of the Word of God.

Luther, having arrived at Frankfurt on the evening of Saturday, (27th April), took advantage next day of a moment of leisure—the first he had had for a long time—to write a note, in a style at once playful and energetic, to his friend, Lucas Cranach, the celebrated painter, at Wittenberg: "Your servant, dear compeer Lucas," said he to him, "I thought his majesty would assemble at Worms some fifty doctors to confute the monk off hand. But not at all. Are these books yours?—Yes. Will you retract them?—No. Ah well! get you gone! Such was the whole story. O blind Germans! how like children we act in allowing ourselves to be played upon and duped by Rome! . . . The Jews must for once have their chant,—Yo! Yo!

Yo! But our passover also will come, and then we will sing Hallelujah! . . . There must be silence and suffering for a short time. Jesus Christ says A little while, and ye shall not see me; and again, a little while, and ye shall see me, (John xvi. 16.) I hope it will be so with me. I commend you altogether to the Eternal. May He through Christ protect us against the attacks of the wolves and dragons of Rome. Amen."

After writing this somewhat enigmatical letter, Luther, as time was pressing, set out immediately for Friedberg, which is six leagues from Frankfort. The next day Luther again communed with himself. He was desirous to write once more to Charles V., being unwilling to confound him with guilty rebels. In his letter to the emperor he clearly expounded the nature of the obedience which is due to man, and that which is due to God; and the limit where the former must stop and give place to the latter. In reading Luther, we involuntarily call to mind the saying of the greatest autocrat of modern times: "My rule ends where that of conscience begins." "God, who is the searcher of hearts, is my witness," says Luther, "that I am ready with all diligence to obey your majesty, whether in honour or disgrace, whether by life or by death, and with absolutely no exception but the Word of God, from which man derives life. In all the affairs of the present life, my fidelity will be immutable; for as to these, loss or gain cannot at all affect salvation. But in regard to eternal blessings, it is not the will of God that man should submit to man. Subjection in the spiritual world constitutes worship, and should be paid only to the Creator."

Luther also addressed a letter—but in German—to the states of the empire. It was nearly the same in substance as that to the emperor. It contained an account of all that had taken place at Worms. This letter was repeatedly printed and circulated all over Germany. "Everywhere," says Cochlens, "it excited the popular indignation against the emperor and the dignified clergy."

Early next day Luther wrote a note to Spalatin, enclosing in it the two letters which he had written the evening before, and sent back the herald Sturm, who had been won to the Gospel. Having embraced him, he set out in all haste for Grunberg.

On Tuesday, when about two leagues from Hirschfeld, he met the chancellor of the abbot-prince of this town, who had come out to receive him. Shortly after a troop of horsemen appeared with the abbot at their head. The latter leapt from his horse, and Luther having alighted from his carriage, the prince and the reformer embraced, and then entered Hirschfeld. The senate received them at the gates. The princes of the Church ran to meet a monk anathematized by the pope, and the most distinguished among the laity bowed the head before an individual whom the emperor had put under the ban.

"At five in the morning we will be at the church," said the prince, on rising in the evening from table, at which the reformer was a guest. He even wished Luther to occupy his own bed. Next day Luther preached, the abbot-prince accompanying him with his suite.

In the evening Luther arrived at Eisenach, the abode of his infancy. All his friends in the town gathered round him, and begged him to preach. The next day they conducted him to the church. The curate made his appearance, attended by a notary and witnesses. He came forward in great tremor, divided between the fear of losing his place, and that of opposing the powerful man before him. At last he said, in a tone of embarrassment: "I protest against the liberty which you are going to take." Luther mounted the pulpit, and that voice which, twenty-three years before, sung in the streets of this town for bread, caused the arches of the ancient church to ring with accents which had begun to shake the world. After the sermon, the curate, in confusion, stepped softly forward to Luther. The notary had drawn up his instrument, the witnesses had signed it, and everything was in regular order to put the curate's place in safety. "Pardon me," said he humbly to the doctor; "I have done it from fear of the tyrants who oppress the Church."

There was, in fact, some ground to fear them. At Worms the aspect of affairs had changed. Aleander seemed to reign supreme. "Luther has nothing before him but exile," wrote Frederick to his brother, Duke John. "Nothing can save him. If God permits me to return, I will have things almost incredible to tell you. Not only Annas and Caiaphas, but also Pilate and Herod, have leagued against him." Frederick, having little wish to remain longer, left Worms. The elector-palatine did the same, as did also the Archbishop-elect of Cologne. Princes of less elevated rank imitated them. Deeming it impossible to avert the blow which was about to be struck, they preferred, perhaps erroneously, to abandon the place. The Spaniards, Italians, and the most ultramontane of the German princes, alone remained.

The field was free, and Aleander triumphed. He laid before Charles the draft of an edict, which he intended should serve as the model of that which the diet was to issue against the monk. The nuncio's labour pleased the irritated emperor. He assembled the remains of the diet in his chamber, and caused Aleander's edict to be read to them. All who were present (so says Pallavicini) approved it.

The next day—the day of a great festival—the emperor was in the church, surrounded by the nobility of his court. The religious solemnity was finished, and a multitude of people filled the church, when Aleander, clad in all the insignia of his rank, approached Charles V. He held in his hand two copies of the edict against Luther, the one in Latin, and the other in German, and, kneeling down before his majesty, implored him to append his signature and the seal of the empire. It was at the moment when the host had just been offered, when incense filled the temple, when music was still ringing under its arches, and, as it were, in the presence of the Divinity, that the destruction of the enemy of Rome was to be completed. The emperor, assuming the most gracious manner, took the pen and signed. Aleander went off in triumph, put the decree immediately to press, and sent it over all Christendom. This fruit of the labour of Rome had cost the papacy some pains. Pallavicini himself informs us that this edict, though dated the 8th May, was signed later; but was antedated, to make it be supposed that it was executed during the time when all the members of the diet were actually assembled.

FRIEDBERG.

"We, Charles the Fifth," said the emperor, (then followed all his titles,) "to all the electors, princes, prelates, and others, whom it may concern.

"The Almighty having entrusted to us, for the defence of His holy faith, more kingdoms and power than He gave to any of our predecessors, we mean to exert ourselves to the utmost to prevent any heresy from arising to pollute our holy empire.

"The Augustine monk, Martin Luther, though exhorted by us, has rushed, like a madman, against the holy Church, and sought to destroy it by means of books filled with blasphemy. He has, in a shameful manner, insulted the imperishable law of holy wedlock. He has striven to excite the laity to wash their hands in the blood of priests; and, overturning all obedience, has never ceased to stir up revolt, division, war, murder, theft, and fire, and to labour completely to ruin the faith of Christians. . . . In a word, to pass over all his other iniquities in silence, this creature, who is not a man, but Satan himself under the form of a man, covered with the cowl of a monk, has collected into one stinking pool all the worst heresies of past times, and has added several new ones of his own. . . .

"We have, therefore, sent this Luther from before our face, that all pious and sensible men may regard him as a fool, or a man possessed of the devil; and we expect that, after the expiry of his safe-conduct, effectual means will be taken to arrest his furious rage.

"Wherefore, under pain of incurring the punishment due to the crime of treason, we forbid you to lodge the said Luther so soon as the fatal term shall be expired, to conceal him, give him meat or drink, and lend him, by word or deed, publicly or secretly, any kind of assistance. We enjoin you, moreover, to seize him, or cause him to be seized, wherever you find him, and bring him to us without any delay, or to keep him in all safety until you hear from us how you are to act with regard to him, and till you receive the recompense due to your exertions in so holy a work.

"As to his adherents, you will seize them, suppress them, and confiscate their goods.

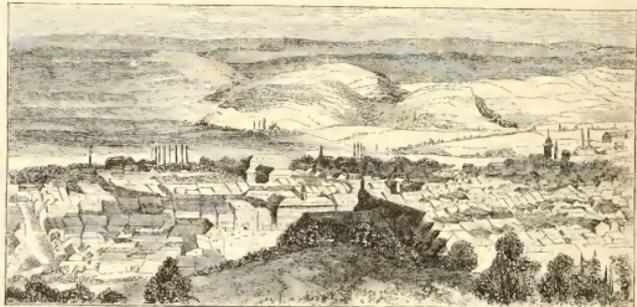

"As to his writings, if the best food becomes the terror of all mankind as soon as a drop of poison is mixed with it, how much more ought these books, which contain a deadly poison to the soul, to be not only rejected, but also annihilated! You will therefore burn them, or in some other way destroy them entirely.

"As to authors, poets, printers, painters, sellers or buyers of placards, writings, or paintings, against the pope or the Church, you will lay hold of their persons and their goods, and treat them according to your good pleasure.

"And if any one, whatever be his dignity, shall dare to act in contradiction to the decree of our imperial majesty, we ordain that he shall be placed under the ban of the empire.

"Let every one conform hereto."

Such was the edict signed in the cathedral of Worms. It was more than a Roman bull, which, though published in Italy, might not be executed in Germany.

EISENACH.

The emperor himself had spoken, and the diet had ratified his decree. All the partisans of Rome sent forth a shout of triumph. "It is the end of the tragedy," exclaimed they. "For my part," said Alphonso Valdez, a Spaniard at the emperor's court; "I am persuaded it is not the end, but the beginning." Valdez perceived that the movement was in the Church, in the people, in the age, and that though Luther should fall, his cause would not fall with him. But no one disguised to himself the imminent—the inevitable danger to which the reformer was exposed; while the whole tribe of the superstitious were seized with horror at the thought of the incarnate Satan, whom the emperor pointed out to the nation as disguised under a monk's frock.

The man against whom the mighty of the earth were thus forging their thunders, had left the church of Eisenach, and was preparing to separate from some of his dearest friends. He did not wish to follow the road of Gotha or Erfurt, but to repair to the village of Mora, his father's birthplace, that he might there see his grandmother, who died four months after, his uncle, Henry Luther, and other relations. Schurff, Jonas, and Suaven, set off for Wittenberg; Luther mounted his vehicle with Amsdorff, who remained with him, and entered the forest of Thuringia.

The same evening he reached the village of his fathers. The poor old peasant clasped in her arms this grandson who had just been shewing front to the Emperor Charles and Pope Leo. Luther spent the next day with his family, happy in substituting this tranquil scene for the tumult at Worms. On the following day he resumed his journey, accompanied by Amsdorff and his brother James. In these lonely spots the reformer's lot was to be decided. They were passing along the forest of Thuringia, on the road to Waltershausen. As the carriage was in a hollow part of the road, near the old church of Glisbach, at some distance from the castle of Altenstein, a sudden noise was heard, and at that moment five horsemen, masked and in complete armour, rushed upon the travellers. Luther's brother, as soon as he perceived the assailants, leapt from the vehicle, and ran off at full speed without uttering a word. The driver was for defending himself. "Stop!" cried one of the assailants in a stern voice, and rushing upon him threw him to the ground. A second man in a mask seized Amsdorff, and prevented him from coming near. Meanwhile the three other horsemen laid hold of Luther, keeping the most profound silence. They pulled him violently from the carriage, threw a horseman's cloak upon his shoulders, and placed him on a led horse. Then the other two quitted Amsdorff and the driver, and the whole leapt into their saddles. The hat of one of them fell off, but they did not even stop to lift it, and in a twinkling disappeared in the dark forest with their prisoner. They at first took the road to Broderode; but they soon retraced their steps by a different road, and, without quitting the forest, made turnings and windings in all directions, in order to deceive those who might attempt to follow their track

THE WARTBURG.

Luther, little accustomed to horseback, was soon overcome with fatigue. Being permitted to dismount for a few moments, he rested near a beech tree, and took a draught of fresh water from a spring, which is still called Luther's Spring. His brother James, always continuing his flight, arrived in the evening at Waltershausen. The driver, in great alarm, had got up on his vehicle, into which Amsdorff also mounted, and urging on his horses, which proceeded at a rapid pace, brought Luther's friend as far as Wittenberg. At Waltershausen, and Wittenberg, and the interjacent country, villages, and towns, all along the road, news of Luther's having been carried off were spread,—news which, while it delighted some, filled the greater number with astonishment and indignation. A cry of grief soon resounded throughout Germany: "Luther has fallen into the hands of his enemies!"

After the violent combat which Luther had been obliged to maintain, God was pleased to conduct him to a peaceful resting-place. After placing him on the brilliant theatre of Worms, where all the powers of the reformer's soul had been so vigorously exerted, He gave him the obscure and humiliating retreat of a prison. From the deepest obscurity He brings forth the feeble instruments by which He proposes to accomplish great things, and then, after allowing them to shine for a short time with great lustre on an elevated stage, sends them back again to deep obscurity. Violent struggles and pompous displays were not the means by which the Reformation was to be accomplished. That is not the way in which the heaven penetrates the mass of the population. The Spirit of God requires more tranquil paths. The man of whom the champions of Rome were always in pitiless pursuit, beloved for a time to disappear from the world. It was necessary that personal achievements should be eclipsed, in order that the revolution about to be accomplished might not bear the impress of an individual. It was necessary that man should retire and God alone remain, moving, by His Spirit, over the abyss in which the darkness of the Middle Ages was engulfed, and saying: Let there be light.

Nightfall having made it impossible to follow their track, the party carrying off Luther took a new direction, and about an hour before midnight arrived at the foot of a mountain. The horses climbed slowly to its summit, on which stood an old fortress, surrounded on all sides, except that of the entrance, by the black forests which cover the mountains of Thuringia.

To this elevated and isolated castle, named the Wartburg, where the landgraves of old used to conceal themselves, was Luther conducted. The bolts are drawn, the iron bars fall, the gates open, and the reformer, clearing the threshold, the bars again close behind him. He dismounts in the court. Burkhardt de Hund, Lord of Altenstein, one of the horsemen, withdraws; another, John of Berlepsch, provost of Wartburg, conducts Luther to the chamber which was to be his prison, and where a knight's dress and a sword were lying. The three other horsemen, dependants of the provost, carry off his ecclesiastical dress, and put on the other which had been prepared for him, enjoining him to allow his hair and beard to grow, in order that none even in the castle might know who he was. The inmates of the Wartburg were only to know the prisoner under the name of Chevalier Georges. Luther scarcely knew himself in the dress which was put upon him. At length he is left alone, and can turn in his thoughts the strange events which had just taken place at Worms, the uncertain prospect which awaits him, and his new and strange abode. From the narrow windows of his keep he discovers the dark, solitary, and boundless forests around. "There," says Mathesius, the biographer and friend of Luther, "the doctor remained, like St. Paul in his prison at Rome."

Frederick de Thun, Philip Feilitzsch, and Spalatin, had not concealed from Luther, in a confidential interview which they had with him at Worms, by order of the elector, that his liberty beloved to be sacrificed to the wrath of Charles and the pope. Still, there was so much mystery in the mode of his being carried off, that Frederick was long ignorant of the place of his confinement. The grief of the friends of the Reformation was prolonged. Spring passed away, succeeded by summer, autumn, and winter,—the sun finished his annual course, and the walls of the Wartburg still confined their prisoner. The truth is laid under interdict by the diet; its defender, shut up within the walls of a strong castle, has disappeared from the stage of the world, none knowing what has become of him. Alexander triumphs, and the Reformation seems lost; . . . but God reigns, and the blow which apparently threatened to annihilate the cause of the Gospel, will serve only to save its intrepid minister, and extend the light of faith.

Let us leave Luther a captive in Germany on the heights of the Wartburg, and let us see what God was then doing in the other countries of Christendom.

THE SWISS—1484-1522.

CHAPTER I.

Movements in Switzerland—Source of the Reformation—Democratic Character—Foreign Service—Morality—The Tockenbourg—An Alpine Hut—A Pastoral Family.

At the moment when the decree of the diet of Worms appeared, a continually increasing movement was beginning to shake the quiet valleys of Switzerland. The voice which was heard in the plains of Upper and Lower Saxony was answered from the bosom of the Helvetic mountains by the energetic voices of its priests, its shepherds, and the citizens of its warlike cities. The partisans of Rome, seized with terror, exclaimed that a vast and dreadful conspiracy was everywhere formed against the Church. The friends of the Gospel, filled with joy, said, that as in spring a living breath is felt from the streams which run into the sea up to the mountain tops, so, throughout all Christendom, the Spirit of God was now melting the ices of a long winter, and covering with verdure and flowers the lowest plains, as well as the steepest and most barren rocks.

Germany did not communicate the truth to Switzerland, nor Switzerland to France, nor France to England. All these countries received it from God, just as one part of the world does not transmit the light to another part; but the same shining globe communicates it directly to all the earth. Christ, the day-spring from on high, infinitely exalted above all mankind, was—at the period of the Reformation, as at that of the establishment of Christianity—the Divine fire which gave life to the world. In the sixteenth century one and the same doctrine was at once established in the homes and churches of the most distant and diversified nations. The reason is, that the same Spirit was everywhere at work producing the same faith.

The Reformation of Germany and that of Switzerland demonstrate this truth. Zwingle had no intercourse with Luther. There was, no doubt, a link between these two men; but we must search for it above the earth. He who from heaven gave the truth to Luther, gave it to Zwingle. God was the medium of communication between them. "I began to preach the Gospel," says Zwingle, "in the year of grace, 1516, in other words, at a time when the name of Luther had never been heard of in our country. I did not learn the doctrine of Christ from Luther, but from the Word of God. If Luther preaches Christ, he does what I do; that is all."

But if the different reformations, which all proceeded from the same Spirit, thereby acquired great unity, they also received certain peculiar features, corresponding to the different characters of the people among whom they took place.

We have already given a sketch of the state of Switzerland at the period of the Reformation, and will only add a few words to what we have already said. In Germany, the ruling principle was monarchial; in Switzerland, it was democratic. In Germany, the Reformation had to struggle with the will of princes; in Switzerland, with the will of the people. A multitude are more easily led away than an individual, and are also more prompt in their decisions. The victory over the papacy on the other side of the Rhine, was the work of years; but on this side of it, required only months or days.

In Germany, Luther's person stands forth imposingly from the midst of his Saxon countrymen. He seems to struggle alone in his attack on the Roman Colossus; and wherever the battle is fought, we see his lofty stature on the field of battle. Luther is, as it were, the monarch of the revolution which is being accomplished. In Switzerland, several cantons are at once engaged in the contest. We see a confederacy of reformers, and are astonished at their numbers. No doubt there is one head which stands elevated above the rest; but no one has the command. It is a republican magistracy, where each presents his peculiar physiognomy, and exercises his separate influence. We have Wittenberg, Zwingle, Capito, Haller, Ecolampadius. Again, we have Oswald Myconius, Leo Juda, Farel, and Calvin; and the Reformation takes place at Glaris, Bâle, Zurich, Berne, Neufchatel, Geneva, Lucerne, Schaffhausen, Appenzel, Saint Gall, and in the Grisons. In the Reformation of Germany one scene only is seen, and that one level, like the country around; but in Switzerland, the Reformation is divided, as Switzerland itself is divided by its thousand mountains. So to speak, each valley has its awakening, and each Alpine height its gleams of light.

A lamentable period had commenced in the history of the Swiss after their exploits against the dukes of Burgundy. Europe, which had learned to know the strength of their arm, had brought them forth from their mountains, and robbed them of their independence, by employing them to decide the destiny of states on battle-fields. Swiss brandished the sword against Swiss on the plains of Italy and France; and the intrigues of strangers filled these high valleys of the Alps, so long the abode of simplicity and peace, with envy and discord. Led away by the attraction of gold, sons, labourers, and servants, stole away from the chalets of alpine pastures, towards the banks of the Rhine or the Po. Helvetic unity was crushed under the slow step of mules loaded with gold. The object of the Reformation in Switzerland—for there too it had a political aspect—was to re-establish the unity and ancient virtues of the cantons. Its first cry was, that the Swiss should tear asunder the perfidious nets of strangers, and embrace each other in strict union at the foot of the cross. But the generous call was not listened to. Rome, accustomed to purchase in these valleys the blood which she shed, in order to increase her power, rose up in wrath. She set Swiss against Swiss, and new passions arose which rent the body of the nation in pieces.

Switzerland stood in need of a reformation. It is true there was among the Helvetians a simplicity and good-nature, which the polished Italians thought ridiculous; but, at the same time, it was admitted, that by no people were the laws of chastity more habitually transgressed. Astrologers ascribed this to the constellations; philosophers, to the ardent temperament of this indomitable population; and moralists, to the principles of the Swiss, who regarded trick, dishonesty, and slander, as much greater sins than uncleanness. The priests were prohibited from marrying; but it would have been difficult to find one of them who lived in true celibacy. The thing required of them was, to conduct themselves not chastely, but prudently. This was one of the first disorders against which the Reformation was directed. It is time to trace the beginnings of this new day in the valleys of the Alps.

Towards the middle of the eleventh century, two hermits set out from Saint Gall, and proceeding towards the mountains at the south of this ancient monastery, arrived in a deserted valley about ten leagues long. Towards the north, the high mountains of Sentsis, the Sommergrkopf, and the Old Man, separate this valley from the canton of Appenzel. On the south, the Kùhirsten, with its seven heads, rises between it and the Wallensee, Sargans, and the Grisons, while the eastern side of the valley opens to the rays of the rising sun, and discovers the magnificent prospect of the Tyrolese Alps. The two solitaries having arrived near the source of a small river, (the Thur,) built two cells. The valley gradually became inhabited. On the highest portion of it, 2010 feet above the Lake of Zurich, there was formed, around a church, a village named Wildhaus, or the Wild-house, with which two hamlets are now connected,—viz., Lisighaus, or the House of Elizabeth and Schœnenboden. The fruits of this earth are unable to grow upon these heights. A green carpet of Alpine freshness covers the whole valley, and rises upon the sides of the mountains, above which masses of enormous rocks lift their wild grandeur towards heaven.

At a quarter of a league from the church, near Lisighaus, on the side of a path which leads into the pastures beyond the river, a solitary house is still standing. The tradition is, that the wood used in building it was cut upon the very spot. Everything indicates that it must have been erected at a very remote period. The walls are thin. The windows have little round panes; and the roof is formed of slabs, on which stones are laid to prevent the wind from carrying them away. In front of the house there is a limpid gushing spring.

In this house, towards the end of the fifteenth century, lived a man, named Zwingle, amman or bailiff of the district. The family of the Zwingles, or Zwingli, was ancient, and in high esteem among the inhabitants of these mountains. Bartholomew, brother of the bailiff, at first curate of the parish, and, after 1487, dean of Wesen, was a person of some celebrity in the district. Margaret Meili, the wife of the amman of Wildhaus, and whose brother, John, was afterwards abbot of the convent of Fischlingen in Thurgovia, had already given birth to two sons, Heini and Klaus, when, on the first day of the year 1484, seven weeks after the birth of Luther, a third son, Ulrich, was born in this solitary hut. Five other sons, John, Wolfgang, ZWINGLE'S BIRTHPLACE.

Bartholomew, James, Andrew, and a daughter, Anna, were afterwards added to this Alpine family. No person in the country was more venerated than amman Zwingle. His character, his office, his numerous children, made him the patriarch of these mountains. He and all his sons were shepherds. No sooner did the first days of May open upon these mountains, than the father and the children departed with their flocks for the pastures, rising gradually from station to station, and so, towards the end of July, reaching the highest summits of the Alps. Then they began gradually to redescend towards the valley; and in autumn the whole population of Wildhaus return to their humble huts. Sometimes, during the summer, the young people who had been obliged to remain at home, eager for the mountain breezes, set out in bands for the chalets, uniting their voices to the melody of their rustic instruments. On their arrival on the Alps the shepherds from a distance saluted them with their horns and their songs, and regaled them with a feast of milk. Afterwards, the joyous band, by turnings and windings, descended again into the valley, moving to the sound of their pipes. Ulrich, in his youth, doubtless joined occasionally in this amusement. He grew up at the foot of those rocks which seem eternal, and whose tops reach the heavens. "I have often thought," says one of his friends, "that, being brought near to heaven on these sublime heights, he there contracted something celestial and divine."

There were long winter evenings in the cottages of Wildhaus; and then young Ulrich, seated at the paternal hearth, listened to the conversation of the bailiff and the old men of the district. He heard them tell how the inhabitants of the valley had formerly groaned under a heavy yoke. With the old men, his heart beat high at the thought of the independence which the Tockenbourg had acquired, and which the alliance with the Swiss had secured. A patriotic feeling was kindled in his breast. Switzerland became dear to him; and if any one uttered an unfavourable expression against the confederates, the child instantly stood up and warmly defended their cause. During these long evenings, he was often seen quietly seated at the feet of his pious grandmother, with his eyes riveted upon her, listening to her Bible stories and devout lessons, as he eagerly received them into his heart.

THE good amman was delighted with the happy passages in his son. He perceived that Ulrich would be able to do something else than herd his cows on Mount Sentis, singing the shepherd's song. One day he took him by the hand and proceeded with him towards Wesen. He traversed the verdant ridges of the Ammon, avoiding the wild and precipitous rocks which border the Lake of Wallenstadt. On arriving at the town, he called upon his brother the dean, to whom he entrusted the young mountaineer, in order that he might ascertain what his talents were. The leading feature in his character was an innate horror at falsehood, and a great love of truth. He himself relates that one day, when he was beginning to reflect, the thought struck him that falsehood should be punished more severely than even theft; "for," adds he, "veracity is the parent of all the virtues." The dean soon loved his nephew as if he had been his son; delighted with his sprightliness, he entrusted his education to a schoolmaster, who in a short time taught him all that he knew himself. Young Ulrich, when ten years of age, having given indications of a high order of intellect, his father and his uncle resolved on sending him to Bäle.

When the child of the Tockenburgh arrived in this celebrated city, with an integrity and purity of heart which he seemed to have inhaled from the pure air of his mountains, but which came from a higher source, a new world opened before him. The celebrity of the famous Council of Bäle; the university which Pius II. had founded in 1460; the printing presses, which revived the masterpieces of antiquity, and circulated over the world the first fruits of the revival of letters; the residence of distinguished men,—the Wessels, the Wittenbachs, and, in particular, that prince of scholars and luminary of the schools, Erasmus, rendered Bäle, at the period of the Reformation, one of the great foci of light in the west.

Ulrich entered the school of St. Theodore, which was taught by Gregory Binzli, a man of an affectionate and gentle temper,—at this period rare among teachers. Young Zwingle made rapid progress. The learned disputes which were then fashionable among the doctors of universities had even descended to the youth in schools. Ulrich took part in them. He exercised his growing strength against the children of other schools, and was always victorious in those struggles which formed a kind of prelude to those by which the papacy was to be overthrown in Switzerland. His success excited the jealousy of rivals older than himself. The school of Bäle was soon outstripped by him, as that of Wesen had been.

Lupulus, a distinguished scholar, had just opened at Berne the first learned school that was founded in Switzerland. The bailiff of Wildhaus and the curate of Wesen resolved to send their child thither; and Zwingle, in 1497, quitting the smiling plains of Bäle, again drew near to the high Alps, where he had spent his childhood, and whose snowy tops, gilded with the rays of the sun, he could see from Berne. Lupulus, a distinguished poet, introduced his pupil to the sanctuary of classic literature,—a sanctuary then unknown, only a few of the initiated having passed the threshold. The young neophyte ardently breathed an atmosphere rich in the perfumes of antiquity. His intellect was developed, and his style formed. He became a poet.

Among the convents of Berne, that of the Dominicans held a distinguished place. These monks were engaged in a serious quarrel with the Franciscans. The latter maintained the immaculate conception of the virgin, while the former denied it. In every step the Dominicans took,—before the rich altars which decorated their church, and between the twelve pillars on which its arches were supported,—they thought only of humbling their rivals. They had observed the fine voice of Zwingle, and heard of his precocious intellect, and thinking that he might throw lustre on their order, strove to gain him. With this view they invited him to remain in their convent till he should make his novitiate. The whole prospects of Zwingle were threatened. The amman of Wildhaus having been informed of the bait to which the Dominicans had had recourse, trembled for the innocence of his son, and ordered him forthwith to quit Berne. Zwingle thus escaped those monastic enclosures into which Luther rushed voluntarily. What happened afterwards may enable us to comprehend the imminent danger to which Zwingle had been exposed.

In 1507, great excitement prevailed in the town of Berne. A young man of Zurzach, named John Jetzer, having one day presented himself at this same Dominican convent, had been repulsed. The poor youth, in despair, had returned to the charge, holding in his hand fifty-three florins and some pieces of silk. "It is all I possess," said he; "take it, and receive me into your order." He was admitted on the 6th January among the lay brothers. But the very first night a strange noise in his cell filled him with terror. He fled to the Carthusian convent, but was again sent back to that of the Dominicans.

On the following night—being the eve of the feast of St. Matthew—he was awake by deep sighs, and perceived at his bedside a tall phantom in white. "I am," said a sepulchral voice, "a soul escaped from the fire of purgatory." The lay brother trembling, replied: "God save you; for me, I can do nothing." Then the spirit advanced towards the poor friar and, seizing him by the throat, indignantly upbraided him with his refusal. Jetzer, in terror, exclaimed: "What, then, can I do to save you?"—"Flagellate yourself for eight days till the blood comes, and lie prostrate on the pavement of the chapel of St. John." So answered the spirit, and disappeared. The lay brother gave information of the apparition to his confessor, a preacher of the convent, and by his advice submitted to the discipline required. The rumour soon spread throughout the town that a soul had applied to the Dominicans to be delivered from purgatory. The Franciscans were deserted, and every one ran to the church to see the holy man lying prostrate on the ground. The soul from purgatory had intimated that he would reappear in eight days. On the night appointed it, in fact, did appear, accompanied by two other spirits that were tormenting it, and howling horribly. "Scotus," said the spirit,—"Scotus, the inventor of the Franciscan doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin, is among those who, like me, are suffering these fierce pains." At this news, which soon spread over Berne, the partisans of the Franciscans were still more alarmed. The spirit, on disappearing, had announced a visit from the Virgin herself. In fact, on the day appointed, the astonished friar saw Mary herself appear in his cell. He could not believe his eyes. She approached him kindly, gave him three of our Saviour's tears, three drops of His blood, a crucifix, and a letter addressed to Pope Julius II., "who," said she, "was the individual chosen by God to abolish the festival of her pretended immaculate conception." Then, coming still closer to the bed on which the friar lay, she announced, in a solemn tone, that a great grace was to be conferred on him, and drove a nail into his hand. The lay brother uttered a loud shriek; but Mary wrapt up his hand in a piece of linen, which her Son, she said, had worn after His flight into Egypt. This wound was not sufficient to make the glory of the Dominicans equal to that of the Franciscans. Jetzer must have the five wounds of Christ and of St. Francis in his hands, feet, and side. The four others were inflicted, and then, after giving him a draught, he was placed in a hall hung with pictures representing our Saviour's passion. Here, having spent whole days fasting, his imagination soon became heated. The doors of the hall were then thrown open from time to time to the public, who came in crowds to contemplate, with devout astonishment, the friar with his five wounds, stretching out his arms, bending his head, and by his positions and gestures imitating the crucifixion of our Lord. Sometimes, out of his wits, he foamed, and seemed about to breathe his last. The whisper went round: "He is enduring the cross of Christ." The multitude, eager for miracles, continually thronged the convent. Men worthy of high esteem—among others Lupulus himself, the master of Zwingle—were overawed; and the Dominicans, from the height of the pulpit, extolled the glory which God was bestowing on their order.

This order had, for some years, felt the necessity of humbling the Franciscans, and of augmenting the respect and liberality of the people by means of miracles. Berne, "a simple, rustic, and ignorant town,"—as the sub-prior of Berne described it to the chapter held at Wimpfen on the Neckar,—had been selected as the theatre of their operations. The prior, sub-prior, preacher, and purveyor of the convent, had undertaken to perform the leading characters; but they wanted the talent necessary to perform them to the end. A new apparition of Mary having taken place, Jetzer thought he recognized the voice of his confessor; and having said so aloud, Mary disappeared. She soon made her appearance again, to ensure the incredulous friar. "This time it is the prior," exclaimed Jetzer, rushing forward with a knife in his hand. The saintess threw a pewter plate at the poor friar's head, and likewise disappeared.

In consternation at the discovery which Jetzer had thus made, the Dominicans tried to disencumber themselves of him by means of poison. He perceived it; and, having taken flight, disclosed the imposition. They put on a good countenance, and sent deputies to Rome. The pope commended the decision to his legate in Switzerland, and the bishops of Lausanne and Sion. The four Dominicans being convicted, were condemned to be burnt alive; and on the 1st May, 1509, were consumed by the flames, in presence of more than thirty thousand spectators. The affair made a noise throughout Europe; and by unveiling one of the worst sores of the Church, prepared the Reformation.

Such were the men into whose hands Ulrich Zwingle had nearly fallen. He had studied literature at Berne; he behoved now to devote himself to philosophy, and with this view repaired to Vienna. A youth from St. Gall, named Joachim Vadian, whose genius gave promise to Switzerland of a distinguished scholar and a statesman; Henri Loreti, of the canton of Glaris, commonly called Glarean, and apparently destined to shine among poets; John Heigerlin, son of a forgemaster, and hence surnamed Faber, of a versatile temper, fond of honour and glory, possessing all the qualities indicative of a courtier,—such were Ulrich's fellow-students and companions in the capital of Austria.

Zwingle returned to Wildhaus in 1502; but on revisiting his mountains he felt that he had drunk of the cup of science, and could no longer live amid the songs of his brothers and the bleating of their flocks. He was eighteen years of age, and repaired to Bale to engage again in literary pursuits; and thus, at once master and pupil, he taught at the school of St. Martin, and studied at the university; from this time he was able to dispense with assistance from his father. Shortly after, he took the degree of Master of Arts. An Alsatian, named Capito, nine years older than he, was one of his best friends.

Zwingle devoted himself to the study of scholastic theology; for, being called one day to combat its sophisms, he behoved to explore its obscure labyrinth. But the light-hearted student of the mountains of Sentis was often seen suddenly to shake off the dust of the school, and, substituting amusement for his philosophic toils, seize the lute, or the harp, or the violin, or the flute, or the tympanon, or the cornet, or the hunting horn, extract joyous sounds from these instruments as in the prairies of Lisighaus, and make his lodgings, or the dwellings of his friends, re-echo with the airs of his country, accompanying them with his voice. In regard to music, he was a true child of the Tockenburgh, superior to all. In addition to the instruments we have already named, he played several others. An enthusiast in the art, he diffused a taste for it in the university,—not from any desire of dissipation, but because he loved thus to relax his mind when fatigued by serious study, and fit himself for returning with greater zeal to difficult labours. None had a gayer humour, a more amiable disposition, or more engaging conversation. He was a vigorous Alpine tree, which developed itself in all its gracefulness and strength, and which, never having been pruned, threw out strong branches in all directions. The time was coming when these branches would turn vigorously in the direction of heaven.

After he had forced an entrance into scholastic theology, he left its arid tracts fatigued and disgusted, having found nothing in it but confused ideas, vain babbling, vain glory, barbarism, and not one sound idea of doctrine. "It is only a loss of time," said he, and waited for something better.

At this time (November, 1505) arrived at Bale Thomas Wittenbach, son of a burgo-master of Bienne. Wittenbach had, till then, taught at Tübingen, side by side with Reuchlin. He was in the vigour of life, sincere, pious, skilled in the liberal arts, and mathematics, and well acquainted with the Holy Scriptures. Zwingle and all the academic youth immediately flocked around him. A spirit hitherto unknown animated his lectures, and prophetic words escaped from his lips: "The time is not distant," said he, "when scholastic theology will be abolished, and the ancient doctrine of the Church restored." "The death of Christ," added he, "is the only ransom of our souls." The heart of Zwingle eagerly received these seeds of life. At this period classical studies began everywhere to supplant the scholastics of the Middle Ages. Zwingle, like his preceptors and friends, threw himself into this new course.

Among the students who followed the lessons of the new teacher with the greatest enthusiasm was a young man of twenty-three, of small stature, and a feeble sickly appearance, but whose eye bespoke at once gentleness and intrepidity. This was Leo Juda, son of an Alsatian curate, and whose uncle had fallen at Rhodes, fighting in defence of Christendom, under the standard of the Teutonic knights. Leo and Ulrich were on intimate terms. Leo played the tympanon, and had a very fine voice. The joyous melodies of the young friends of the arts were often heard in his lodgings. Leo Juda, at a later period, became the colleague of Zwingle, and even death could not destroy their sacred friendship.

At this time the office of pastor of Glaris having become vacant, Henri Goldi, a young courtier of the pope, and groom of the stable to his holiness, obtained the appointment from his master, and hastened with it to Glaris. But the Glarian shepherds, proud of the antiquity of their race, and of their battles for freedom, were not disposed to bow implicitly to a piece of parchment from Rome. Wildhaus is not far from Glaris; and Wesen, where Zwingle's uncle was curate, is the place where the market of the district is held. The reputation of the young master of arts of Bale had penetrated even into these mountains; and the Glarians, wishing to have him for their priest, gave him a call in 1506. Zwingle having been ordained at Constance by the bishop, preached his first sermon at Rapperswil, read his first mass at Wildhaus on St. Michael's day, in presence of all his relations and the friends of his family, and towards the close of the year arrived at Glaris.

CHAPTER III.

Love of War—Schinner—Pension from the Pope—The Labyrinth—Zwingle in Italy—Principle of Reform—Zwingle and Luther—Zwingle and Erasmus—Zwingle and the Elders—Paris and Glaris.

Zwingle immediately engaged in the zealous discharge of the work which his vast parish imposed upon him. Still he was only twenty-two years of age, and often allowed himself to be carried away by the dissipation and lax ideas of his age. A priest of Rome, he was like the other priests around him. But even at this period, though the evangelical doctrine had not changed his heart, Zwingle did not give way to those scandals which frequently afflicted the Church. He always felt the need of subjecting his passions to the holy rule of the Gospel.

A love of war at this time inflamed the quiet valleys of Glaris, where there were families of heroes,—the Tschudis, the Walas, the Elblis, whose blood had flowed on the field of battle. The youth listened with eagerness to the old warriors when they told them of the wars of Burgundy and Swabia, of the battles of St. James and Ragaz. But, alas! it was no longer against the enemies of their liberties that these warlike shepherds took up arms. They were seen, at the bidding of the kings of France, of the emperor, the dukes of Milan, or the holy father himself, descending from the Alps like an avalanche, and rushing with the noise of thunder against the troops drawn up in the plain.

A poor boy, named Matthew Schinner, who was at the school of Sion, in the Valais, (it was toward the middle of the latter half of the fifteenth century,) singing before the houses,—as young Martin Luther shortly after did,—heard himself called by an old man, who, being struck with the frankness with which the child answered his questions, said to him, with that prophetic spirit with which man is said to be sometimes endowed when on the brink of the grave: "Thou art to be a bishop and a prince." The expression sunk deep into the young mendicant, and from that moment boundless ambition took possession of his heart. At Zurich and Como, the progress he made astonished his masters. Having become curate of a small parish in Valais, he rose rapidly; and being sent, at a later period, to ask from the pope the confirmation of a bishop of Sion, who had just been elected, he obtained the bishopric for himself, and girt his brow with the episcopal mitre. This man, ambitious and crafty, but often noble and generous, always considered any dignity bestowed upon him as only a step destined to raise him to some still higher dignity. Having offered his services to Louis XII., and named his price, "It is too much for one man," said the king. "I will shew him," replied the Bishop of Sion, offended, "that I am a man worth several men." In fact, he turned towards Pope Julius II., who gladly received him; and Schinner succeeded, in 1510, in linking the whole Swiss confederation to the policy of this ambitious pontiff. The bishop having been rewarded with a cardinal's hat, smiled when he saw that there was now only one step between him and the papal throne.

LAUSANNE CATHEDRAL

Schinner's eye was continually turned to the cantons of Switzerland, and as soon as he there discerned any man of influence, he hastened to attach him to himself. The pastor of Glaris drew his attention, and Zwingle soon received intimation that the pope had granted him an annual pension of fifty florins, to encourage him in the cultivation of letters. His poverty did not allow him to purchase books; and the money, during the short time that Ulrich received it, was devoted to the purchase of classical or theological works, which he procured from Bale. Zwingle was now connected with the cardinal, and accordingly joined the Roman party. Schinner and Julius II. at last disclosed the end which they had in view in these intrigues. Eight thousand Swiss, mustered by the eloquence of the cardinal-archbishop, passed the Alps; but famine, war, and French gold, obliged them to return to their mountains without glory. They brought back the usual results of these foreign wars,—distrust, licentiousness, party spirit, all sorts of violence and disorder. Citizens refused to obey their magistrates, and children their parents; agriculture and the care of their flocks were neglected; luxury and mendicity kept pace with each other; the most sacred ties were broken; and the confederation seemed on the point of being dissolved.

The eyes of the young curate of Glaris were now opened, and his indignation aroused. He raised his voice aloud, to warn them of the abyss into which they were about to fall. In 1510, he published his poem, entitled "The Labyrinth." Behind the windings of this mysterious garden, Minos has hidden the Minotaur, that monster, half-man half-bull, whom he feeds on the flesh of young Athenians. "The Minotaur, . . . in other words," says Zwingle, "sin, vice, irreligion, and the foreign service of the Swiss," devour the sons of his countrymen.

Theseus, a man of courage, wishes to deliver his country; but numerous obstacles arrest him:—first, a lion with one eye; this is Spain and Arragon;—then a crowned eagle, whose throat is opened to devour it; this is the empire;—then a cock, with his comb up, and calling for battle; this is France. The hero surmounts all these obstacles, gets up to the monster, stabs it, and saves his country.

"So now," exclaims the poet, "men wander in a labyrinth; but having no thread to guide them, they cannot regain the light. Nowhere is there any imitation of Jesus Christ. A little glory makes us hazard our life, torment our neighbour, rush into strife, war, and combat. . . . One would say that the furies have escaped from the depths of hell."

A Theseus—a reformer, was required. Zwingle perceived this, and thenceforth had a presentiment of his mission. Not long after, he composed an allegory with a still clearer application.

GATE ST. PAUL, BÂLE.

In April, 1512, the confederates arose anew at the bidding of the cardinal, for the deliverance of the Church. Glaris was in the foremost rank. The whole population was brought into the field, ranged round their banner with their laudaman and their pastor. Zwingle behoved to march. The army passed the Alps; and the cardinal appeared amidst the confederates with the presents given him by the pope,—a ducal hat adorned with pearls and gold, and surmounted by the Holy Spirit, represented under the form of a dove. The Swiss escalated the fortresses and towns, swam rivers in the presence of the enemy, unclotted, and with halberds in their hands; the French were everywhere put to flight; bells and trumpets resounded, and the population flocked from all quarters; the nobles supplied the army with wine and fruits in abundance; the monks and priests mounted on platforms, and proclaimed, that the confederates were the people of God, taking vengeance on the enemies of the Lord's spouse; and the pope becoming prophet, like Caiaphas of old, gave the confederates the title of "Defenders of the Liberty of the Church."

This sojourn of Zwingle in Italy was not without its effect in reference to his vocation of reformer. On his return from this campaign he began to study Greek, "in order," says he, "to be able to draw the doctrine of Jesus Christ from the very fountain of truth." Writing to Vadian, 23rd February, 1513, he says: "I have resolved so to apply myself to the study of Greek, that none will be able to turn me from it but God. I do it not for fame, but from love to sacred literature." At a later period, a worthy priest, who had been his school companion, having come to pay him a visit, said to him: "Master Ulrich, I am assured that you are tainted with the new heresy—that you are a Lutheran." "I am not a Lutheran," said Zwingle, "for I knew Greek before I heard of the name of Luther." To know Greek, to study the Gospel in the original tongue, was, according to Zwingle, the basis of the Reformation.

Zwingle did more than recognise, at this early period, the great principle of evangelical Christianity—the infallible authority of the Holy Scriptures. Besides this, he understood how the meaning of the Divine Word ought to be ascertained. "Those," said he, "have a very grovelling idea of the Scriptures, who regard whatever seems to them at variance with their own reason as frivolous, vain, and unjust. Men have no right to bind the Gospel at pleasure to their own sense and their own interpretation." "Zwingle raised his eye to heaven," said his dearest friend, "unwilling to have any other interpreter than the Holy Spirit himself."

Such, from the commencement of his career, was the man whom some have not scrupled to represent as having wished to subject the Bible to human reason. "Philosophy and theology," said he, "cease not to raise up objections against me. I, at length, arrived at this conclusion: 'We must leave all these things, and seek our knowledge of God only in His Word.' I began," continues he, "earnestly to supplicate the Lord to give me His light; and though I read only the text of Scripture, it became far clearer to me than if I had read a host of commentators." Comparing the Scriptures with themselves, and explaining passages that were obscure by such as were more clear, he soon had a thorough knowledge of the Bible, especially the New Testament. When Zwingle thus turned toward the Holy Scriptures, Switzerland took her first step in the Reformation. Accordingly, when he expounded the Scriptures, every one felt that his lessons came from God, and not from man. "Work all divine!" here exclaims Oswald Myconius; "thus was the knowledge of heavenly truth restored to us!"

Zwingle did not, however, despise the expositions of the most celebrated doctors. At a later period he studied Origen, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, Chrysostom; but not as authorities. "I study the doctors," says he, "with the same feelings with which one asks a friend, 'What do you understand by this?'" The Holy Scripture was, according to him, the touchstone by which the most holy of the doctors were themselves to be tested.

Zwingle's step was slow, but progressive. He did not come to the truth, like Luther, amid those tempests which compel the soul to seek a speedy shelter. He arrived at it by the peaceful influence of Scripture, whose power gradually shone upon the heart. Luther reached the wished-for shore across the billows of the boundless deep; Zwingle, by allowing himself to glide along the stream. These are the two principal ways by which God leads men. Zwingle was not fully converted to God and His Gospel till the first period of his sojourn at Zurich; yet, in 1511 or 1515, at the moment when the strong man began to bend the knee to God, praying for the understanding of His Word, the rays of that pure light by which he was afterwards illumined first began to gleam upon him.

At this period a poem of Erasmus, in which Jesus Christ was introduced addressing man as perishing by his own fault, made a powerful impression on Zwingle. When alone in his study, he repeated the passage in which Jesus complains that all grace is not sought from Him, though He is the source of all that is good. "ALL!" said Zwingle, "ALL!" And this word was incessantly present to his mind. "Are there, then, creatures, saints, from whom we ought to ask assistance? No! Christ is our only treasure."

ZWINGLE.

Zwingle did not confine his reading to Christian writings. One of the distinguishing characteristics of the sixteenth century, is the profound study of the Greek and Roman authors. The poetry of Hesiod, Homer, Pindar, enraptured him; and he has left us commentaries, or characteristics, on the two last poets. It seemed to him that Pindar spoke of his gods in such sublime strains, that he must have had some presentiment of the true God. He studied Cicero and Demosthenes thoroughly, and learned from them both the art of the orator and the duties of the citizen. He called Seneca a holy man. The Swiss mountaineer loved also to initiate himself in the mysteries of nature, through the writings of Pliny, Thucydides, Sallust, Livy, Caesar, Suetonius, Plutarch, and Tacitus, taught him to know the world. He has been censured for his enthusiastic admiration of the great men of antiquity, and it is true that some of his observations on this subject cannot be defended. But if he honoured them so much, it was because he thought he saw in them not human virtues, but the influence of the Holy Spirit. The agency of God, far from confining itself to ancient times within the limits of Palestine, extended, according to him, to the whole world. "Plato," said he, "has also drunk at the Divine source. And if the two Catos, if Camillus, if Scipio, had not been truly religious, would they have been so magnanimous?"

Zwingle diffused around him a love of letters. Several choice youths were trained in his school. "You offered me not only books, but also yourself," wrote Valentine Tschudi, son of one of the heroes of the wars of Burgundy; and this young man, who at that time had already studied at Vienna and Bale, under the most celebrated teachers, adds: "I have never met with any one who explained the Classics with so much precision and profundity as yourself." Tschudi repaired to Paris, and was able to compare the spirit which prevailed in that university with that which he had found in the narrow Alpine valley, over which impend the gigantic peaks and eternal snows of the Dodi, the Garmisch, the Viggis, and the Freyberg. "How frivolously," says he, "the French youth are educated! No poison is so bad as the sophistical art in which they are trained,—an art which stupefies the senses, destroys the judgment, brutifies the whole man. Man is thenceforth, like the echo, an empty sound. Ten women could not keep pace with one of these rhetoricians. In their prayers even they present their sophisms to God, (I know the fact,) and pretend, by their syllogisms, to constrain the Holy Spirit to hear them." Such, then, were Paris and Glaris,—the intellectual metropolis of Christendom, and a village of Alpine shepherds. A ray of the Divine Word gives more light than all human wisdom.

CHAPTER IV.

Zwingle in regard to Erasmus—Oswald Myconius—The Vagrants—Ozolampodius—Zwingle at Marignan—Zwingle and Italy—Method of Zwingle—Commencement of Reform—Discovery.

A GREAT man of this age, Erasmus, had much influence on Zwingle, who, as soon as any of his writings appeared, lost no time in procuring it. In 1514, Erasmus had arrived at Bale, and been received by the bishop with marks of high esteem. All the friends of letters had immediately grouped around him. But the monarch of the schools had no difficulty in singling out him who was to be the glory of Switzerland. "I congratulate the Swiss nation," wrote he to Zwingle,

"that by your studies and your manners, both alike excellent, you labour to polish and elevate them." Zwingle had a most ardent desire to see him. "Spaniards and Gauls went to Rome to see Titus Livy," said he. He set out, and on arriving at Bale, found a personage of about forty years of age, of small stature, a frail body, a delicate look, but a remarkably amiable and winning address. It was Erasmus. His affability removed the timidity of Zwingle, while the power of his intellect overawed him. "Poor," said Ulrich to him, "as Æschines, when each of the scholars of Socrates offered a present to his master, I give you what Æschines gave—I give you myself."

Among the literary men who formed the court of Erasmus—the Amerbachs, the Rheuans, the Frebeniuses, the Nessens, the Glareans—Zwingle observed a youth from Lucerne, of twenty-seven years of age, named Oswald Geissbühler. Erasmus, hallowing his name, had called him Myconius. We will often designate him by his surname, to distinguish the friend of Zwingle from Frederick Myconius, the disciple of Luther. Oswald, after studying first at Rothwyl with Berthold Haller, a young man of his own age, next at Berne, and lastly at Bale, had, in this last town, been appointed rector of the school of St. Theodoret, and afterwards of that of St. Peter. The humble schoolmaster had a very limited income; but, notwithstanding, had married a young girl of a simplicity and purity of soul which won all hearts. We have already seen that Switzerland was then in a troubled state, foreign wars having stirred up violent disorders, and the soldiers having brought back to their country licentiousness and brutality. One dark and cloudy winter day some of these rude men, in Oswald's absence, attacked his quiet dwelling. They knocked at the door, threw stones, and applied the grossest expressions to his modest spouse. At last they burst open the windows, and having forced their way into the school and broken everything to pieces, made off. Oswald arrived shortly after. His little boy, Felix, ran out to meet him crying, while his wife, unable to speak, shewed signs of the greatest terror. He understood what had happened, and at that moment, hearing a noise in the street, unable to restrain himself, he seized a musket, and pursued the villains as far as the burying-ground. They retreated, intending to defend themselves. Three of them rushed upon Myconius and wounded him; and while his wound was being dressed, these wretches again attacked his house, uttering cries of fury. Oswald says no more of the matter. Such scenes frequently occurred in Switzerland at the beginning of the sixteenth century, before the Reformation had softened and disciplined manners.

The integrity of Oswald Myconius, his thirst for science and virtue, brought him into connection with Zwingle. The rector of the school of Bale was alive to all that was grand in the curate of Glaris. Full of humility, he shunned the praises bestowed upon him by Zwingle and Erasmus. "You schoolmasters," often said the latter, "I esteem as highly as I do kings." But the modest Myconius did not think so. "I only crawl along the ground," said he. "From infancy I had always a feeling of littleness and humility."

A preacher who had arrived at Bale about the same time as Zwingle was attracting attention. Of a mild and pacific disposition, he led a tranquil life; slow and circumspect in conduct, his chief pleasure was to labour in his study, and produce concord among Christians. He was named John Hausschein, in Greek, Ceolampadius.—that is, "light of the house,"—and was born of wealthy parents in Franconia, a year before Zwingle. His pious mother longed to consecrate to literature and to God the old child whom He had left her. The father intended him first for a mercantile life, then for law. But as Ceolampadius was returning from Bologna, where he had been studying law, the Lord, who designed to make him a lamp in the Church, called him to the study of theology. He was preaching in his native town when Capito, who had known him at Heidelberg, procured his appointment as preacher at Bale. There he proclaimed Christ with an eloquence which filled his hearers with admiration. Erasmus admitted him to his intimacy. Ceolampadius was enraptured with the hours which he spent in the society of this great genius. "In the Holy Scriptures," said the prince of literature, "one thing only ought to be sought,—viz., Jesus Christ." As a memento of his friendship, he gave the young preacher the commencement of John's Gospel. Ceolampadius often kissed this precious pledge of affection, and kept it suspended to his crucifix, "in order," said he, "that I may always remember Erasmus in my prayers."

Zwingle returned to his mountains, his mind and heart full of all that he had seen and heard at Bale. "I could not sleep," wrote he to Erasmus, shortly after his return, "if I had not conversed for some time with you. There is nothing of which I boast so much as of having seen Erasmus. Zwingle had received a new impulse. Such journeys often exercise a great influence over the career of the Christian. The disciples of Zwingle—Valentin, Jost, Louis Peter, and Egidius Tschudi; his friends—the landman Ebli, the curate Binzli of Wesen, Fridolin Brunnen, and the celebrated professor Glarean—saw, with admiration, how he grew in wisdom and knowledge. The old honoured him as a courageous servant of his country, and faithful pastors honoured him as a faithful servant of the Lord. Nothing was done in the district without taking his advice. All the good hoped that he would one day restore the ancient virtue of the Swiss.

Francis I. having mounted the throne, and being desirous to vindicate the honour of the French name in Italy, the pope, in alarm, laboured to gain the cantons. Accordingly, in 1515, Ulrich revisited the plains of Italy amid the phalanxes of his fellow-citizens. But the division which French intrigues produced in the army stung him to the heart. He was often seen in the middle of the camp energetically, and at the same time wisely, haranguing his hearers in full armour ready for battle. On the 8th September, five days before the battle of Marignan, he preached in the public square of Monza, where the Swiss soldiers who remained true to their colours had reassembled. "Had the counsels of Zwingle been followed then and afterwards," says Werner Steiner of Zug, "what evils would not our country have been saved!" But all cars were shut to words of concord, prudence, and submission. The vehement eloquence of Cardinal Schinner electrified the confederates, and hurried them impetuously to the fatal field of Marignan. There fell the flower of the Helvetic youth. Zwingle, who had been unable to prevent all these disasters, threw himself, for the cause of Rome, into the midst of danger. His hand seized the sword. Sad error of Zwingle! A minister of Christ, he more than once forgot that it was his duty to fight only with spiritual weapons; and he was to see in his own person a striking fulfilment of our Saviour's prophecy: He who takes the sword shall perish by the sword

Zwingle and his Swiss had been unable to save Rome. The ambassador of Venice was the first in the pontifical city who received news of the defeat at Marignan. Delighted, he repaired at an early hour to the Vatican. The pope came out of his apartment half-dressed to give him an audience. Leo X., on learning the news, did not disguise his terror. At this moment of alarm he saw only Francis I., and hoped only in him. "Ambassador," said he, trembling, to Zorsi, "we must throw ourselves into the arms of the king, and cry for mercy." Luther and Zwingle, in their danger, knew another arm, and invoked another mercy.

This second sojourn in Italy was not without use to Zwingle. He observed the differences between the Ambrosian ritual used at Milan and that of Rome. He collected and compared together the most ancient canons of the mass. In this way a spirit of inquiry was developed in him even amid the tumult of camps. At the same time the sight of his countrymen led away beyond the Alps, and given up, like cattle, to the slaughter, filled him with indignation. "The flesh of the confederates," it was said, "is cheaper than that of their oxen and their calves." The disloyalty and ambition of the pope, the avarice and ignorance of the priests, the licentiousness and dissipation of the monks, the pride and luxury of prelates, the corruption and venality employed on all hands to win the Swiss, being forced on his view more strongly than ever, made him still more alive to the necessity of a reform in the Church.

From this time Zwingle preached the Word of God more clearly. In explaining the portions of the Gospel and epistles selected for public worship, he always compared Scripture with Scripture. He spoke with animation and force, and followed with his hearers the same course which God was following with him. He did not, like Luther, proclaim the sores of the Church; but as often as the study of the Bible suggested some useful instruction to himself, he communicated it to his hearers. He tried to make them receive the truth into their hearts, and then trusted to it for the works which it behoved to produce. "If they understand what is true," thought he, "they will discern what is false." This maxim is good at the commencement of a reformation; but a time comes when error must be boldly stigmatized. This Zwingle knew very well. "The spring," said he, "is the season to sow;" and with him it was now spring.

Zwingle has marked out this period (1516) as the commencement of the Swiss Reformation. In fact, if, four years before, he had bent his head over the Word of God, he now raised it, and turned it towards his people, to make them share in the light which he had found. This forms a new and important epoch in the history of the development of the religious revolution of those countries; but it has been erroneously concluded from these dates, that the Reformation of Zwingle preceded that of Luther. It may be that Zwingle preached the Gospel a year before Luther's theses; but Luther himself preached it four years before these famous propositions. Had Luther and Zwingle confined themselves merely to sermons, the Reformation would not have so quickly gained ground in the Church. Neither Luther nor Zwingle was the first monk or the first priest who preached a purer doctrine than that of the schoolmen. But Luther was the first who publicly, and with indomitable courage, raised the standard of truth against the empire of error; called general attention to the fundamental doctrine of the Gospel—salvation by grace; introduced his age to that new career of knowledge, faith, and life, out of which a new world has arisen; in a word, began a true and salutary revolution. The great struggle, of which the theses of 1517 were the signal, was truly the birth-throe of the Reformation, giving it at once both a body and a soul. Luther was the first reformer.

Æ COLAMPADIUS.

A spirit of inquiry began to breathe on the mountains of Switzerland. One day the curate of Glaris, happening to be in the smiling district of Mollis, with Adam, its curate, Bunzli, curate of Wesen, and Varachon, curate of Kerensen, these friends discovered an old liturgy, in which they read these words: "After baptising the child, we give him the sacrament of the Eucharist and the cup of blood." "Then," said Zwingle, "the supper was at that period dispensed in our churches under the two kinds." The liturgy was about two hundred years old. This was a great discovery for these priests of the Alps.

The defeat at Marignan had important results in the interior of the cantons. The conqueror, Francis I, lavished gold and flattery, in order to gain the confederates; while the emperor besought them by their honour, by the tears of widows and orphans, and the blood of their brethren, not to sell themselves to their murderers. The French party gained the ascendancy at Glaris, which, from that time, was an uncomfortable residence to Ulrich.

Zwingle, at Glaris, might perhaps have remained a man of the world. Party intrigues, political questions, the empire, France, or the Duke of Milan, might have absorbed his whole life. Those whom God means to prepare for great services, He never leaves amid the turmoil of the world. He leads them apart, and places them in a retreat where they commune with Him and their own consciences, and receive lessons never to be effaced. The Son of God himself, who in this was a type of the training given to His servants, spent forty days in the desert. It was time to remove Zwingle from political movements, which, continually pressing upon his thoughts, might have banished the Spirit of God from them. It was time to train him for another stage than that on which courtiers, cabinets, and parties move, and where he should have wasted powers worthy of nobler employment. His country, indeed, needed something else. It was necessary that a new life should now come down from heaven, and that he who was to be the instrument in communicating it, should unlearn worldly things, in order to learn things above. The two spheres are entirely distinct; a wide space separates these two worlds; and before passing entirely from the one to the other, Zwingle was to sojourn for a time on neutral ground, in a kind of intermediate and preparatory state, to be there taught of God. God, accordingly, took him away from the factions of Glaris, and, with a view to this noviciate, placed him in the solitude of a hermitage—confining within the narrow walls of a abbey this noble germ of the Reformation, which was shortly after to be transplanted to a better soil, and cover the mountains with its shadow.

CHAPTER V.

Meinrad of Hohenzollern—Our Lady of Einsidlen—Calling of Zwingle—The Abbot—Geroldseck—Companionship in Study—The Bible Copied—Zwingle and Superstition—First Opposition to Error—Sensation—Hedio—Zwingle and the Legates—The Honours of Rome—The Bishop of Constance—Samson and Indulgences—Stapfer—Charity of Zwingle—His Friends.

MEINRAD OF HOHENZOLLERN, a German monk, about the middle of the ninth century, wandering on till he came between the lakes of Zurich and Wallenstadt, had stopped upon a hill, resting on an amphitheatre of firs, and there built a cell. Banditti imbrued their hands in the blood of the saint. The bloody cell was long deserted; but towards the end of the tenth century, a convent and a church, in honour of the Virgin, were erected on the sacred spot. On the eve of the day of consecration, when the Bishop of Constance and his priests were at prayers in the church, a celestial chant, proceeding from invisible voices, suddenly echoed through the chapel. They prostrated themselves and listened in amaze. The next day, when the bishop was going to consecrate the chapel, a voice repeated thrice: "Stop, brother, stop! God himself has consecrated it!" It was said that Christ in person had blessed it during the night; that the chant which they had heard proceeded from angels, apostles, and saints; and that the Virgin, standing upon the altar, had blazed forth like a flash of lightning. A bull of Pope Leo VII. forbade the faithful to question the truth of this legend. Thenceforward an immense crowd of pilgrims ceased not to repair to Our Lady of the Eremites to "the Consecration of Angels." Delphi and Ephesus in ancient, and Loretto in modern times, alone have equalled the fame of Einsidlen. It was in this strange place that, in 1516, Ulrich Zwingle was called as priest and preacher.

Zwingle hesitated not. "Neither ambition nor avarice takes me there," said he; "but the intrigues of the French." Higher motives determined him. On the one hand, having more solitude, more calmness, and a less extensive parish, he could devote more time to study and meditation; on the other hand, this place of pilgrimage would give him facilities for spreading the knowledge of Jesus Christ to the remotest countries."

The friends of evangelical preaching at Glaris expressed deep grief.

"What worse could happen to Glaris," said Peter Tschudi, one of the most distinguished citizens of the canton, "than to be deprived of so great a man?" His parishioners, finding him immovable, resolved to leave him the title of pastor of Glaris, with part of the benefice, and the means of returning when he chose.

Conrad of Rechberg, a gentleman of ancient family, grave, candid, intrepid, and occasionally somewhat rude, was one of the most celebrated sportsmen of the district to which Zwingle was removed. He had established on one of his farms a manège, in which he reared a breed of horses which became celebrated in Italy. Such was the abbot of Our Lady of the Eremites. Rechberg was equally averse to the pretensions of Rome and the discussions of theologians. One day, during a visitation of the order, some observations were made to him. "I am master here, not you," said he, somewhat rudely; "get along." One day at table, when Leo Juda was discussing some difficult point with the administrator of the convent, the hunting abbot exclaimed: "You, there, leave your disputes to me. I exclaim with David: Have pity on me, O God, according to thy goodness, and enter not into judgment with thy servant. I have no need to know any more."

Baron Theobald of Geroldsek was administrator of the monastery. He was of a meek spirit, sincerely pious, and had a great love of literature. His favourite design was to form a society of well-informed men in his convent; and it was for this reason he had given a call to Zwingle. Eager for instruction and reading, he begged his new friend to direct him. "Read the Holy Scriptures," replied Zwingle; "and that you may the better understand them, study Jerome. However," added he, "the time will come (and, by God's help, it is not far off) when Christians will not set a high value either on Jerome or any other doctor, but only on the Word of God." The conduct of Geroldsek gave indication of his progress in the faith. He allowed the nuns of a convent, dependent on Einsidlen, to read the Bible in the vulgar tongue; and, some years after, Geroldsek came to live at Zurich, beside Zwingle, and to die with him on the field of Cappel. The charm which hung about Zwingle soon united him, in tender friendship, not only with Geroldsek, but also the chaplain Zink, the excellent Gexlin, and other inmates of the abbey. These studious men, far from the noise of party, joined together in reading the Scriptures, the Fathers of the Church, the masterpieces of antiquity, and the writings of the restorers of letters. This interesting society was often enlarged by friends from a distance. Among others, Capito one day arrived at Einsidlen. The two old friends of Bale walked together over the convent and the wild scenery in its neighbourhood, absorbed in conversation, examining the Scriptures, and seeking to know the Divine will. There was a point on which they were agreed, and it was this: "The Pope of Rome must fall." At this time Capito was more courageous than he was at a later period.

Repose, leisure, books, friends,—all these Zwingle had in this tranquil retreat, and he accordingly grew in understanding and in faith. At this period (May, 1517) he commenced a work which was of great utility to him. As in old times the kings of Israel wrote the law of God with their own hand, so Zwingle, with his, copied the Epistles of St. Paul. The only editions of the New Testament then in existence were of large size, and Zwingle wished to have one which he could carry about with him.¹ These epistles he learned by heart, as he did afterwards the other books of the New, and a part of the Old Testament. Thus his heart became always more attached to the sovereign authority of the Word of God. He was not satisfied with merely acknowledging this; he was, moreover, desirous to bring his life into true subjection to it. His views gradually became more decidedly Christian. The end for which he had been brought into this desert was accomplished. It is no doubt true that Zurich is the place where his whole soul became thoroughly pervaded with Christian principle; but even now, at Einsidlen, he made decided progress in the work of sanctification. At Glaris he had taken part in the amusements of the world; at Einsidlen he was more anxious for a life unsullied by any taint of worldliness. Beginning to have a better idea of the great spiritual interests of the people, he gradually learned what God designed to teach him.

Providence had also other views in bringing him to Einsidlen. Here he obtained a nearer view of the superstitions and abuses which had invaded the Church. An image of the Virgin which was carefully preserved in this monastery, had, it was said, the power of working miracles. Above the gate of the abbey appeared this presumptuous inscription: "Here is obtained a plenary remission of all sins." A multitude of pilgrims flocked to Einsidlen from all parts of Christendom, to merit this grace by their pilgrimage. The church, the abbey, and the whole valley were crowded with devout worshippers on the festivals of the Virgin. But it was especially at the grand festival of "the Consecration of the Angels," that the hermitage was crowded to overflowing. Thousands of individuals of both sexes climbed the acclivity of the hill leading to the oratory, singing hymns and counting their beads. These devout pilgrims crowded into the church, thinking they were there nearer God than anywhere else.

The residence of Zwingle at Einsidlen was, in regard to the exposure of papal abuses, similar in effect to Luther's visit to Rome. Zwingle's education for reformer was completed at Einsidlen. God alone is the source of salvation, and He is so everywhere,—these were the two truths which he learned at Einsidlen, and they became fundamental articles in his creed. The serious impression produced on his soul soon manifested itself externally. Struck with the many prevailing evils, he resolved to oppose them boldly. Not hesitating between his conscience and his interest, he stood up openly, and, in plain and energetic terms, attacked the superstition of the surrounding crowds. "Think not," said he from the pulpit, "that God is in this temple more than in any other part of His creation. Whatever be the country in which you dwell, God encompasses you, and hears you as well as in Our Lady of Einsidlen. Can useless works, long pilgrimages, offerings, images, the invocation of the Virgin or the saints, obtain the grace of God? . . . What avails the multitude of words in which we embody our prayers? What avails a glossy hood—a head well shaven—a long robe with its neat folds, and mules caparisoned with gold? God looks to the heart; but our heart is alienated from God."

But Zwingle wished to do more than lift his voice against superstition. He wished to satisfy that eager longing for reconciliation with God, felt by many of the pilgrims who had flocked to the chapel of Our Lady of Einsidlen. "Christ," cried he, like a John Baptist in this new wilderness of Judea,—“Christ, who was once offered on the cross, is the expiatory victim, who, even through eternity, makes satisfaction for the sins of all believers.” Thus Zwingle advanced. The day when this bold sermon was heard in the most venerated sanctuary of Switzerland, the standard prepared against Rome began to be more distinctly displayed on its mountain heights, and there was, so to speak, a heaving of reform reaching even to their deepest foundations.

In fact, universal astonishment seized the multitude on hearing the discourse of the eloquent priest. Some walked off in horror; others hesitated between the faith of their fathers and the doctrine fitted to secure their peace; while several came to Jesus Christ, who was thus preached to them, and finding rest to their souls, took back the tapers which they had intended to present to the Virgin. A crowd of pilgrims returned to their homes, announcing everywhere what they had heard at Einsidlen. "Christ ALONE saves, and saves EVERYWHERE." Bands, astonished at what they heard, stopped short without finishing their pilgrimage. The worshippers of Mary diminished from day to day. Their offerings formed almost the whole income of Zwingle and Geroldsek; but the intrepid witness of the truth felt happy to be impoverished, in order that souls might be spiritually enriched.

During the feast of Pentecost, in the year 1518, among the numerous hearers of Zwingle, was a learned man of meek temper and active charity, named Gaspard Hedio, doctor of theology at Bale. Zwingle preached on the cure of the paralytic, (Luke v.,) where our Saviour declares: "The Son of Man hath power upon earth to forgive sins,—words well fitted to strike the crowd assembled in the Church of the Virgin. The preacher roused, enraptured, and inflamed his audience, especially the doctor from Bale. A long time after, Hedio expressed his high admiration. "How beautiful," said he, "this discourse! how profound, weighty, complete, penetrating, and evangelical! how much it reminds one of the erepveia (Hedio) of the ancient doctors!" From that moment Hedio admired and loved Zwingle. He would fain have gone to him and opened his heart; he wandered around the abbey, but durst not approach, kept back, as he expresses it, by a superstitious timidity. He again mounted his horse, and slowly retired from Our Lady, ever and again turning his head to the spot which contained so great a treasure, and feeling in his heart the keenest regret.

Thus Zwingle preached, less forcibly, no doubt, than Luther, but with more moderation, and not less success. He did nothing precipitately, and did not come so violently into collision with men's minds as the Saxon reformer; he expected everything from the power of truth. He displayed the same wisdom in his relations with the heads of the Church. Far from immediately declaring himself their enemy, he long remained their friend. They were exceedingly indulgent to him, not only because of his learning and talents, (Luther had the same claims to the regard of the bishops of Mentz and Brandenburg,) but especially because of his attachment to the pope's political party, and the influence possessed by such a man as Zwingle in a republican state.

In fact, several cantons, disgusted with the service of the pope, were disposed to break with him. But the legates flattered themselves they might retain several of them by gaining Zwingle, as they gained Erasmus, with pensions and honours. At this time the legates, Eunius and Pucci, went frequently to Einsidlen, where, from its proximity to the democratic cantons, it was more easy to carry on negotiations with them. But Zwingle, far from sacrificing the truth to the demands and offers of Rome, omitted no opportunity of defending the Gospel. The famous Schinner, who had then some disturbance in his diocese, passed some time at Einsidlen. "The whole papacy," said Zwingle one day, "rests on a bad foundation. Put your hand to the work, remove errors and abuses, or you will see the whole edifice crumble to pieces with fearful uproar."

He spoke with the same frankness to legate Pucci. Four times did he return to the charge. "With the help of God," said he to him, "I will continue to preach the Gospel, and this preaching will shake Rome." Then he pointed out to him what was necessary to save the Church. Pucci promised everything, but did nothing. Zwingle declared that he renounced the pension from the pope. The legate entreated him to retain it; and Zwingle, who at that time had no thought of placing himself in open hostility to the head of the Church, consented for three years to receive it. "But think not," added he, "that for the love of money I retrench a single syllable of the truth." Pucci, alarmed, made the reformer be appointed chaplain acolyte to the pope. It was an avenue to new honours. Rome thought to frighten Luther by sentences of condemnation, and to win Zwingle by favours—darting her excommunications at the one, and displaying her gold and magnificence to the other. She thus endeavoured, by two different methods, to attain the same end, and silence the bold lips which dared, in spite of the pope, to proclaim the Word of God in Germany and Switzerland. The latter method was the more skillful, but neither of them succeeded. The enfranchised souls of the preachers of truth were equally inaccessible to menace and favour.

Another Swiss prelate, Hugo of Landenberg, bishop of Constance, at this time gave some hopes to Zwingle.

He ordered a general visitation of the churches. But Landenberg, a man of no character, allowed himself to be led alternately by Faber, his vicar, and by an abandoned female, from whose sway he was unable to escape. He occasionally appeared to honour the Gospel, and yet any one who preached it boldly was, in his eyes, only a disturber. He was one of those men, too common in the Church, who, though loving truth better than error, have more indulgence for error than for truth, and often end by turning against those with whom they ought to make common cause. Zwingle applied to him, but in vain. He was to have the same experience which Luther had,—to be convinced that it was useless to invoke the heads of the Church, and that the only method of restoring Christianity was to act as a faithful teacher of the Word of God. An opportunity of doing so soon occurred.

In August, 1518, a Franciscan monk was seen travelling on the heights of St. Gothard, in those lofty passes which have been laboriously cut across the steep rocks separating Switzerland from Italy. Having come forth from an Italian convent, he was the bearer of papal indulgences which he was commissioned to sell to the good Christians of the Helvetic league. Brilliant success, obtained under two preceding popes, had signalized his exertions in this shameful traffic. Companions, intended to puff off the merchandise which he was going to sell, were accompanying him across mountains of snow and ice coeval with the world. This avaricious band—in appearance miserable enough, and not unlike a band of adventurers roaming for plunder—walked in silence, amid the noise of the foaming torrents which give rise to the Rhine, the Reuss, the Aar, the Rhone, the Tessino, and other rivers, meditating how they were to plunder the simple population of Helvetia. Samson (this was the Franciscan's name) and his company first arrived in Uri, and there commenced their traffic. They had soon done with these poor peasants, and passed into the canton of Schwitz. Here Zwingle was, and here the combat between these two servants of two very different masters was to take place. "I can pardon all sins," said the Italian monk—the Tetzler of Switzerland. "Heaven and hell are subject to my power, and I sell the merits of Jesus Christ to whoever will purchase them, by paying in cash for an indulgence."

Zwingle heard of these discourses, and his zeal was inflamed.

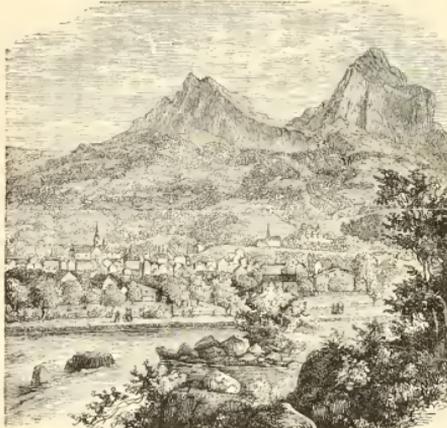

He preached powerfully against them. "Jesus Christ, the Son of God," said he, "thus speaks: Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Is it not, then, audacious folly and insensate temerity to say, on the contrary: 'Purchase letters of indulgence! run to Rome! give to the monks! sacrifice to the priests! If you do these things I will absolve you from your sins?' Jesus Christ is the only offering; Jesus Christ is the only sacrifice; Jesus Christ is the only way."

Everybody at Schwitz began to call Samson rogue and cheat. He took the road to Zug, and for this time the two champions failed to meet.

Scarcely had Samson left Schwitz when a citizen of this canton, named Stapfer, a man of distinguished talent, and afterward secretary of state, was with his family reduced to great distress. "Alas!" said he, when applying in agony to Zwingle, "I know not how to satisfy my own hunger and the hunger of my poor children." Zwingle knew to give where Rome knew to take; he was as ready to practise good works as to combat those who taught that they were the means of obtaining salvation. He daily gave liberally to Stäpfer. "It is God," said he, anxious not to take any glory to himself,—"It is God who begets charity in the believer, and gives him at once the thought, the resolution, and the work itself. Whatever good a righteous man does, it is God who does it by His own power." Stäpfer remained attached to him through life; and, four years after, when he had become secretary of state, and felt wants of a higher kind, he turned towards Zwingle, and said to him with noble candour: "Since you provided for my temporal wants, how much more may I now expect from you wherewith to appease the hunger of my soul!"

The friends of Zwingle increased. Not only at Glaris, Bâle, and Schwitz, did he find men of like spirit with himself; in Uri there was the secretary of state, Schmidt; at Zug, Colla, Müller, and Werner Steiner, his old companions in arms at Marignan; at Lucerne, Xyloctect and Kilchmeyer; Wittembach at Biemme; and many others in many other places. But the curate of Einsidlen had no more devoted friend than Oswald Myconius. Oswald had quitted Bâle in 1516, to take charge of the cathedral school at Zurich. In this town there were no learned men, and no schools of learning. Oswald laboured along with some well-disposed individuals—among others, Utinger, notary to the pope—to raise the Zurich population out of ignorance, and initiate them in ancient literature. At the same time he defended the immutable truth of the Holy Scriptures, and declared, that if the pope or emperor gave commands contrary to the Gospel, obedience was due to God alone, who is above both emperor and pope.

SEVEN centuries had elapsed since Charlemagne had attached a college of canons to this cathedral, over whose school Oswald Myconius then presided. These canons having degenerated from their first institution, and desiring in their benefices to enjoy the sweets of indolence, elected a priest to preach and take the cure of souls. This situation having become vacant some time after Oswald's arrival, he immediately thought of his friend. What a prize it would be for Zurich! Zwingle's appearance was prepossessing. He was a handsome man, of graceful address, and pleasing manners. His eloquence had already given him celebrity.

ST. GOTHARD'S PASS.

while the lustre of his genius made him conspicuous among all the confederates. Myconius spoke of him to the provost of the chapter, Felix Frey, (who from the appearance and talents of Zwingle was already prepossessed in his favour;) to Utinger, an old man who was held in high respect; and to Canon Hoffman, a man of an upright open disposition, who, having long preached against foreign service, was favourably inclined to Ulrich. Other Zurichers had, on different occasions, heard Zwingle at Einsidlen, and had returned full of admiration. The election of preacher to the cathedral soon set all the inhabitants of Zurich in motion. Different parties were formed. Several laboured night and day for the election of the eloquent preacher of Our Lady of the Eremites. Myconius having informed his friend,—"Wednesday next," replied Zwingle, "I will come and dine at Zurich, and talk over matters." He accordingly arrived. A canon to whom he was paying a visit, said to him: "Could you come among us to preach the Word of God?"—"I could," replied he; "but will not come unless I am called." He then returned to his abbey.

This visit spread alarm in the camp of his enemies.

Several priests were urged to apply for the vacancy. A Swabian, named Laurent Fable, even preached as a candidate, and the rumour went that he was elected. "It is, then, quite true," said Zwingle, on learning it, "that a prophet has no honour in his own country, since a Swabian is preferred to a Swiss. I know what value to set on popular applause." Zwingle immediately after received a letter from the secretary of Cardinal Schinner, informing him that the election had not taken place. But the false news which he had at first received nettled the curate of Einsidlen. Knowing that a person so unworthy as this Fable aspired to the place, he was more desirous to obtain it for himself, and wrote about it to Myconius, who next day replied: "Fable will always continue a fable: my masters have learned that he is already the father of six boys, and possesses I know not how many benefices."

The enemies of Zwingle did not abandon their opposition. All, it is true, agreed in extolling his learning to the skies; but said some, "He is too fond of music;" others, "He loves the world and pleasure;" others again, "In early life he was too closely connected with giddy companions." There was even one individual who charged him with an instance of seduction. Zwingle was not without blemish. Though superior to the ecclesiastics of his time, he more than once, in the first years of his ministry, gave way to youthful propensities. It is difficult to estimate the influence of an impure atmosphere on those who live in it. There were in the papacy certain established irregularities, allowed and sanctioned as conformable to the laws of nature. A saying of Æneas Sylvius, afterwards pope under the name of Pius II., gives an idea of the sad state of public morals at this period. We give it in a note.¹ Disorder had become the rule, order the exception.

Oswald displayed the greatest activity in favour of his friend. He exerted all his powers in defending him, and happily succeeded. He went to burgomaster Roust, to Hoffman, Frey, and Utinger. He praised Zwingle for his probity, honesty, and purity, and confirmed the Zurichers in the favourable opinion which they had of the curate of Einsidlen. Little credit was given to the speeches of his adversaries. The most influential persons said that Zwingle should be preacher at Zurich. The canons said so also, but in a whisper. "Hope," wrote Oswald to him with a full heart, "for I hope." At the same time he told him of the accusations of his enemies. Although Zwingle was not yet become altogether a new man, he belonged to the class of those whose conscience is awakened, and who may fall into sin; but never without a struggle, or without remorse. It had often been his resolution to stand alone in the midst of the world, and maintain a life of holiness. But when he saw himself accused, he did not pretend to boast that he was without sin. Writing to Canon Utinger, he said: "Having nobody to go along with me in the resolutions which I had formed, several even of those about me being offended at them, alas! I fell, and like the dog of whom St. Peter speaks, (2 Pet. ii. 22.) returned to my vomit. Ah! God knows with what shame and anguish I have torn up these faults from the depths of my heart, and laid them before Almighty God, to whom, however, I would be less afraid to confess my misery than to mortal man." But while Zwingle confessed himself to be a sinner, he, at the same time, vindicated himself from the most offensive charges which were brought against him. He declared that he had ever abhorred the idea of invading the sanctity of married life, or seducing innocence,—vices at that time but too common. "For the truth of this," says he, "I appeal to all with whom I have lived."

The election took place on the 11th December, and out of the twenty-four votes which were given, Zwingle had seventeen. It was time that the Reformation should begin in Switzerland. The chosen instrument which Divine Providence had been preparing during three years in the retreat of Einsidlen, was ready, and must now be translated elsewhere. God, who had chosen the new university of Wittenberg, situated in the heart of Germany, and under the protection of the wisest of princes, to call Luther thither, made choice in Switzerland of the city of Zurich, regarded as the head of the confederation, there to station Zwingle, and to bring him into contact not only with one of the most intelligent, simple, resolute, and intrepid communities of Switzerland, but also with all the cantons which are grouped around this ancient and powerful state. The hand which had taken hold of a young shepherd of Sentis, and led him to the school of Wesen, now brought him forward, powerful in word and in deed, in the face of all, to regenerate his countrymen. Zurich was about to become a focus of light to Switzerland.

The day which announced the election of Zwingle was to Einsidlen a day of once of joy and grief. The circle which had been formed there was about to be broken up by the withdrawal of its most valuable member; and who could say whether superstition was not going again to take possession of this ancient place of pilgrimage? . . . The council of state in Schwitz conveyed the expression of his sentiments to Ulrich by designating him as "reverend, learned, most gracious master, and good friend." "At least do you yourself give us a successor worthy of you," said Geroldsek, in despair, to Zwingle.—"I have got for you," replied he, "a little lion, simple and wise; a man initiated in the mysteries of sacred science."—"Let me have him," immediately rejoined the administrator. It was Leo Juda, at once the gentle and intrepid friend with whom Zwingle had been so intimate at Bâle. Leo accepted the call which brought him near his dear Ulrich. Ulrich took farewell of his friends, quitted the solitude of Einsidlen, and arrived at that delightful spot where, smiling and instinct with life, rises the town of Zurich, surrounded by its amphitheatre of vine-clad hills, enamelled with meadows and orchards, crowned with forests, and overtopped by the lofty peaks of the Albis.

Zurich, the centre of the political interests of Switzerland, where the most influential persons in the nation frequently assembled, was the place best fitted to act upon the whole country, and shed the seeds of truth over all its cantons. Accordingly, the friends of letters and the Bible hailed the appointment of Zwingle with acclamation. At Paris, in particular, the Swiss students, who were there in great numbers, were enraptured with the news. But if Zwingle had the prospect of a great victory at Zurich, he had also the prospect of a severe contest. Glarean wrote him from Paris: "I foresee that your learning will stir up great enmity; but be of good courage, and you will, like Hercules, subdue monsters."

On the 27th December, 1518, Zwingle arrived at Zurich, and took up his quarters at the hotel of Einselden. He received a cordial and honourable welcome. The chapter immediately met to receive him, and invited him to take his seat in the midst of them. Felix Frey presided; the canons, friendly or hostile to Zwingle, sat indiscriminately around their provost. There was considerable excitement in the meeting; every one felt, perhaps without distinctly acknowledging it to himself, how serious the commencement of this ministry was likely to prove. Some apprehension being entertained of the innovating spirit of the young priest, it was agreed to set before him the most important duties of his office. "You will use your utmost endeavour," he was gravely told, "to secure payment of the revenues of the chapter, without neglecting the least of them. You will exhort the faithful both from the pulpit and in the confessional, to pay the first fruits and tithes, and to shew by their offerings that they love the Church. You will make it your business to increase the revenues which are derived from the sick, from sacrifices, and generally from every ecclesiastical act." The chapter added: "As to the administration of the sacraments, preaching, and personal presence amid the flock, these too are duties of the priest. However, in these different respects, and particularly in regard to preaching, you may supply your place by a vicar. You should administer the sacraments only to persons of distinction, and after being requested. You are expressly forbidden to do it to all persons indiscriminately."

Strange rule to be given to Zwingle! Money, money, still money! . . . Was it, then, for this that Christ established his ministry? Still prudence tempers his zeal; he knows that we cannot all at once deposit the seed in the ground, see the growth of the tree, and gather its fruit. Zwingle, therefore, without explaining his views on what was enjoined him, humbly expressed his gratitude for the honourable appointment which he had received, and stated what he calculated on being able to do. "The life of Jesus," said he, "has been too long hidden from the people. I will preach on the whole Gospel of St. Matthew, chapter by chapter, following the mind of the Holy Spirit, drawing only at the well-springs of Scripture, digging deep into it, and seeking the understanding of it by persevering fervent prayer. I will consecrate my ministry to the glory of God; the praise of His only Son; the real salvation of souls, and their instruction in the true faith." This new language made a deep impression on the chapter. Some expressed joy, but the majority openly disapproved. "This mode of preaching is an innovation," exclaimed they; "this innovation will soon lead to others, and where is it to stop?" Canon Hoffman, in particular, thought it his duty to prevent the fatal effects of a choice which he had himself patronized. "This exposition of Scripture," said he, "will be more hurtful than useful to the people."—"It is not a new method," replied Zwingle, "it is the ancient method. Recollect the homilies of St. Chrysostom on St. Matthew, and of St. Augustine on St. John. Besides, I will use moderation, and give none any reason to complain."

Thus Zwingle abandoned the exclusive use of fragments of the Gospel, as practised since the days of Charlemagne; re-establishing the Scripture in its ancient rights, he, from the commencement of his ministry, united the Reformation to the primitive ages of Christianity, and prepared a more profound study of the Word of God for ages to come. But he did more. The strong and independent position which he took up in the face of the Church shewed that the work in which he had engaged was new. The figure of the reformer stood out in bold relief to the public eye, and the Reformation advanced.

Hoffman, having failed in the chapter, addressed a written request to the provost, to prohibit Zwingle from shaking the popular belief. The provost sent for the new preacher, and spoke to him with great kindness. But no human power could close his lips. On the 31st December, he wrote to the council of Glaris, that he entirely resigned the cure of souls which had hitherto been reserved for him, and gave himself wholly to Zurich, and to the work which God was preparing for him in this town.

On Saturday, being new-year's-day, and also the birthday of Zwingle, who had completed his thirty-fifth year, he mounted the pulpit of the cathedral. A great crowd, eager to see a man who had already acquired so much celebrity, and to hear this new Gospel, of which every one began to speak, filled the church. "It is to Christ," said Zwingle, "that I wish to conduct you; to Christ, the true source of salvation. His Divine Word is the only nourishment which I would give to your heart and life." Then he announced that to-morrow, the first Sunday of the year, he would begin to expound the Gospel according to St. Matthew. Accordingly, the preacher, and a still larger audience than the day before, were at their posts. Zwingle opened the Gospel—the Gospel which had so long been a sealed book—and read the first page, going over the history of the patriarchs and prophets mentioned in the first chapter of St. Matthew, and expounding it in such a way that all were astounded and delighted, and exclaimed: "We never heard anything like this!"

He continued thus to expound St. Matthew, according to the original Greek. He shewed how the whole Bible found at once its exposition and its application in the very nature of man. Delivering the loftiest truths of the Gospel in simple language, his preaching reached all classes, the learned and the wise, as well as the ignorant and simple. He extolled the infinite mercies of God the Father, and implored all his hearers to put their confidence in Jesus Christ alone as the only Saviour. At the same time, he earnestly called them to repentance; forcibly attacked the errors which prevailed among the people; fearlessly rebuked luxury, intemperance, extravagance in dress, the oppression of the poor, idleness, foreign service, and foreign pensions. "In the pulpit," says one of his companions, "he spared no one, pope, emperor, kings, dukes, princes, lords, not even the confederates. All his energy, and all the joy of his heart were in God; accordingly he exhorted all the inhabitants of Zurich to put their confidence in Him only." "Never was man heard to speak with so much authority," says Oswald Myconius, who, with joy and high hopes, watched the labours of his friend.

The Gospel could not be preached in vain in Zurich. A continually increasing multitude of men of all classes, and more especially of the common people, flocked to hear him. Several Zurichers had ceased to attend on public worship. "I derive no benefit from the discourses of these priests," often exclaimed Füsslin, a poet, historian, and councillor of state; "they do not preach the things of salvation; for they do not comprehend them. I see nothing in them but covetousness and voluptuousness." Henry Rünschlin, treasurer of state, one who diligently read the Scriptures, was of the same opinion: "The priests," said he, met in thousands at the Council of Constance . . . to burn the best man among them." These distinguished men, led by curiosity, went to hear Zwingle's first sermon. Their countenances bespoke the emotion with which they followed the orator. "Glory to God!" said they, on coming out; "this is a preacher of the truth. He will be our Moses, to deliver us from Egyptian darkness." From this moment they became the reformer's intimate friends. "Powers of the world," said Füsslin, "cease to proscribe the doctrine of Christ! After Christ, the Son of God, was put to death, sinners were raised up. And now, should you destroy the preachers of truth, you will see their places supplied by glaziers, carpenters, potters, founders, shoemakers, and tailors, who will teach with power."

In Zurich, at the outset, there was only one shout of admiration; but when the first moment of enthusiasm was over, the adversary resumed courage. Worthy persons, alarmed at the idea of a Reformation, gradually drew off from Zwingle. The violence of the monks, which had been veiled for an instant, reappeared, and the college of canons resounded with complaints. Zwingle stood immovable. His friends, beholding his courage, felt in his presence as if a man of apostolic times had reappeared. Among his enemies, some scoffed and jeered; others uttered insulting menaces; but he endured all with Christian patience. "Whoso," he was wont to say, "would gain the wicked to Jesus Christ, must wink at many things,"—an admirable saying, which ought not to be lost sight of.

His character and general bearing towards all contributed, as much as his discourses, to win their hearts. He was at once a true Christian and a true republican. The equality of mankind was not with him a mere watchword; it was written on his heart, and manifested in his life. He had neither that pharisaical pride, nor that monastic gruffness, which are equally offensive to the simple and the wise of the world. Men were drawn towards him, and felt at ease when conversing with him. Strong and mighty in the pulpit, he was affable to all whom he met in the streets, or in the public squares. At the places where the merchants or incorporations met, he was often seen among the citizens expounding the leading points of Christian doctrine, or conversing familiarly with them. He gave the same cordial reception to peasant and patrician.

"He invited country folks to dine with him," says one of his bitterest enemies, "walked with them, spoke to them of God, made the devil enter into their hearts, and his writings into their pockets. He even went so far, that the leading persons in Zurich visited those peasants, entertained them, and walked over the town with them, shewing them all sorts of attention."

He continued to cultivate music "with moderation," says Bullinger: nevertheless the enemies of the Gospel took advantage of it, and called him "the evangelical flute and lute player." Faber, having one day reproached him with his fondness for music, Zwingle, with noble candour, replied: "My dear Faber, you know not what music is. I have, it is true, learned to play on the lute, the violin, and other instruments, and am able by these means to pacify little children; but you, of course, are too holy for music. Do you not know that David was a skillful player on the harp, and in this way drove the evil spirit out of Saul? . . . Ah! if you knew the sound of the heavenly lute, the evil spirit of ambition and avarice by which you are possessed would come out of you also." Perhaps this was Zwingle's foible, though it was in a spirit of cheerfulness and Christian liberty that he cultivated this art, which religion has always associated with her sublimest flights. He set some of his Christian poems to music, and did not scruple sometimes to amuse the youngest of his flock with his lute. He shewed the same good nature to the poor. "He ate and drank," says one of his contemporaries, "with all who invited him.—he despised no one; he was most compassionate to the poor; always firm and always joyful in bad as in good fortune. No evil made him afraid; his words were at all times full of energy, and his heart full of consolation." Thus Zwingle increased in popularity—after the example of his Master, seated alternately at the table of the common people, and the banquet of the great, but still constantly intent on the work to which God had called him.

At the same time he was an indefatigable student. In the morning, till ten, he read, wrote, and translated: Hebrew, in particular, engaged his attention. After dinner he attended to those who had anything to tell him, or any advice to ask of him: took a walk with his friends, and visited his hearers. At two he resumed his studies. He took a short walk after supper, and afterwards wrote letters which often occupied him till midnight. He always stood when he studied, and did not allow himself to be interrupted unless on important business.

But the labours of a single individual were not sufficient. A person, named Lucian, one day came to him with the writings of the German reformer. He had been sent by Rhenan, a learned man, then resident at Bale, and indefatigable in circulating the reformer's writings throughout Switzerland. Rhenan had become aware that the hawking of books was an important means of diffusing evangelical doctrine. Lucian had travelled almost over the whole of Switzerland, and knew everybody. "See," said Rhenan to Zwingle, "whether this Lucian has the necessary prudence and ability; if he has, let him go from town to town, burgh to burgh, village to village, and even from burgh to house, among the Swiss, with Luther's writings, especially his exposition on the Lord's Prayer, written for the laity. The more he is known the more purchasers will he find. But care must be taken not to let him hawk other books. If he has none but Luther's, his sale of them will be the greater." Thus the humble roof of many a Swiss family was penetrated with some rays of light. There was one other book, however, which Zwingle should have caused to be hawked with those of Luther—the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

CHAPTER VII.

Indulgences—Samson at Berne—Samson at Baden—The Dean of Brengarten—Young Henry Bullinger—Samson and the Dean—Internal Struggles of Zwingle—Zwingle against Indulgences—Samson Dismissed.

ZWINGLE had not long to wait for an opportunity of displaying his zeal in a new vocation. Samson, the famous indulgence merchant, was slowly approaching Zurich. This miserable trafficker had come from Schwitz to Zug, 20th September, 1518, and had remained there three days. An immense crowd had gathered round him. The poorest were the most eager, so that they prevented the rich from coming forward. This did not suit the monk; accordingly, one of his attendants began to bawl out to the populace: "Good people, do not throng so! Let those come who have money. We will afterwards try to content those who have none." From Zug, Samson and his band repaired to Lucerne; from Lucerne to Unterwalden; then crossing the fertile Alps with their rich valleys, passing beneath the eternal ice of Oberland, and in these spots, the grandest in Switzerland, exposing their Roman merchandise, they arrived near Berne. The monk was at first prohibited to enter the town, but succeeded at last in obtaining an introduction by means of persons whom he had in his pay.

UNTERWALDEN.

Exhibiting his wares in the church of Saint Vincent, he began to cry louder than ever. "Here," said he to the rich, "are indulgences on parchment for a crown!" "There," said he to the poor, "are indulgences on ordinary paper for two farthings!" One day, a celebrated knight, James de Stein, came up prancing on a dapple-grey horse; the monk greatly admired the horse. "Give me," says the knight, "an indulgence for myself, for my troop of five hundred strong, for all my vassals of Belp, and all my ancestors; I will give you my dapple-grey horse in exchange." It was a high price for the horse, but the courser pleased the Franciscan, and the bargain was struck. The horse went to the monk's stable; and all these souls were declared for ever exempted from hell. Another day, he gave a burgher, for thirteen florins, an indulgence, in virtue of which his confessor was authorized to absolve him from any species of perjury. So much was Samson in repute, that Councillor May, an enlightened old man, having said something against him, was obliged to go down on his knees and ask pardon of the arrogant monk.

This was the monk's last day, and a loud ringing of bells announced his immediate departure from Berne. Samson was in the church standing on the steps of the high altar. Canon Henry Lupulus, formerly Zwingle's master, was acting as his interpreter. "When the wolf and the fox rendezvous together in the field," said Canon Anselm, turning to the schulthess of Walleville, "the best thing for you, worthy sir, is to put your sheep and geese in safety." But the monk cared little for these sarcasms, which, besides, did not reach his ear. "Kneel," said he to the superstitious crowd; "repeat three Paters, three Ave Marias, and your souls will forthwith be as pure as at the moment of baptism." Then all the people fell upon their knees. Samson, wishing even to outdo himself, exclaimed: "I deliver from the torments of purgatory and hell all the spirits of the departed Bernese, whatever may have been the manner and place of their death." These jugglers, like those at fairs, kept their finest feat for the last.

Samson set out with a heavy purse towards Zurich, crossing Argovia and Baden. The farther on he got, the monk, whose appearance, on passing the Alps, was so shabby, proceeded with more pride and splendour. The Bishop of Constance, irritated that Samson had not employed him to legalize his bulls, had forbidden all the curates of his diocese to open their churches to him. At Baden, nevertheless, the curate durst not long oppose his traffic. This redoubled the monk's effrontery. Making the round of the burying-ground at the head of a procession, he seemed to fix his eyes on some object in the air, while his acolytes sung the hymn for the dead, and, pretending to see souls flying from the burying-ground to heaven, he exclaimed: "Ecce volant!—See how they fly!" One day an inhabitant of the place getting up into the church steeple, a great number of feathers were soon seen in the air falling down on the astonished procession: "See how they fly!" exclaimed the wag of Baden, shaking a feather cushion from the steeple. Many began to laugh. Samson fell into a rage, and could not be appeased till he learned that the individual was subject to fits of derangement. He left Baden in a huff.

Continuing his journey, he arrived, towards the end of February, 1519, at Bremgarten, at the solicitation of the schulthess and second curate, who had seen him at Baden. No individual in that district had a higher reputation than Dean Bullinger of Bremgarten. Though far from enlightened as to the errors of the Church and the Word of God, being open, zealous, eloquent, kind to the poor, and ready to do a service to the humblest, he was loved by everybody. He had, in his youth, formed a connection with the daughter of a councillor of the place. This was the usual expedient of such of the priests as were unwilling to live in general licentiousness. Anna had borne him five sons, but this had in no way lessened the respect which the dean enjoyed. There was not in Switzerland a more hospitable house than his. A great lover of the chase, he was seen surrounded with ten or twelve dogs, and accompanied by the barons of Hallwyll, the abbot Mury, and the gentry of Zurich, scouring the fields and forests around. He kept open table, and none of his guests was more jovial than himself. When the deputies to the diet were on their way to Baden, on passing through Bremgarten, they failed not to take their seats at the dean's table. "Bullinger," said they, "keeps court like the most powerful baron."

In this house strangers remarked a child of an intelligent countenance. Henry, one of the dean's sons, from his earliest years had many narrow escapes. Having been seized with the plague, preparations were making for his funeral when he shewed some signs of life, and was restored to his delighted parents. On another occasion, a wandering beggar, having won him by caresses, was carrying him off from his family, when some persons in passing recognized and rescued him. At three years of age he could repeat the Lord's prayer and the Apostles' creed. One day, having slipped into the church, he got into his father's pulpit, stood up gravely, and at the full stretch of his voice, cried out: "I believe in God the Father," and so on. At twelve he was sent to the Latin school of Emmerich, his heart overwhelmed with fear; for those times were dangerous for a young boy without experience. When the students of an university thought its discipline too severe, they not unfrequently left it in troops, carrying the children with them, and encamped in the woods, from which they sent the youngest of their number to beg; or sometimes, with arms in their hands, they rushed forth on the passing traveller, robbed him, and then consumed their booty in debauchery. Henry was happily kept from evil in this distant abode. Like Luther, he gained his livelihood by singing before the houses; for his father wished to teach him to live by his own shifts. He was sixteen when he opened a New Testament. "I found in it," says he, "everything necessary for man's salvation, and thenceforth I laid it down as a principle, to follow the Holy Scriptures alone, and reject all human additions. I believe neither the Fathers nor myself, but explain Scripture by Scripture, without adding anything or taking anything away." God was thus preparing this young man, who was one day to succeed Zwingle. He is the author of the manuscript journal which we often quote.

About this time Samson arrived at Bremgarten with all his train. The bold dean, undismayed by this petty Italian army, prohibited the monk from vending his wares in his neighbourhood. The schulthess, town-clerk, and second pastor, Samson's friends, had met in a room of the inn at which he had alighted, and were standing quite disconcerted around the impatient monk. The dean arrived. "Here are the papal bulls," said the monk to him; "open your church."

The Dean.—"I will not allow the purses of my parishioners to be emptied by means of letters not authenticated, for the bishop has not legalized them."

The Monk (in a solemn tone).—"The pope is above the bishop. I enjoy you not to deprive your flock of this distinguished grace."

The Dean.—"Should it cost me my life, I wont open my church."

The Monk (with indignation).—"Rebellious priest! in the name of our most holy lord the pope, I pronounce against you the greater excommunication, and will not absolve you till you ransom your unheard-of audacity at the price of three hundred ducats." . . .

The Dean (turning on his heel and retiring).—"I will know how to answer before my lawful judges; as for you and your excommunication, I have nothing to do with them."

The Monk (transported with rage).—"Impudent brute! I am on my way to Zurich, and will there lay my complaint before the deputies of the confederation."

The Dean.—"I can appear there as well as you, and this instant I set out."

While these things were taking place at Bremgarten, Zwingle, who saw the enemy gradually approaching, kept preaching vigorously against indulgences. Vicar Faber of Constance encouraged him, promising him the bishop's support. "I know," said Samson, while proceeding towards Zurich, "that Zwingle will attack me; but I will stop his mouth." Zwingle was, in truth, too much alive to the value of pardon by Christ, not to attack the paper indulgences of these men. Often, like Luther, he trembled because of sin; but in the Saviour found deliverance from his fears. This modest but brave man was advancing in the knowledge of God. "When Satan frightens me," said he, "by crying to me: 'You do not this, and you do not that, and yet God commands them!'—immediately the soft voice of the Gospel consoles me, saying: 'What thou canst not do (and assuredly thou canst do nothing) Christ does for thee.' Yes," continues the pious evangelist, "when my heart is agonized because of my powerlessness, and the feebleness of my flesh, my spirit revives at the sound of this glad news: Christ is thy innocence! Christ is thy righteousness! Christ is thy salvation! Thou art nothing—thou canst do nothing! Christ is the Alpha and the Omega! Christ is all, and can do all! All created things will forsake and deceive thee; but Christ, the holy and righteous One, will receive and justify thee. . . . Yes," exclaims Zwingle, "He is our rightousness, and the rightousness of all who shall ever appear as righteous before the judgment-seat of God!" . . .

Indulgences could not stand a moment when confronted with such truths; and hence Zwingle never hesitated to attack them. "No man," said he, "is able to forgive sins. Christ alone, very God and very man, is able to do it. Go, buy indulgences; . . . but rest assured you are not at all forgiven. Those who vend forgiveness of sins for money are the companions of Simon Magus, the friends of Balaam, and the ambassadors of Satan."

Dean Bullinger, still warm from his conference with the monk, arrived at Zurich before him. He came to complain to the diet against this shameless dealer and his traffic. Envoys from the bishop had arrived for the same purpose. They made common cause, and promised to support each other. The spirit which animated Zwingle breathed upon this town, and the council of state resolved to oppose the monk's entry into Zurich.

Samson had arrived in the suburbs, and alighted at an inn. One foot was already on the stirrup preparatory to his entry, when deputies from the council arrived, and while making the customary offer of wine to him as a papal envoy, intimated to him that he might dispense with appearing in Zurich. "I have something to communicate to the diet in the name of his holiness," replied the monk. It was a trick. However, it was resolved to admit him; but as he spoke only of his bulls, he was dismissed, after being compelled to retract the excommunication which he had pronounced against the Dean of Bremgarten. He went off in a rage, and the pope, shortly after, recalled him to Italy. A car drawn by three horses, and loaded with the money of which his lies had robbed the poor, preceded him on the steep tracts of St. Gothard, which, eight months before, he had crossed in poverty, without style, merely the bearer of a few papers.

On this occasion the Helvetic showed more firmness than the Germanic diet. The reason was, because no cardinals and bishops sat in it. Hence the pope, deprived of these supports, dealt more gently with Switzerland than Germany. In other respects, the affair of indulgences, which played so important a part in the Reformation of Germany, is only an episode in that of Switzerland.

CHAPTER VIII.

The Labours of Zwingle—The Baths of Pfeffers—God's Time—The Great Death—Zwingle seized with the Plague—His Enemies—His Friends—Convalescence—General Joy—Effect of the Plague—Myconius at Lucerne—Oswald encourages Zwingle—Zwingle at Bale—Cajato called to Mentz—Hedio at Bale—An Unnatural Son—Preparation for Battle.

ZWINGLE did not spare himself. His many labours called for some relaxation, and he was ordered to the baths of Pfeffers. "Ah!" said Herus, one of the pupils who lodged with him, and who thus expressed the feeling of all who knew Zwingle, "had I a hundred tongues, a hundred mouths, a brazen throat, as Virgil expresses it; or rather, had I the eloquence of Cicero, how could I express all I owe you, and all that I feel at this separation?" Zwingle, however, set out and reached Pfeffers through the astonishing gorge formed by the impetuous torrent of the Jamina. He descended into that infernal abyss, as the hermit David called it, and arrived at the baths, which are perpetually agitated by the dashing of the torrent, and bedewed by the spray of its foaming water. Where Zwingle lodged it was so dark that candles were burnt at mid-day. He was even assured by the inmates that frightful phantoms sometimes appeared in the darkness.

Even here Zwingle found opportunity to serve his Master. His affability won the heart of several of the patients, among others a celebrated poet, Philip Ingentinus, professor at Friburg, in Brigau, who thenceforward became a zealous supporter of the Reformation.

God watched over His own work, and was pleased to hasten it. Zwingle's defect lay in his strength. Strong in body, strong in character, strong in talents, he was to see all these varieties of strength broken, that he might thereby become such an instrument as God loves to employ. He stood in need of a baptism, that of adversity, infirmity, feebleness, and pain. Such a baptism Luther had received at that period of agony when the cell and long passages of the convent of Erfurt resounded with his cries. Zwingle was to receive it by being brought into contact with sickness and death. The heroes of this world—the Charles Twelfth and Napoleons—have a moment which is decisive of their career and their glory, and it is when they all at once become conscious of their strength. There is an analogous moment in the life of God's heroes, but it is in a contrary direction; it is when they recognise their impotence and nothingness; thenceforth they receive strength from on high. Such a work as that of which Zwingle was to be the instrument is never accomplished by man's natural strength; it would immediately wither away like a tree transplanted after its full growth, and when in full leaf. A plant must be feeble in order to take root, and a grain of corn must die in the ground before it can yield a full return. God led Zwingle, and with him the work of which he was the stay, to the gates of the grave. It is from among bones and darkness, and the dust of the dead, that God is pleased to take the instruments, by means of which He illumines, regenerates, and revives the earth.

Zwingle was hidden among the immense rocks which hem in the furious torrent of the Jamma, when he unexpectedly learned that the plague, or as it was termed, "the great death," was at Zurich. This dreadful scourge broke out in August, on St. Lawrence day, lasted till Candlemas, and carried off two thousand five hundred persons. The young people who lodged with Zwingle had immediately left, conformably to directions which he had given. His house was empty; but it was to him the very moment to return. He hurriedly quitted Pfeffers, and reappearing in the bosom of his flock, now decimated by the plague, he immediately sent to Wildhaus for his young brother, Andrew, who wished to attend him. From that moment he devoted himself entirely to the victims of this dreadful scourge. Every day he preached Christ and His consolations to the sick. His friends, delighted to see him safe and sound in the midst of so many fatal darts, still felt a secret alarm. Conrad Brunner, who himself died of the plague a few months after, writing him from Bale, said: "Do good, but at the same time remember to take care of your life." It was too late: Zwingle was seized with the plague. The great preacher of Switzerland was stretched on a bed from which, perhaps, he was never again to rise. He communed with himself, and turned his eye heavenward. He knew that Christ had given him a sure inheritance, and disclosing the feelings of his heart in a hymn remarkable for unction and simplicity, of which, not being able to give the antique and expressive phraseology, we have endeavoured to preserve the rhythm and literal meaning, he exclaimed:—

My door has opened . . .
 Death appears.
 My God! my strength!
 Dispel all fears.
 O Jesus! raise
 Thy pierced arm,
 And break the sword
 That caused alarm.

But if my soul,
 In life's mid-day,
 Thy voice recalls,
 Then I obey.

Ah! let me die,
 For I am thine;
 Thy anxious wait
 Such faith as mine.

Meanwhile the disease gains ground, and this man, the hope of the Church and of Switzerland, is beheld by his despairing friends as about to become the prey of the tomb. His senses and strength forsake him. His heart becomes alarmed, but he is still able to turn towards God, and exclaims:—

My ills increase;
 Hasten to console;
 Terrors overwhelm
 My heart and soul.

Death is at hand,
 My senses fall,
 My voice is choked,
 Now, Christ! prevail.

Lo! Satan strains
 To snatch his prey;
 I feel his hand;
 Must I give way?

He harms me not,
 I fear no loss,
 For here I lie
 Before thy cross.

Canon Hoffman, sincere in his own belief, could not bear the idea of allowing Zwingle to die in the errors which he had preached. Accordingly he waited on the provost of the chapter, and said to him: "Think of the danger of his soul. Does he not give the name of fantastical innovators to all the doctors who have appeared for the last three hundred and eighty years and more—to Alexander Hales, St. Bonaventura, Albert the Great, Thomas Aquinas, and all the canonists? Does he not maintain that their doctrines are the dreams which they dreamed in their cowls within the walls of their cloisters? Better had it been for the town of Zurich that Zwingle had, for a series of years, destroyed our vintage and harvest! There he lies at the brink of death! Do, I beseech you, save his poor soul!" It would seem that the provost was more enlightened than the canon, and deemed it unnecessary to convert Zwingle to St. Bonaventura and Albert the Great. He was left at peace.

The whole town was in mourning. All the faithful cried to God night and day, beseeching Him to restore their faithful pastor. Terror had passed from Zurich to the mountains of the Toekenburg, where also the plague had appeared. Seven or eight persons had perished in the village, among them a servant of Nicolas, a brother of Zwingle. No letter was received from the reformer, and his young brother Andrew wrote: "Tell me, my dear brother, in what state you are. The abbot and all our brothers desire to be remembered." As the parents of Zwingle are not mentioned, it would seem that they were now dead.

The news of Zwingle's illness, and even a rumour of his death, spread in Switzerland and Germany.

"Alas!" exclaimed Hedio in tears, "the safety of the country, the Gospel trumpet, the magnanimous herald of truth, is smitten with death in the flower of his life, and, so to speak, in the spring-tide of his days!" When the news reached Bale the whole town was filled with lamentation and mourning.

The spark of life which remained in Zwingle was, however, rekindled. Though his body was still feeble, his soul was impressed with the unaltered conviction, that God had called him to replace the torch of His Word on the candlestick of the Church. The plague had abandoned its victim, and Zwingle exclaims with emotion —

My God: my Father
Healed by thee,
On earth again
I bend my knee.

Now sin no more
Shall mark my days
My mouth, henceforth,
Shall sing thy praise.

The uncertain hour,
Come when it may,
Perchance may bring
Still worse dismay.

But, let it come,
With joy I'll rise,
And bear my yoke
Straight to the skies.

Zwingle was no sooner able to hold the pen, (this was in the beginning of November,) than he wrote to his family. This gave inexpressible delight to them all, especially to his young brother, Andrew, who himself died of the plague the following year, and at whose death Ulrich—to use his own words—wept and cried like a woman. At Bale, Conrad Brunner, a friend of Zwingle, and Bruno Amerbach, a famous printer, both young men, were cut off after three days' illness. The rumour having spread in this town that Zwingle also had fallen, the whole university was in mourning. "He whom God loves is perfected in the flower of his life," said they. How great was there joy when Collinus, a student of Lucerne, and afterwards a merchant in Zurich, brought word that Zwingle had escaped the jaws of death! John Faber, vicar to the Bishop of Constance, long the friend, and afterwards the most violent adversary of Zwingle, wrote to him: "Oh my dear Ulrich, how delighted I am to learn that you have escaped the jaws of cruel death! When you are in danger the Christian commonwealth is threatened. The design of the Lord in these trials is to urge you forward in the pursuit of eternal life."

This was, indeed, the design, and it was accomplished, though in a different way from what Faber anticipated. The plague of 1519, which made such fearful ravages in the north of Switzerland, was, in the hand of God, a powerful means of converting a great number of persons. But on none had it a greater influence than on Zwingle. Hitherto he had been too much disposed to regard the Gospel as mere doctrine; but now it became a great reality. He returned from the gates of the grave with a new heart. His zeal was more active, his life more holy, his word more free, Christian, and powerful. This was the period of Zwingle's complete emancipation. He from this time devoted himself to God. The new life thus given to the reformer was communicated at the same time to the Swiss Reformation. The Divine rod, the great death, in passing over all their mountains, and descending into all their valleys, added to the sacredness of the movement which was then taking place. The Reformation being plunged, like Zwingle, into the waters of affliction and of grace, came forth purer and more animated. In regard to the regeneration of Switzerland, the Gospel sun was now at its height.

Zwingle, who still strongly felt the want of new strength, received it in intercourse with his friends. His closest intimacy was with Myconius. They walked hand in hand, like Luther and Melancthon. Oswald was happy at Zurich. It is true, his position was cramped; but everything was softened by the virtues of his modest spouse. It was of her that Glarean said: "Were I to meet a young girl resembling her, I would prefer her to the daughter of a king." But a faithful voice was often heard disturbing the sweet friendship of Zwingle and Myconius. It was that of Canon Xyloctet, who, calling to Oswald from Lucerne, summoned him to return to his country. "Lucerne," said he to him, "not Zurich, is your country. You say that the Zurichers are your friends: granted; but do you know what the evening star will bring you? Serve your country. This I advise, I implore, and, if I am able, command." Xyloctet, not confining himself to words, procured the appointment of Myconius to the college school of Lucerne. After this Oswald no longer hesitated. He saw the finger of God in the appointment, and determined to make the sacrifice, how great soever it might be. Who could say whether he might not be an instrument, in the hand of the Lord, to diffuse the doctrine of peace in warlike Lucerne? But how painful the separation between Zwingle and Myconius! They parted in tears. Ulrich shortly after wrote to Oswald: "Your departure has been as serious a loss to the cause which I defend, as that which is sustained by an army in battle array when one of its wings is destroyed. Ah! I now am aware of all that my Myconius was able to do, and how often, without my knowing it, he maintained the cause of Christ."

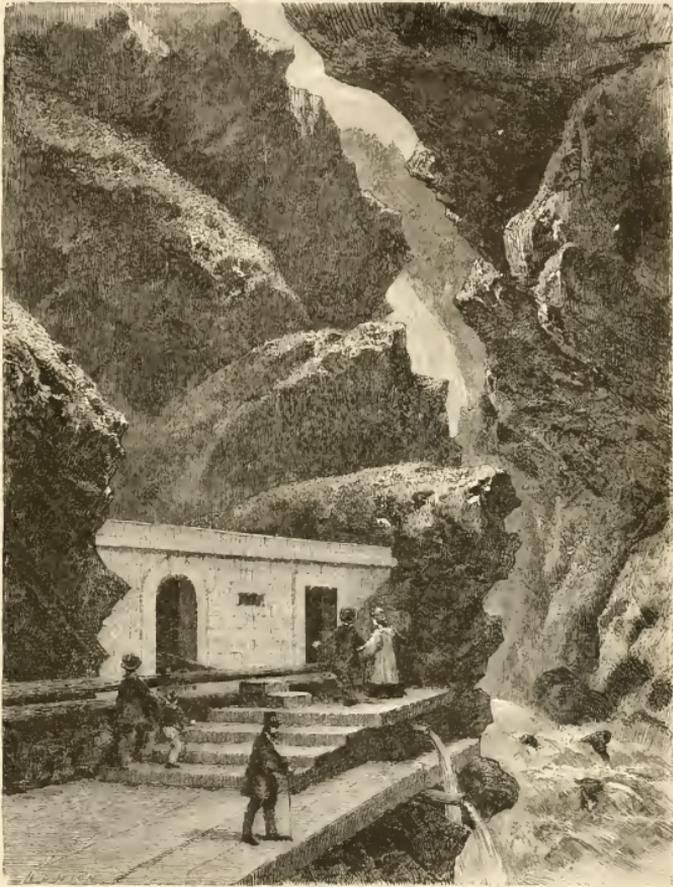

Zwingle felt the loss of his friend the more, because the plague had left him in a state of great feebleness. Writing on the 30th November, 1519, he says: "It has weakened my memory and wasted my intellect." When scarcely convalescent, he had resumed all his labours. "But," said he, "in preaching, I often lose the thread of my discourse. I feel languid in all my members, and somewhat as if I were dead." Moreover, Zwingle, by his opposition to indulgences, had excited the wrath of their partisans. Oswald strengthened his friend by letters which he wrote him from Lucerne. And did he not also receive pledges of assistance from the Lord, in the protection which He gave to the Saxon champion who was gaining such important victories over Rome? "What think you," said Myconius to Zwingle, "of the cause of Luther? For my part, I have no fear either for the Gospel or for him. If God does not protect His truth, who will protect it? All that I ask of the Lord is, not to withdraw His aid from those who hold nothing dearer than His Gospel. Continue as you have begun, and an abundant recompense awaits you in heaven."

The visit of an old friend helped to console Zwingle for the loss of Myconius. Bunzli, who had been his teacher at Bâle, and had succeeded the Dean of Wesen, the reformer's uncle, arrived at Zurich in the first week of the year 1520; and Zwingle and he, thereafter, resolved to set out together to Bâle to see their common friends. This visit of Zwingle bore fruit. "Oh, my dear Zwingle!" wrote John Glotter to him at a later period, "never will I forget you. The thing which binds me to you is, the goodness with which, during your stay at Bâle, you came to see me—me, a petty schoolmaster, living in obscurity, without learning or merit, and of humble station! What wins me is the elegance of your manners, and that indescribable meekness with which you subdue all hearts, even stones, if I may so speak." But Zwingle's visit was still more useful to his old friends. Capito, Hedio, and others, were electrified by the power of his eloquence. The former commencing in Bâle the work which Zwingle was doing at Zurich, began to expound the Gospel of St. Matthew before an auditory which continued to increase. The doctrine of Christ penetrated and inflamed all hearts. The people received it joyfully, and with acclamation hailed the revival of Christianity. It was the aurora of the Reformation. Accordingly a conspiracy of monks and priests was soon formed against Capito. It was at this time that Albert, the young cardinal-archbishop of Mentz, who felt desirous of attaching a man of so much learning to his person, called him to his court. Capito, seeing the difficulties which were thrown in his way, accepted the invitation. The people were moved, and, turning with indignation against the priests, raised a tumult in the town. Hedio was proposed as his successor; but some objected to his youth, while others said: "He is his pupil." "Truth bites," said Hedio: "it is not advantageous to offend too delicate ears by telling it.

BATHS OF PFEFFERS

Not matter, nothing will turn me from the straight path." The monks redoubled their efforts. "Believe not those," exclaimed they from the pulpit, "who say that the sum of Christian doctrine is found in the Gospel, and in St. Paul. Scetus has done more for Christianity than St. Paul himself. All the learning that has ever been spoken or printed, has been stolen from Scetus. All that has been done since, by men eager for fame, has been to throw in some Greek and Hebrew terms, which have only darkened the matter."

The tumult increased; and there was reason to fear that, on Capito's departure, it would become still more serious. "I will be almost alone," thought Hedio; "poor I, to struggle with these formidable monsters." Accordingly he invoked the assistance of God, and wrote to Zwingle. "Inflame my courage by writing often. Learning and Christianity are now placed between the hammer and the anvil. Luther has just been condemned by the universities of Louvain and Cologne. If ever the Church was in imminent danger, it is at this hour."

Capito left Bâle for Mentz 28th April, and Hedio succeeded him. Not content with the public assemblies in the church, at which he continued his exposition of St. Matthew, he proposed, in the month of June, as he wrote Luther, to have private meetings in his own house, to give more thorough evangelical instruction to those who might feel the want of it. This powerful method of communicating the truth, and exciting in the faithful an interest and zeal in Divine things, could not fail then, as it never does, to awaken opposition in the men of the world, and in domineering priests, both of whom, though from different motives, are equally desirous that God should be worshipped only within the precincts of a particular building. But Hedio was invincible.

At the same period when he formed this good resolution at Bâle, there arrived at Zurich one of those characters who often emerge, like impure froth, from the vortex of revolutions.

Senator Grebel, a man of great influence in Zurich, had a son named Conrad, a youth of remarkable talents, and a relentless enemy of ignorance and superstition, which he attacked with cutting satire. He was boisterous, violent, sarcastic, and bitter in his expression, without natural affection, given to debauchery, always talking loudly of his own innocence, while he could see nothing but what was wrong in others. We speak of him here because he is afterwards to play a melancholy part. At this period Vadian married a sister of Conrad; and Conrad, who was studying at Paris, where his misconduct had deprived him of the use of his limbs, desiring to be present at the marriage, appeared suddenly about the beginning of June amidst his family. The poor father received the prodigal son with a gentle smile, his fond mother with tears. The tenderness of his parents made no change on his unnatural heart. His kind and unhappy mother having, some time after, been brought to the gates of death, Conrad wrote his brother-in-law, Vadian: "My mother is recovered; she again rules the house, sleeps, awakes, grumbles, breakfasts, scolds, dines, makes a racket, sups, and is perpetually a burden to us. She runs, cooks, re-cooks, sweeps the house, toils, kills herself with fatigue, and will shortly bring on a relapse."

Such was the man who, at a later period, pretended to lord it over Zwingle, and who took the lead among fanatical Anabaptists. Divine Providence, perhaps, allowed such characters to appear at the period of the Reformation, that their disorders might the better bring out the wise, Christian, and orderly spirit of the reformers.

Everything announced that the battle between the Gospel and the papacy was about to commence. "Let us stir up the temporizers," wrote Hedio to Zurich; "the peace is broken, let us arm our hearts,—the enemies we shall have to combat are most fierce." Myconius wrote in the same strain to Ulrich, who, however, answered their warlike appeals with admirable meekness. "I should like," said he, "to gain these obstinate men by kindness and good offices, rather than overcome them by violence and disputation. That they call our doctrine (which, however, is not ours) a doctrine of the devil, is nothing more than natural. It proves to me that we are indeed the ambassadors of Christ. The devils cannot be silent in His presence."

The Two Reformers—The Fall of Man—Expiation of the God-Man—No Merit in Works—Objections Refuted—Power of Love to Christ—Election—Christ alone Master—Effects of this Preaching—Despondency and Courage—First Act of the Magistrate—Church and State—Attacks—Galster.

THOUGH desirous to follow the path of meekness, Zwingle was not idle. Since his illness his preaching had become more profound and enlivening. More than two thousand persons in Zurich had received the Word of God into their heart, made profession of the evangelical doctrine, and were themselves able to announce it.

Zwingle's faith was the same as Luther's, but more the result of reasoning. Luther advances with a bound; Zwingle owes more to clearness of perception. Luther's writings are pervaded with a thorough personal conviction of the benefits which the cross of Christ confers upon himself; and this conviction, glowing with heat and life, is the soul of all he says. The same thing, doubtless, exists in Zwingle, but in an inferior degree. He had looked more to the Christian system as a whole, and admired it particularly for its beauty, for the light which it sheds into the human mind, and the eternal life which it brings to the world. The one is more the man of heart, the other more the man of intellect; and hence it is that those who do not experimentally know the faith which animated these two great disciples of the Lord, fall into the grossest error, making the one a mystic and the other a rationalist. The one is more pathetic, perhaps, in the exposition of his faith, and the other more philosophical; but both believe the same truths. They do not, however, look at all secondary questions from the same point of view; but that faith which is one,—that faith which quickens and justifies its possessor,—that faith which no confession, no article of doctrine can express,—is in the one as in the other. The doctrine of Zwingle has often been so much misrepresented, that it seems proper here to give an account of what he preached at this time to the increasing crowds who flocked to the cathedral of Zurich.

The fall of Adam Zwingle regarded as the key to man's history. "Before the fall," said he one day, "man had been created with a free will, so that he was able, if he chose, to keep the law; his nature was pure, being as yet untainted by the malady of sin; his life was in his own hand. But wishing to be equal to God, he died, . . . and not he only, but every one of his descendants. All men being dead in Adam, none can be recalled to life until the Spirit, who is God himself, raise them from death."

The people of Zurich who listened eagerly to this powerful orator, were saddened when he set before them the sinful state into which human nature has fallen; but soon after heard words of joy, and learned to know the remedy which is able to recall man to life. "Christ, very man and very God," said the eloquent voice of this shepherd,—son of the Tockenburgh,— "has purchased for us a redemption which will never terminate. The eternal God died for us. His passion, then, is eternal,—it brings salvation for ever and ever,—it appeases Divine justice for ever in favour of all those who lean upon this sacrifice with firm and immovable faith." "Wherever sin exists," exclaimed the reformer, "death must necessarily supervene. Christ had no sin, there was no guile in His mouth, and yet He died! Ah! it was because He died in our stead. He was pleased to die in order to restore us to life; and as He had no sins of His own, the Father, who is full of mercy, laid the burden of our sins upon Him." The Christian orator continued: "Since the will of man rebelled against the supreme God, it was necessary—if eternal order was to be re-established, and man saved—that the human will should be made subject in Christ to the Divine will." He often repeated, that it was for the faithful people of God that the expiatory death of Jesus Christ had been endured.

Those in the city of Zurich who were eager for salvation found rest on hearing these good news. But old errors still remained, and these it was necessary to destroy. Setting out from this great truth of a salvation which is the gift of God, Zwingli forcibly discoursed against the pretended merit of human works. "Since eternal salvation," said he, "proceeds solely from the merits and death of Jesus Christ, the merit of our works is nothing better than folly, not to say rash impiety. Could we have been saved by our works, it had not been necessary for Jesus Christ to die. All who have ever come to God, came to Him by the death of Jesus Christ."

Zwingli perceived the objections which some of his hearers felt against these doctrines. Some of them called upon him and stated them. He mounted the pulpit and said: "People, more curious, perhaps, than pious, object that this doctrine makes men giddy and dissolute. But of what consequence are the objections or fears which human curiosity may suggest? Whoever believes in Jesus Christ is certain that everything which comes from God is necessarily good. If, then, the Gospel is of God, it is good. And what other power would be capable of implanting among men innocence, truth, and love? O God! most compassionate, most just, Father of mercies!" exclaimed he in the overflowing of his piety, "with what love hast thou embraced us—us thy enemies! With what great and certain hopes hast thou inspired us—us who should have known nothing but despair; and to what glory hast thou in thy Son called our littleness and nothingness! Thy purpose in this ineffable love is to constrain us to yield thee love for love!"

Then, dwelling on this idea, he shewed that love to the Redeemer is a more powerful law than the commandments. "The Christian," said he, "delivered from the law depends entirely on Christ. Christ is his reason, his counsel, his righteousness, and whole salvation. Christ lives in him and acts in him. Christ alone guides him, and he needs no other guide." And, making use of a comparison adapted to his hearers, he added: "If a government prohibits its citizens, under pain of death, from receiving pensions and presents at the hands of princes, how gentle and easy this law is to those who, from love to their country and to liberty, would, of their own accord, refrain from so culpable a proceeding; but, on the contrary, how tormenting and oppressive it feels to those who think only of their own interest! Thus the righteous man lives joyful in the love of righteousness, whereas the unrighteous walks groaning under the heavy weight of the law which oppresses him."

In the cathedral of Zurich was a considerable number of veteran soldiers who felt the truth of these words. Is not love the mightiest of legislators? Is not everything that it commands instantly accomplished? Does not He whom we love dwell in our heart; and does it not of itself perform what He enjoins? Accordingly Zwingli, waxing bold, declared to the people of Zurich that love to the Redeemer was alone capable of making man do things agreeable to God. "Works done out of Jesus Christ are not useful," said the Christian orator. "Since everything is done of Him, in Him, and by Him, what do we pretend to arrogate to ourselves? Wherever faith in God is, there God is; and wherever God is, there is a zeal which presses and urges men to good works. Only take care that Christ be in thee and thou in Christ, and then doubt not but He will work. The life of the Christian is just one continued work, by which God begins, continues, and perfects in man everything that is good."

Struck with the grandeur of this Divine love, which existed from eternity, the herald of grace raised his voice to all the timid or irresolute. "Can you fear," said he, "to approach the tender Father who has chosen you? Why has He chosen us in His grace? Why has He called us? Why has He drawn us? Was it that we might not dare to go to Him?" . . .

Such was the doctrine of Zwingli. It was the doctrine of Christ himself. "If Luther preaches Christ, he does what I do," said the preacher of Zurich. "Those who have been brought to Christ by him are more numerous than those who have been brought by me. But no matter! I am unwilling to bear any other name than that of Christ, whose soldier I am, and who alone is my head. Never was a single scrap written by me to Luther, or by Luther to me. And why? In order to shew to all how well the Spirit of God accords with himself, since, without having heard each other, we so harmoniously teach the doctrine of Jesus Christ."

Thus Zwingli preached with energy and might. The large cathedral could not contain the crowds of hearers. All thanked God that a new life was beginning to animate the lifeless body of the Church. Swiss from all the cantons, brought to Zurich either by the diet or by other causes, being touched by this new preaching, carried its precious seeds into all the Helvetic valleys. One acclamation arose from mountains and cities. Nicolas Hageus, writing from Lucerne to Zurich, says: "Switzerland has hitherto given birth to Scipios, Casars, and Brutuses; but has scarcely produced two men who had the knowledge of Jesus Christ, and could nourish men's hearts, not with vain disputes, but with the Word of God. Now that Divine Providence gives Switzerland Zwingle for its orator, and Oswald Myconius for its teacher, virtue and sacred literature revive among us. O happy Helvetia! could you but resolve at length to rest from all your wars, and, already so celebrated, become still more celebrated for righteousness and peace!" "It was said," wrote Myconius to Zwingle, "that your voice could not be heard three yards off. But I now see it was a falsehood; for all Switzerland hears you." "You possess intrepid courage," wrote Hedio to him from Bale; "I will follow you as far as I am able." "I have heard you," said Sebastian Hofmeister of Schaffhausen, writing to him from Constance. "Ah, would to God that Zurich, which is at the head of our happy confederation, was delivered from the disease, and health thus restored to the whole body!"

But Zwingle met with opponents as well as admirers. "To what end," said some, "does he intermeddle with the affairs of Switzerland?" "Why," said others, "does he, in his religious instructions, constantly repeat the same things?" Amid all these combats the soul of Zwingle was often filled with sadness. All seemed to be in confusion, as if society were turned upside down. He thought it impossible that anything new should appear without something of an opposite nature being immediately displayed. When a hope sprang up in his heart, a fear immediately sprang up beside it. Still, he soon raised his head. "The life of man here below," said he, "is a war; he who desires to obtain glory must attack the world in front, and, like David, make this haughty Goliath, who seems so proud of his stature, to bite the dust. The Church," said he, like Luther, "has been acquired by blood, and must be renewed by blood. The more numerous the defilements in it, the more must we arm ourselves, like Hercules, in order to clean out these Augean stables. I have little fear for Luther," added he, "even should he be thundered against by the bolts of this Jupiter."

Zwingle stood in need of repose, and repaired to the waters of Baden. The curate of the place, an old papal guard, a man of good temper, but completely ignorant, had obtained his benefice by carrying a halberd. True to his soldier habits, he spent the day and part of the night in jovial company, while Stäheli, his vicar, was indefatigable in fulfilling the duties of his office. Zwingle invited the young minister to his house. "I have need of Swiss help," said he to him; and from this moment Stäheli was his fellow-labourer. Zwingle, Stäheli, and Luti, afterwards pastor of Winterthur, lived under the same roof.

The devotedness of Zwingle was not to pass unrewarded. The Word of God, preached with so much energy, could not fail to produce fruit. Several magistrates were gained, experiencing the Word to be their consolation and their strength. The council, grieved at seeing the priests, and especially the monks, shamelessly delivering from the pulpit whatever came into their heads, passed a resolution, ordering them not to advance anything in their discourses "that they did not draw from the sacred sources of the Old and New Testaments." It was in 1520 that the civil power thus interposed, for the first time, in the work of the Reformation; acting as a Christian magistrate, say some,—since the first duty of the magistrate is to maintain the Word of God, and defend the best interests of the citizens; depriving the Church of its liberty, say others,—by subjecting it to secular power, and giving the signal for the series of evils which have since been engendered by the connection between Church and State. We will not give any opinion here on this great controversy, which, in our day, is carried on with so much warmth in several countries. It is sufficient for us to point out its commencement at the period of the Reformation. But there is another thing also to be pointed out,—the act of these magistrates was itself one of the effects produced by the preaching of the Word of God. At this period the Reformation in Switzerland ceased to be the work of private individuals, and began to be included within the national domain. Born in the heart of a few priests and literary men, it extended, rose, and took up elevated ground. Like the waters of the ocean, it gradually increased till it had overflowed an immense extent.

The monks were confounded; they were ordered to preach nothing but the Word of God, and the greater part of them had never read it. Opposition provokes opposition. The resolution of the council became the signal of more violent attacks on the Reformation. Plots began to be formed against the curate of Zurich. His life was in danger. One evening, when Zwingle and his vicars were quietly conversing in their house, some citizens arrived in great haste, and asked: "Are your doors well bolted? Be this night on your guard." "Such alarms were frequent," adds Stäheli; "but we were well armed, and a guard was stationed for us in the street."

In other places means still more violent were resorted to. An old man of Schaffhausen, named Galster, a man of piety, and of an ardour rare at his period of life, happy in the light which he had found in the Gospel, laboured to communicate it to his wife and children. His zeal, perhaps indiscreet, openly attacked the relics, priests, and superstitions with which this canton abounded. He soon became an object of hatred and terror even to his own family. The old man, penetrating their fatal designs, left his home broken-hearted, and fled to the neighbouring forest. There he lived several days subsisting on whatever he could find, when suddenly, on the last night of the year 1520, torches blazed in all directions through the forest, and the cries of men and the barking of dogs re-echoed under its dark shades. The council had ordered a hunt in the woods to discover him. The dogs scented him out, and the unhappy old man was dragged before the magistrate. He was ordered to abjure his faith, but remained immovable, and was beheaded.

CHAPTER X.

A New Combatant—The Reformer of Berne—Zwingle Encourages Haller—The Gospel at Lucerne—Oswald Persecuted—Preaching of Zwingle—Henry Bullinger and Gerold of Knouau—Rubiil at Bale—The Chaplain of the Hospital—War in Italy—Zwingle against Foreign Service.

THE year—the first day of which was signalized by this bloody execution—had scarcely commenced when Zwingle was waited on, in his house at Zurich, by a young man, of about twenty-eight years of age, tall in stature, and with an exterior which bespoke candour, simplicity, and diffidence. He said his name was Berthold Haller. Zwingle, on hearing the name, embraced the celebrated preacher of Berne with that affability which made him so engaging. Haller, born at Aldingen in Wurtemberg, had first studied at Rotweil under Rubellus, and afterwards at Pforzheim, where Simler was his teacher, and Melancthon his fellow-student. The Bernese, who had already distinguished themselves by arms, at this time resolved to invite literature into the bosom of their republic. Rubellus and Berthold, not twenty-one years of age, repaired thither. Sometime after, the latter was appointed canon, and ultimately preacher of the cathedral. The Gospel which Zwingle preached had extended to Berne; Haller believed, and thenceforth longed to see the distinguished man whom he now looked up to as his father. He went to Zurich after Myconius had announced his intended visit. Thus met Haller and Zwingle. The former, a man of great meekness, unbosomed his griefs; and the latter, a man of might, inspired him with courage. One day Berthold said to Zwingle: "My spirit is overwhelmed. . . . I am not able to bear all this injustice. I mean to give up the pulpit and retire to Bale beside Wittembach, and there occupy myself exclusively with sacred literature." "Ah!" replied Zwingle, "I, too, have my feelings of despondency, when unjust attacks are made upon me; but Christ awakens my conscience, and urges me on by His terrors and His promises. He alarms me when He says: Whoso shall be ashamed of me before men, of him will I be ashamed before my Father; and He sets my mind at ease when He adds: Whoso shall confess me before men, him will I confess before my Father. My dear Berthold, rejoice! Our name is written in indelible characters in the register of citizenship on high. I am ready to die for Christ. Let your wild cubs," added he, "hear the doctrine of Jesus Christ, and you will see them become tame.¹ But this task must be performed with great gentleness, lest they turn again and rend you." Haller's courage revived. "My soul," said he to Zwingle, "is awakened out of its sleep. I must preach the Gospel. Jesus Christ must again be established in this city, from which he has been so long exiled." Thus the torch of Berthold was kindled at the torch of Zwingle; and the timid Haller threw himself into the midst of the ferocious bears, who, as Zwingle expresses it, "were gnashing their teeth, and seeking to devour him."

It was in another part of Switzerland, however, that persecution was to begin. Warlike Lucerne came forward, like a foe in full armour couching his lance. In this canton, which was favourable to foreign service, a martial spirit predominated, and the leading men knit their brows when they heard words of peace fitted to curb their warlike temper. Meanwhile, the writings of Luther having found their way into the town, some of the inhabitants began to examine them, and were horrified. It seemed to them that an infernal hand had traced the lines; their imagination was excited, their senses became bewildered, and their rooms seemed as if filled with demons, flocking around them, and glaring upon them with a sarcastic smile. They hastily closed the book, and dashed it from them in dismay. Oswald, who had heard of these singular visions, did not speak of Luther to any but his most intimate friends, and contented himself with simply preaching the Gospel of Christ. Nevertheless, the cry which rung through the town was: "Luther and the schoolmaster (Myconius) must be burnt." "I am driven by my adversaries like a ship by the raging billows," said Oswald to one of his friends. One day in the beginning of the year 1520, he was unexpectedly summoned to appear before the council, and told: "Your orders are, not to read the writings of Luther to your pupils, not to name him in their presence, and not even to think of him." The lords of Lucerne pretended, it seems, to have a very extensive jurisdiction. Shortly after, a preacher delivered a sermon against heresy. The whole audience was moved, and every eye was turned on Myconius; for whom but he could the preacher have in his eye? Oswald kept quietly in his seat, as if the matter had not concerned him. But on leaving the church, as he was walking with his friend, Canon Xyloteck, one of the councillors, still under great excitement, passed close to them, and passionately exclaimed: "Well, disciples of Luther, why don't you defend your master?" They made no answer. "I live," said Myconius, "among fierce wolves; but I have this consolation, that the most of them are without teeth. They would bite if they could; but not being able, they bark."

The senate assembled: for the people began to be tumultuous. "He is a Lutheran!" said one of the councillors: "he is a propagator of new doctrines!" said another: "he is a seducer of youth!" said a third. "Let him appear! let him appear!" The poor schoolmaster appeared, and again listened to prohibitions and menaces. His unsophisticated soul was torn and overwhelmed. His gentle spouse could only console him by shedding tears. "Every one is rising up against me," exclaimed he in his agony. "Assailed by so many tempests, whither shall I turn, or how shall I escape? . . . Were it not for Christ, I would long ago have fallen under these assaults." "What matters it," wrote Doctor Sebastian Hofmeister of Constance to him, "whether Lucerne chooses to keep you or not? The whole earth is the Lord's. Every land is a home to the brave. Though we should be the most wicked of men, our enterprise is just, for we teach the Word of Christ."

While the truth encountered so many obstacles at Lucerne, it was victorious at Zurich. Zwingle was incessant in his labours. Wishing to examine the whole sacred volume in the original tongues, he zealously engaged in the study of Hebrew, under the direction of John Boschenstein, a pupil of Reuchlin. But if he studied Scripture, it was to preach it. The peasants who flocked to the market on Friday to dispose of their goods, shewed an eagerness to receive the Word of God. To satisfy their longings, Zwingle had begun, in December, 1520, to expound the Psalms every Friday after studying the original. The reformers always combined learned with practical labours—the latter forming the end, the former only the means. They were at once students and popular teachers. This union of learning and charity is characteristic of the period. In regard to his services on Sunday, Zwingle, after lecturing from St. Matthew on the life of our Saviour, proceeded afterwards to shew from the Acts of the Apostles how the Gospel was propagated. Thereafter he laid down the rules of the Christian life according to the Epistles to Timothy; employed the Epistle to the Galatians in combating doctrinal errors; combined with it the two Epistles of St. Peter, in order to shew to the despisers of St. Paul that both apostles were animated by the same spirit; and concluded with the Epistle to the Hebrews, in order to give a full display of the benefits which Christians derive from Jesus Christ, their sovereign priest.

But Zwingle did not confine his attention to adults; he sought also to inspire youth with the sacred flame by which his own breast was animated. One day, in 1521, while he was sitting in his study reading the Fathers of the Church, taking extracts of the most striking passages, and carefully arranging them into a large volume, his door opened, and a young man entered, whose appearance interested him exceedingly. It was Henry Bullinger, who was returning from Germany, and impatient to become acquainted with the teacher of his country, whose name was already famous in Christendom. The handsome youth fixed his eye first on Zwingle, and then on the books, and felt his vocation to do what Zwingle was doing. Zwingle received him with his usual cordiality, which won all hearts. This first visit had great influence on the future life of the student, who was on his return to the paternal hearth. Another youth had also won Zwingle's heart: this was Gerold Meyer of Knonan. His mother, Anna Reinhardt, who afterwards occupied an important place in the reformer's life, had been a great beauty, and was still distinguished for her virtues. John Meyer of Knonan, a youth of a noble family, who had been brought up at the court of the Bishop of Constance, had received a strong passion for Anna, who, however, belonged to a plebeian family. Old Meyer of Knonau had refused his consent to their marriage; and after it took place, disinherited his son. In 1513, Anna was left a widow, with a son and two daughters, and devoted herself entirely to the education of her poor orphans. The grandfather was inexorable. One day, however, the widow's maid-servant, having in her arms young Gerold, then a beautiful sprightly child of three years of age, stopped at the fish market, when old Meyer, who was looking out at a window, observed him, and, continuing to gaze after him, asked to whom that beautiful lively child belonged. "It is your son's child," was the answer. The heart of the old man was moved—the ice immediately melted—all was forgotten, and he clasped in his arms the widow and children of his son. Zwingle loved, as if he had been his own son, the noble and intrepid youth Gerold, who was to die in the flower of his age, side by side with the reformer, with his sword in his hand, and surrounded, alas! with the dead bodies of his enemies. Thinking that Gerold would not be able to prosecute his studies at Zurich, Zwingle, in 1521, sent him to Bâle.

Young Knonau did not find Hedio, the friend of Zwingle, there. Capito being obliged to accompany the Archbishop Albert to the coronation of Charles V., had procured Hedio to supply his place. Bâle having thus, one after another, lost her most faithful preachers, the Church there seemed forsaken; but other men appeared. Four thousand hearers squeezed into the church of William Roubli, curate of St. Alban. He attacked the mass, purgatory, and the invocation of saints; but this turbulent man, who was eager to draw the public attention upon himself, declaimed more against error than in support of truth. On Corpus Christi day he joined the public procession; but in place of the customary relics, caused the Holy Scriptures to be carried before him, splendidly bound, and bearing this inscription: "THE BIBLE; this is the true relic, the others are only dead bones." Courage adorns the servant of God; affectation disgraces him. The work of an evangelist is to preach the Bible, and not to make a presumptuous display of it. The enraged priests accused Roubli before the council. A mob immediately gathered in Cordelier Square. "Protect our preacher," said the citizens to the council. Fifty ladies of distinction interceded in his behalf; but Roubli was obliged to quit Bâle. At a later period he took part, like Grebel, in Anabaptist disorders. The Reformation, in the course of its development, everywhere threw off the chaff which mingled with the good grain.

At this period a modest voice was heard from the humblest of the chapels, clearly proclaiming the evangelical doctrine. It was that of young Wolfgang Wissemberger, son of a councillor of state, and chaplain of the hospital. All in Bâle who felt new religious wants, attached themselves to the gentle chaplain, preferring him to the presumptuous Roubli. Wolfgang began to read the mass in German. The monks renewed their clamour, but this time they failed, and Wissemberger continued to preach the Gospel; "for," says an old chronicler, "he was a burgess, and his father a councillor." This first success of the Reformation in Bâle, while it was the prelude of still greater success, at the same time tended greatly to promote the progress of the work throughout the confederation. Zurich no longer stood alone. Learned Bâle began to be charmed with the new doctrine. The foundations of the new temple were enlarged. The Reformation in Switzerland obtained a fuller development.

The centre of the movement was, however, at Zurich. But, to the deep grief of Zwingle, important political events occurred in 1521, and in some measure distracted men's minds from the preaching of the Gospel. Leo X., who had offered his alliance at once to Charles V. and Francis I., had at last declared for the emperor. War between the two rivals was on the point of breaking out in Italy. The French general Lautrec had said: "There will be nothing left of the pope but his ears." This bad jest increased the pontiff's anger. The King of France claimed the aid of the Swiss cantons; all of which, with the exception of Zurich, had formed an alliance with him; he obtained it. The pope flattered himself he would gain Zurich; and the Cardinal of Sion, ever given to intrigue, and confident in his ability and his finesse, hastened thither to obtain soldiers for his master. But from his old friend Zwingle he encountered a vigorous opposition. He was indignant that the Swiss should sell their blood to strangers; and his imagination figured to itself the swords of the Zurichers under the standard of the pope and the emperor in the plains of Italy, crossing the swords of the confederates united under the colours of France. At such scenes of fratricide his patriotic and Christian soul shuddered with horror. Thundering from the pulpit, he exclaimed: "Would you rend and overthrow the confederation? . . . We attack the wolves which devour our flocks, but offer no resistance to those who prowl around seeking to devour men. . . . Ah! it is not without cause that these hats and mantles are of scarlet. Shake their robes, and ducats and crowns will tumble out of them; twist them, and you will see the blood of your brother, your father, your son, and your dearest friend trickling down from them." The energetic voice of Zwingle was heard in vain. The cardinal with the red hat succeeded; and two thousand seven hundred Zurichers set out under the command of George Berguer. Zwingle was heart-broken. Still, however, his influence was not lost. For a long time the banners of Zurich were not again to be unfurled, and pass the gates of the town in the cause of foreign powers.

CHAPTER XI.

Zwingle against the Precepts of Man—Fermentation during Lent—Truth advances during Combat—The Deputies of the Bishops—Accusation before the Clergy and Council—Appeal to the Great Council—The Coadjutor and Zwingle—Decree of the Grand Council—State of Matters—Attack by Hoffman.

TORN in his feelings as a citizen, Zwingle devoted himself with new zeal to the preaching of the Gospel, urging it with growing energy. "I will not cease," said he, "to labour to restore the ancient unity of the Church of Christ." He began the year 1522 by shewing what difference there is between the precepts of the Gospel and the precepts of men. The season of Lent having arrived, he raised his voice still more loudly. After laying the foundation of the new edifice, he wished to clear away the rubbish of the old. "For four years," said he to the multitude assembled in the cathedral, "you, with ardent thirst, received the holy doctrine of the Gospel. Enkindled by the flames of charity, fed with the sweets of heavenly manna, it is impossible to have still any relish for the sad element of human traditions." Then attacking compulsory abstinence from flesh for a certain time, he exclaimed in his bold eloquence: "There are some who pretend that it is an evil, and even a great sin, to eat flesh, although God never forbade it; and yet do not consider it a crime to sell human flesh to the foreigner, and drag it to slaughter." The friends of foreign service who were present were filled with indignation and rage at these bold words, and vowed not to forget them.

While preaching thus forcibly, Zwingle still continued to say mass; he observed the usages established by the Church, and even abstained from meat on the forbidden days. He was persuaded that the first thing necessary was to enlighten the people. But certain turbulent spirits did not act with so much wisdom. Roubli, who had become a refugee at Zurich, allowed himself to be carried away by the impulse of an extravagant zeal. The old curate of St. Alban, a Bernese captain, and Conrad Huber, a member of the great council, often met at the house of the last to eat meat on Friday and Saturday, and made a boast of it. The question of abstinence was the engrossing topic. An inhabitant of Lucerne, who had come to Zurich, said to one of his friends there: "You do wrong in eating flesh during Lent." The friend answered: "You Lucerne folks also take the liberty of eating it on the forbidden days." The inhabitant of Lucerne rejoined: "We have purchased it from the pope." The friend: "And we from the butcher. If it is a question of money, the one is surely as good as the other." The council—a complaint having been lodged against the transgressors of the ecclesiastical ordinances—asked the advice of the curates. Zwingle answered that the act of eating meat every day was not blameable in itself; but that it ought to be abstained from so long as competent authority had not given any decision on the point. The other members of the clergy concurred in this opinion.

The enemies of the truth took advantage of this favourable circumstance. Their influence was on the wane. Victory was on the side of Zwingle. It was necessary, therefore, to make haste and strike a decisive blow. They imperturbed the Bishop of Constance. "Zwingle," exclaimed they, "is the destroyer of the flock, and not its shepherd."

Ambitious Faber, the old friend of Zwingle, had returned, full of zeal for the papacy, from a visit which he had just paid to Rome. From the inspiration of this proud city the first troubles of Switzerland were to proceed. It was necessary that there should be a decisive struggle between evangelical truth and the representatives of the pontiff. It is especially when attacked that the truth manifests its whole power.

Under the shade of opposition and persecution, Christianity at first acquired the power which overthrew her enemies. God was pleased, in like manner, to conduct His truth through difficult paths at the period of revival which we now describe. The priests then, as in the days of the apostles, assailed the new doctrine. But for their attacks it might, perhaps, have remained obscurely hid in some faithful souls. But God watched over it to manifest it to the world. Opposition struck out new paths for it, launched it on a new career, and fixed the eyes of the nation upon it. It was like a breath of wind scattering far and wide seeds which might otherwise have remained inert in the spots on which they fell. The tree destined to shelter the Helvetic population was indeed planted in the bosom of their valleys, but storms were necessary to strengthen the roots and give full development to the branches. The partisans of the papacy, seeing the fire which was slowly burning in Zurich, threw themselves upon it to extinguish it, and thereby only caused its flames to spread.

On the afternoon of the 7th April, 1522, three ecclesiastical deputies from the Bishop of Constance were seen entering the town of Zurich. Two of them had a stern and angry, the third, a gentle expression of countenance. It was the coadjutor of the Bishop Melchior Battli, Doctor Brendi, and John Vanner, preacher of the cathedral, an evangelical man, who, during the whole affair, remained silent. It was night when Luti called in haste on Zwingle, and said: "Officers from the bishop have arrived; a great blow is preparing; all the partisans of ancient customs are in motion. A notary has called a meeting of all the priests at an early hour to-morrow morning, in the hall of the chapter."

The assembly of the clergy having accordingly met next day, the coadjutor rose and delivered a speech, which seemed to his opponents full of violence and pride. He affected, however, not to mention Zwingle by name. Some priests who had been recently gained to the Gospel, and were still irresolute, were terrified; their pale cheeks, their silence, and their sighs, shewed that they had lost all courage. Zwingle rose and delivered a speech which closed the mouths of his adversaries. At Zurich, as in the other cantons, the most violent enemies of the new doctrine were in the Lesser Council. The deputation, defeated before the clergy, carried their complaints before the magistrates. Zwingle was absent, and there was no reply to be dreaded. The result appeared decisive. The Gospel and its defenders were on the point of being condemned without a hearing. Never was the Reformation of Switzerland in greater danger. It was going to be stifled in the cradle. The councillors in favour of Zwingle appealed to the Great Council. It was the only remaining plank for escape, and God employed it to save the cause of the Gospel. The Two Hundred were convened. The partisans of the papacy used every means to exclude Zwingle, who, on the other hand, did all he could to gain admission. As he himself expresses it, he knocked at every door, and left not a stone unturned; but all in vain! "The thing is impossible," said the burgo-masters; "the Council has decreed the contrary." "Then," relates Zwingle, "I remained quiet, and with deep sighs carried the matter before Him who hears the groaning of the prisoner, supplicating Him to defend His own Gospel." The patient resigned waiting of the servants of God is never disappointed.

On the 9th April the Two Hundred assembled, "We wish to have our pastors here," immediately exclaimed the members who were in favour of the Reformation. The Lesser Council resisted; but the Great Council decided that the pastors should be present to hear the charge, and answer it if they thought fit. The deputies from Constance were introduced, and then the three curates of Zurich: Zwingle, Engelhard, and old Röschli.

After the parties thus brought face to face had for some time eyed each other, the coadjutor rose. "Had his heart and his head been equal to his voice," says Zwingle, "he would, in sweetness, have surpassed Apollo and Orpheus, and in force the Græchii and Demosthenes."

"The civil constitution," said the champion of the papacy, "and Christianity itself, are threatened. Men have appeared teaching new, offensive, and seditious doctrines." Then, after speaking at great length, he fixed his eye on the assembled senate, and said: "Remain with the Church!—remain in the Church! Out of it none can be saved. Ceremonies alone can bring the simple to the knowledge of salvation; and the pastors of the flocks have nothing else to do than to explain their meaning to the people."

As soon as the coadjutor had finished his speech, he and his party were preparing to leave the council-hall, when Zwingle said to him warmly: "Mr. Coadjutor, and you who accompany him, remain, I pray you, till I have defended myself."

The Coadjutor.—"We are not employed to dispute with any man whatever."

Zwingle.—"I mean not to dispute, but to explain to you, without fear, what I have taught up to this hour."

Burgomaster Roust to the Deputies of Constance.—"I pray you listen to the curate's reply."

The Coadjutor.—"I too well know the man with whom I would have to do. Ulrich Zwingle is too violent for any man to dispute with!"

Zwingle.—"When did it become the practice to attack an innocent man so strongly, and afterwards refuse to hear him? In the name of our common faith,—in the name of the baptism which both of us have received,—in the name of Christ, the author of salvation and life,—listen to me. If you cannot as deputies, at least do it as Christians."

After firing a volley into the air, Rome retired with hasty steps from the field of battle. The reformer only asked to speak, and the agent of the papacy thought only of flight. A cause thus pleaded was already gained on the one side, and lost on the other. The Two Hundred could not contain their indignation; a murmur burst forth in the assembly. The burgomaster again pressed the deputies. They felt ashamed, and silently resumed their seats. Then Zwingle said:

"The coadjutor speaks of seditious doctrines subversive of civil laws. Let him know that Zurich is quieter, and more obedient to the laws, than any other town in Switzerland; and this all good citizens attribute to the Gospel. Is not Christianity the most powerful safeguard of justice among a people? What are ceremonies good for, unless it be to sully the face of Christ and Christians? Yes, there is another method than these vain observances to bring simple people to the knowledge of the truth—a method which Christ and the apostles followed in the Gospel itself! Have no dread of its not being comprehended by the people! Whoever believes comprehends. The people can believe, and therefore can comprehend. This is a work of the Divine Spirit, and not of human reason. For the rest, he who does not find forty days sufficient, may, for me, if he likes, fast every day in the year! All I ask is, that nobody be compelled to do so, and that, for neglect of the minutest observance, the Zurichers be not accused of separating from the communion of Christians."

"I did not say so," exclaimed the coadjutor. "No," said his colleague, Dr. Brendi; "he did not say it." But the whole senate confirmed the assertion of Zwingle, who continued:

"Worthy citizens, let not this accusation move you! The foundation of the Church is that rock, that Christ who gave Peter his name, because he confessed Him faithfully. In every nation whosoever believeth with the heart in the Lord Jesus Christ is saved. This is the Church out of which no man can be saved. As to us ministers of Christ, to explain the Gospel and follow it, is the whole of our duty. Let those who live by ceremonies make it their business to explain them." This was to touch the sore part.

The coadjutor blushed and said nothing. The Two Hundred adjourned, and afterwards, the same day, decided that the pope and cardinals should be requested to explain the controverted point; and that, in the meantime, flesh should not be eaten during Lent. This was to leave matters on the old footing, and answer the bishop in such a way as to gain time.

This struggle had advanced the work of the Reformation. The champions of Rome and of the Reformation had been in presence of each other, and before the eyes of the whole community, and the advantage had not been on the side of the pope. This was the first engagement in what was to be a long and severe campaign, and to exhibit many alternations of grief and joy. But a first victory at the outset gives courage to the whole army, and fills the enemy with dismay. The Reformation had obtained possession of a territory of which it was not again to be deprived. If the council deemed it necessary to proceed with some degree of caution, the people loudly proclaimed the defeat of Rome. "Never," said they, in the exultation of the moment,—“never will they be able to reassemble their beaten and scattered troops.” “You,” said they to Zwingle, “have, with the spirit of St. Paul, attacked these false apostles and their Ananias,—their whitened walls. . . . The utmost the satellites of Antichrist can now do is to gnash their teeth against you!” Voices were heard from the centre of Germany joyfully proclaiming “the glory of reviving theology.”

At the same time, however, the enemies of the Gospel mustered their forces. If they were to strike there was no time to be lost, for it would soon be beyond the reach of their blows. Hoffman laid before the chapter a long accusation against the reformer. "Were the curate even able," said he, "to prove by witnesses what sins, what irregularities have been committed by ecclesiastics in such a convent, such a street, such a tavern, it would still be his duty not to give any names. Why does he give out (it is true I have scarcely ever heard him myself) that he alone draws his doctrine at the fountain-head, and that others search for it only in sinks and puddles? Is it not impossible, seeing the diversity of spirits, for all to preach the same thing?"

Zwingle defended himself at a full meeting of the chapter, scattering the accusations of his opponents, "as a bull with his horns tosses straw into the air." The affair which had appeared so serious, ended in laughter at the canon's expense. But Zwingle did not stop here; on the 16th April he published a treatise "On the Free Use of Food."

CHAPTER XII.

Grief and Joy in Germany—Ambush against Zwingle—Mandate of the Bishop—Archétèles—The Bishop Addresses the Diet—Prohibition to Attack the Monks—Declaration of Zwingle—The Nuns of Göttingen—Zwingle's Address to Schwitz.

The reformer's immovable firmness delighted the friends of truth, and particularly the evangelical Christians of Germany, so long deprived, by the captivity of the Wartburg, of the mighty apostle who had first raised his head in the bosom of the Church. Pastors and faithful people, now exiled by the inexorable decree which the papacy had obtained at Worms from Charles V., found an asylum in Zurich. Nesse, the professor of Frankfort, whom Luther visited when on his way to Worms, in a letter to Zwingle, says: "Oh! how I am delighted to learn with what authority you preach Christ! Speak words of encouragement to those who, by the cruelty of wicked bishops, are obliged to flee far from our churches in sorrow."

But the adversaries of the Reformation did not confine their cruel plots against its friends to Germany. Scarcely an hour passed at Zurich in which the means of getting rid of Zwingle were not under consideration. One day he received an anonymous letter, which he immediately communicated to his two vicars. It said: "Snares environ you on every side, mortal poison is ready to deprive you of life. Eat only in your own house, and of bread baked by your own cook. The walls of Zurich contain men who are plotting your ruin. The oracle which revealed this to me is truer than that of Delphi. I am on your side; you will yet know me."

The day following that on which Zwingle received this mysterious letter, at the moment when Stäheli was going to enter the church of Eau, a chaplain stopped him and said: "Make all haste and quit the house of Zwingle—a catastrophe is preparing." Fanatics, in despair of being able to arrest the Reformation by word, armed themselves with the poniard. When mighty revolutions are accomplished in society, assassins are often thrown up from the impure dregs of the agitated population. God guarded Zwingle.

While murderers saw their plots defeated, the legitimate organs of the papacy again began to agitate. The bishop and his councillors were determined to renew the war. From every quarter information to this effect reached Zwingle, who, leaning on the Divine promise, exclaimed, with noble confidence: "I fear them . . . as a lofty shore fears the threatening waves . . . συν τῷ Θεῷ, with God," added he. On the 2d May, the Bishop of Constance published an order in which, without naming either Zurich or Zwingle, he complained of the attempts of artful persons to renew the condemned doctrines, and of discussions by the learned and the ignorant, in all places, on the most solemn mysteries. John Vanner, the preacher of the cathedral of Constance, was the first that was attacked. "I would rather," said he, "be a Christian with the hatred of many, than abandon Christ for the friendship of the world."

But it was at Zurich that the growing heresy required to be crushed. Faber and the bishop knew that Zwingle had several enemies among the canons, and they were desirous to turn this hatred to account. Toward the end of May, a letter from the bishop arrived at Zurich addressed to the provost and his chapter. "Sons of the Church," said the prelate, "let them perish that will perish; but let no one sever you from the Church." At the same time the bishop urged the canons to prevent the false doctrines, engendered by pernicious sects, from being preached and discussed, whether in private or in public. When this letter was read in the chapter all eyes were turned upon Zwingle, who, understanding what was meant, said: "I see you think that this letter concerns me; have the goodness to put it into my hand, and by the help of God I will answer it."

Zwingle did reply in his "Archétèles," a word which signifies the beginning and end; "for I hope," said he, "that this first answer will also be the last." He spoke in it in very respectful terms of the bishop, and attributed all the attacks of his enemies to some intriguers. "What, then, have I done?" said he; "I have called all men to the knowledge of their maladies; I have laboured to bring them to the true God and to His Son Jesus Christ. With that view I have employed not captious exhortations, but words simple and true, such as the sons of Switzerland can comprehend." Then, passing from the defensive and becoming the assailant, he finely adds: "Julius Cæsar, feeling himself mortally wounded, endeavoured to draw up the folds of his robe, that he might fall in a becoming manner. The fall of your ceremonies is at hand; act so, at least, that they may fall decently, and that in every place light may be quickly substituted for darkness."

This was all that the bishop gained by his letter to the chapter of Zurich. Now, therefore, that friendly remonstrances were vain, it was necessary to strike more decisive blows. Faber and Landenberg turned in another direction—towards the diet, the national council. There deputies from the bishop arrived to state that their master had issued an order, prohibiting all the priests of his diocese from innovating in matters of doctrine; but that his authority being disregarded, he now wished the aid of the heads of the confederation to assist him in bringing the rebellious to obedience, and defending the true and ancient faith. The enemies of the Reformation were in a majority in this first assembly of the nation, which a short time before had issued a decree, prohibiting the preaching of all priests whose discourses, as it was expressed, produced discord among the people. This decree of the diet, which thus, for the first time, took up the question of the Reformation, had no result; but now having determined on vigorous measures, this body summoned before it Urban Weiss, pastor of Fellispach, near Baden, whom public rumour charged with preaching the new faith, and rejecting the old. Weiss was respited for some time on the intercession of several individuals, and on bail for a hundred florins, offered by his parishioners.

But the diet had taken its part, and having just given proof of it, the priests and monks began everywhere to resume courage. At Zurich—even after the first decree—they had begun to behave more imperiously. Several members of council were in the practice, morning and evening, of visiting the three convents, and even taking their viaticals there. The monks laboured to indoctrinate their kind table companions, and urged them to procure a decree of the government in their favour. "If Zwingle won't be silent," said they, "we will cry louder still!" The diet had taken part with the oppressors. The council of Zurich knew not what to do. On the 7th of June, it issued an order forbidding any one to preach against the monks; "but scarcely was the order resolved upon, than," says the chronicle of Bullinger, "a sudden noise was heard in the council chamber, and made every one look at his neighbour." Peace was not re-established. The war waged from the pulpit waxed hotter and hotter. The council named a deputation, who called the pastors of Zurich and the readers and preachers of the convents to meet them in the provost's house; after a keen discussion the burgo-master enjoined the two parties not to preach anything which might interrupt concord. "I cannot accept this injunction," said Zwingle; "I mean to preach the Gospel freely and unconditionally, in conformity to the resolution previously adopted. I am bishop and pastor of Zurich; it is to me that the care of souls has been entrusted. It was I that took the oath, not the monks. They ought to yield, not I. If they preach lies, I will contradict them, and that even in the pulpit of their own convent. If I myself preach a doctrine contrary to the Holy Gospel, then I ask to be rebuked, not only by the chapter, but by any citizen whatever; and moreover, to be punished by the council." "We," said the monks—"we demand to be permitted to preach the doctrines of St. Thomas." The committee of the council having deliberated, ordered that Thomas, Scotus, and the other doctors, should be let alone, and nothing preached but the Holy Gospel. Thus the truth had once more gained the victory. But the wrath of the partisans of the papacy increased. The ultramontane canons could not conceal their anger. They impudently eyed Zwingle in the chapter, and by their looks seemed to demand his life.

Zwingle was not deterred by their menaces. There was one place in Zurich where—thanks to the Dominicans—the light had not yet penetrated; this was the numery of Etenbach. The daughters of the first families of Zurich there took the veil. It seemed unjust that these poor females, confined within the walls of their monastery, should alone be excluded from hearing the Word of God. The Great Council ordered Zwingle to repair to it; and the reformer having mounted a pulpit which had hitherto been given up to the Dominicans, preached "on the clearness and certainty of the Word of God." He, at a later period, published this remarkable discourse, which was not without fruit, and irritated the monks still more.

A circumstance occurred to augment this hatred, and give it a place in many other hearts. The Swiss, headed by Stein and Winkelreid, had just experienced a bloody defeat at Bicoque. They had rushed impetuously on the enemy; but the artillery of Pescara and the lancers of that Freundsberg whom Luther had met at the door of the hall of Worms, had thrown down both leaders and colours, whole companies falling and disappearing at once. Winkelreid and Stein, Mulinen, Diesbachs, Bonstettens, Tschudis, and Pfyffers, were left on the battle-field. Schwitz especially had been mown down. The bloody wrecks of this dreadful conflict had returned to Switzerland, spreading mourning at every step. A wail of grief had resounded from the Alps to the Jura, and from the Rhone to the Rhine.

But none had felt a deeper pang than Zwingle. He immediately sent an address to Schwitz, dissuading its citizens from foreign service. "Your ancestors," said he to them, with all the warmth of a Swiss heart, "forgot their enemies in defence of their liberties; but they never put Christians to death in order to gain money. These foreign wars bring innumerable calamities on our country. The scourges of God chastise our confederacy, and Helvetic freedom is on the eve of being lost between the selfish caresses and the mortal hatred of foreign princes. Zwingle went hand in hand with Nicolas Fine, and renewed the entreaties of that man of peace. This exhortation having been presented to the assembly of the people of Schwitz, had such an effect, that a resolution was passed to desist prospectively for twenty-five years from capitulation. But the French party soon succeeded in getting the generous resolution rescinded, and Schwitz was thenceforth the canton most decidedly opposed to Zwingle and his works. The very disasters which the partisans of foreign capitulation brought upon their country, only increased the hatred of those men against the bold minister who endeavoured to rescue his country from all this misfortune and all this disgrace. Thus throughout the confederation a party, which daily grew more and more violent, was formed against Zurich and Zwingle. The customs of the Church and the practices of the recruiters being at once attacked, they made common cause in resisting the impetus of reform, by which their existence was threatened. At the same time external enemies multiplied. Not merely the pope, but other foreign princes also vowed inextinguishable hatred to the Reformation, because it was aiming to deprive them of those Helvetic halberds, to which their ambition and their pride owed so many triumphs. But the cause of the Gospel had still God on its side, and the best among the people: this was sufficient. Besides, individuals from different countries, exiled for their faith, were led by the hand of Providence to give Switzerland their aid.

CHAPTER XIII.

A French Monk—He teaches in Switzerland—Dispute between the Monk and Zwingle—Discourse of the Leader of the Johannites—The Carnival at Berne—The Eaters of the Dead—The Skull of St. Anne—Appenzel—The Grisons—Murder and Adultery—Marriage of Zwingle.

On Saturday, the 12th July, there was seen entering the streets of Zurich a monk, tall, thin, stiff, gaunt, clad in a grey cordelier frock, and mounted upon an ass. He had the look of a foreigner, and his bare feet almost touched the ground. He arrived thus by the road from Avignon. He did not know one word of German, but by means of Latin succeeded in making himself understood. Francis Lambert (this was his name) asked for Zwingle, and delivered him a letter from Berthold Haller. "The Franciscan father," wrote the Bernese curate, "who is no less than the apostolic preacher of the general convent of Avignon, has, for nearly five years, been teaching Christian truth: he has preached in Latin to our priests at Geneva, at Lausanne in presence of the bishop, at Friburg, and finally at Berne. His subjects were, the Church, the priesthood, the sacrifice of the mass, the traditions of the Roman bishops, and the superstitions of the religious orders. It seemed to me wonderful to hear such things from a cordelier and a Frenchman—circumstances, both of which, as you know, imply a host of superstitions. The Frenchman himself related to Zwingle how the writings of Luther, having been discovered in his cell, he had been obliged to take a hasty leave of Avignon; how he had first preached the Gospel at Geneva, and thereafter at Lausanne.

AVIGNON.

Zwingle, overjoyed, gave the monk access to the church of Notre Dame, assigning him a seat in the choir near the high altar. Lambert here delivered four sermons, in which he forcibly attacked the errors of Rome; but in the fourth, he defended the invocation of the saints and the Virgin.

"Brother, you are in error," immediately exclaimed an animated voice. It was the voice of Zwingle. Canons and chaplains thrilled with joy when they saw a quarrel rising between the Frenchman and the heretical curate. "He has attacked you," said they all to Lambert: "demand a public discussion." The man of Avignon did so, and at ten o'clock on the morning of the 12th of July the two chaplains met in the hall of the canons. Zwingle opened the Old and New Testament in Greek and Latin: he discussed and lectured and raising them towards heaven, exclaimed: "I thank thee, O God, that thou hast, by this illustrious instrument, given me such a clear knowledge of the truth! Henceforth," added he, turning towards the assembly, "in all my distresses I will invoke God only, and leave off my beads. To-morrow I resume my journey. I go to Bâle to see Erasmus of Rotterdam, and thence to Wittenberg to see the monk Martin Luther." He accordingly remounted his ass and set out. We will again meet with him. He was the first exile from France, for the cause of the Gospel, who appeared in Switzerland and Germany,—a modest forerunner of many thousands of refugees and confessors.

Myconius had no such consolation. On the contrary, he saw Sebastian Hofmeister, who had come from Constance to Lucerne, and there boldly preached the Gospel, obliged to quit the city. Then Oswald's grief increased. The moist climate of Lucerne disagreed with him. He was wasted by fever; and the physicians declared, that if he did not change his residence he would die. Writing to Zwingli, he says: "There is no place I should like better to be than beside yourself, and no place worse than at Lucerne. Men torture, and the climate consumes me. My disease, some say, is the punishment of my iniquity. Ah! it is vain to speak, vain to act; everything is poison to them. There is One in heaven on whom alone my hope depends."

This hope was not vain. It was towards the end of March, and the feast of the Annunciation was at hand. The evening before there was a great solemnity in commemoration of a fire which, in 1340, had reduced the greater part of the town to ashes. Multitudes from the surrounding districts had flocked into Lucerne, and several hundreds of priests were then assembled. Some distinguished orator was usually employed to preach on this great occasion. Conrad Schmidt, commander of the Johannites, arrived to discharge the duty. An immense crowd thronged the church. What was the general astonishment on hearing the commander lay aside the pompous Latin to which they had been accustomed, and speak in good German, so that all could comprehend him, enforce with authority and holy fervour the love of God in sending His Son, eloquently prove that external works cannot save, and that the promises of God are truly the power of the Gospel. "God forbid," said the commander to his astonished audience, "that we should receive a chief so full of lies as the Bishop of Rome, and reject Jesus Christ. If the Bishop of Rome dispenses the bread of the Gospel, let us receive him as pastor, but not as head; and if he does not dispense it, let us not receive him in any way whatever." Oswald was unable to restrain his joy. "What a man!" exclaimed he; "what a discourse! what majesty! what authority! what overflowing of the Spirit of Christ!" The impression was general. To the agitation which filled the town succeeded a solemn silence; but all this was transient. When nations shut their ears against the calls of God, these calls are diminished from day to day, and soon cease. Thus it was at Lucerne.

At Berne, while the truth was preached from the pulpit, the papacy was attacked at the merry-makings of the people. Nicolas Mannel, a distinguished layman, celebrated for his poetical talents, and advanced to the first offices in the state, indignant at seeing his countrymen pillaged by Samson, composed carnival dramas, in which, with the keen weapon of satire, he attacked the avarice, pride, and luxury of the pope and the clergy. On the Shrove Tuesday "of the lords," (the clergy were at this time the lords, and began Lent eight days before the common people,) all Berne was engrossed with a drama or mystery, entitled, "The Eaters of the Dead," which young boys were going to perform in the street of La Croix. The people flocked to it in crowds. In regard to the progress of art, these dramatic sketches of the beginning of the sixteenth century are of some interest; but we give them here with a very different view. We would have been better pleased not to have had to quote squibs of this description on the part of the Reformation, for truth triumphs by other arms. But the historian does not make his facts. He must give them as he finds them.

At length, to the delight of the eager crowds assembled in the streets of La Croix, the representation began. The pope is seen clad in gorgeous robes, and seated on a throne. Around him stand his courtiers, his body-guards, and a promiscuous band of priests of high and low degree; behind are nobles, laymen, and mendicants. A funeral train shortly appears; it is a rich farmer on the way to his last home. Two of his relatives walk slowly in front of the coffin with napkins in their hand. The train having arrived in front of the pope, the bier is laid down at his feet, and the drama begins:—

FIRST RELATIVE, in a tone of deep grief.

Oh noble army of the sainted host,
Take pity on our doleful plight;
Our cousin, our illustrious host,
From life, alas! has taken flight.

SECOND RELATIVE.

Expense we grudge not; cheerfully we'll pay
For priests, monks, and nuns, in costly array;
Yes, one hundred crowns we'll freely devote
If, thereby, exemption may surely be bought
From purgatory, that dread scourge
With which our frightened souls they urge.

THE SACRISTAN, breaking off from the band surrounding the pope, and running hastily to CURATE EVER-MORE.

Something to drink, Master Curate, I crave;
A farmer of note now goes to his grave.

THE CURATE.

One!—may you must tell me of ten;
My thirst will ne'er be quenched till then.
Life flourishes when mortals die,
For death to me brings jollity.

THE SACRISTAN.

Ah! could it shorten mankind's breath,
I'd ring a merry peal for death!
No other trade succeeds so well
As tolling out life's parting knell.

THE CURATE.

But does the bell of death the portals draw
Of heaven's wide gate? I cannot, may not say.
What boots it? to my house it brings
Both fish and flesh, and all good things.

THE CURATE'S NIECE.

'Tis well: I, too, anon will claim my share.
This day this soul must pay to me my fare—
A robe, white, red, and green, a flowered damask,
A pretty kerchief likewise for my eyes at mass.

CARDINAL HIGH-PRIDE, adorned with a red hat, and close by the pope.

If death brought us no heritage,
Would we cause die in flower of age,
On battle-plain,
Such heaps of slain,
Roused by intrigue, by envy fired?
Yes, Rome with Christian blood grows fat!
Therefore I hoist this scarlet hat,
To tell the trophies thus acquired.

BISHOP WOLF-BELLY.

In papal rites I'll live and die,
And clothe me in silk embroidery;

In foray or chase I'll take my pleasure,
 And eat and drink in ample measure,
 Had I been priest in days of yore,
 A peasant's dress I then had wore.
 We ence were shepherds, but now we reign kings,
 For a shepherd I'll pass 'mong the lamkins, poor things . . .

A Voice.

When? When shall this be?

BISHOP.

When the wool of the flock shall be gathered by me.
 We truly are wolves, yet we're shepherds of sheep;
 They must feed us, or death is the best they shall reap.
 His Holiness forbids to marry;
 This yoke the wisest ne'er could carry—
 But then I when priests do cross the score,
 The scandal only swells my store,
 And makes my train extend the more.
 Nought I refuse, 'e'en farthings tell,
 A monied priest may have a bell;
 Four florins a-year will wipe it away,
 Does an infant appear?—again he must pay.
 On two thousand florins I reckon each year;
 Were they chaste, I should starve on a pittance, I fear.
 Then hail to the pope; on my knees I adore
 And swear in his faith to live evermore;
 His church I'll defend, and till death I avow,
 He alone is the god before whom I will bow.

THE POPE.

The people now at length believe
 That priests can all their sins relieve
 At pleasure—that to them is given Full power to shut or open heaven.
 Preach loudly, every high decree,
 Of him, the conclave's majesty.
 Then, we are kings, the laity slaves:
 But if the Gospel standard waves
 We're lost; for nowhere does it say,
 Make sacrifice, let priests have pay.
 The Gospel course for us would be,
 To live and die in poverty.
 Instead of steeds to mark my state,
 And chariots on my sons to wait,
 A paltry ass must needs supply
 A seat for sacred majesty.
 No, I cannot take such legacy;
 I'll thunder at such temerity.
 Let us but will—the world will nod,
 And nations adore us as God.
 Slighting their rights, I mount my throne,
 And partition the world among my own.
 Vile laity must keep far aloof,
 Nor dare to enter our blest roof,
 To touch our tribute, or our gold,
 Holy water 'e'en let them hold.

We will not continue this literal translation of Manuel's drama. The agony of the clergy on learning the efforts of the reformers, and their rage against those who threatened to interfere with their irregularities, are painted in lively colours. The dissolute manners of which this piece gave so vivid a representation, were too common not to strike the spectator with the truth of the picture. The people were excited. Many jibes were heard as they retired from the play in the street of La Croix; but some who took the matter more seriously, spoke of Christian liberty and papal despotism, and contrasted the simplicity of the Gospel with the pomp of Rome. The contempt of the people was soon displayed in the public streets. On Ash Wednesday the indulgences were promenaded through the town amid satirical songs. In Berne, and throughout Switzerland, a severe blow had been given to the ancient edifice of the papacy.

Some time after this representation, another comedy was acted at Berne; but there was no fiction in it. The clergy, council, and corporation, had assembled in front of the Upper Gate, waiting for the skull of St. Anne, which the famous knight, Albert of Stein, had gone to fetch from Lyons. At length Stein appeared, holding the holy relic wrapt in a covering of silk. As it passed, the Bishop of Lausanne knelt down before it. This precious skull—the skull of the Virgin's mother—is carried in procession to the church of the Dominicans, and, amid the ringing of bells, enters the church, where it is placed with great solemnity on the altar consecrated to it, behind a splendid grating. But amid all this joy a letter arrives from the abbot of the convent of Lyons, where the relics of the saint were deposited, intimating that what the monks had sold to the knight was a profane bone, taken at random from the burying ground. The trick thus played off on the illustrious city of Berne, filled its citizens with deep indignation.

The Reformation was making progress in other parts of Switzerland. In 1521, Walter Klarer, a young man of Appenzel, returned to his native canton from the university of Paris. Luther's writings fell into his hands, and, in 1522, he preached the evangelical doctrine with all the ardour of a young convert. An innkeeper, named Rausberg, a wealthy and pious man, and a member of the council of Appenzel, opened his house to all the friends of truth. Bartholomew Berwegger, a famous captain, who had fought for Julius II. and for Leo X., having at this time returned from Rome, began forthwith to persecute the evangelical ministers. One day, however, remembering how much vice he had seen at Rome, he began to read the Bible, and to attend the sermons of the new preachers; his eyes were opened, and he embraced the Gospel. Seeing that the crowds could not be contained in the churches, he proposed that they should preach in the fields and the public squares, and, notwithstanding of keen opposition, the hills, meadows, and mountains of Appenzel, thenceforward often echoed with the glad tidings of salvation.

The reformed doctrine, ascending the Rhine, made its way as far as ancient Rhetia. One day a stranger from Zurich crossed the river, and waited on the saddle of Fläsch, the frontier village of the Grisons. Christian Anhorn, the saddler, listened in astonishment to the language of his visitor. "Preach," said the whole village to the stranger, who was called James Burkli. He accordingly took his station in front of the altar. A number of persons arrived, with Anhorn at their head, and stood round to defend him from a sudden attack while he preached the Gospel. The rumour of this preaching spread far and wide; and, on the following Sunday, an immense crowd assembled. Shortly after, a great proportion of the inhabitants of the district desired to have the Lord's Supper dispensed to them according to its original institution. But one day the tocsin suddenly sounded in Mayenfeld; the people ran in alarm; and the priests, after pointing out the danger which threatened the Church, hastened, at the head of the fanatical population, to Fläsch. Anhorn, who was working in the field, astonished at hearing the sound of bells at so unusual an hour, hastened home and concealed Burkli in a deep hole dug in his cellar. The house was by this time surrounded; the door was forced open, and the heretical preacher everywhere searched for in vain. At length the persecutors withdrew.

The Word of God spread over the extent of the ten jurisdictions. The curate of Mayenfeld, on returning from Rome, to which he had fled, infuriated at the success of the Gospel, exclaimed, "Rome has made me evangelical!" and became a zealous reformer. The Reformation soon extended to the league of "the house of God." "Oh!" exclaimed Salandronius to Vadian, "if you but saw how the inhabitants of the mountains of Rhetia cast far from them the yoke of the Babylonish captivity!"

Shocking disorders hastened the day when Zurich and the neighbouring districts were to shake off the yoke. A married schoolmaster, wishing to become a priest, obtained his wife's consent, and they separated. The new curate was unable to keep his vow of celibacy; but not to outrage his wife's feelings, quitted the place where she lived, and, having taken up his residence in the diocese of Constance, formed a licentious connection. His wife hastened to the place. The poor priest took compassion on her, and dismissing the person who had usurped her rights, took back his lawful spouse. The procurator-fiscal forthwith drew up a charge against him; the vicar-general began to move; the council of the consistory deliberated . . . and the curate was ordered to abandon his wife or his benefice. The poor wife left the house weeping bitterly, and her rival returned in triumph. The Church declared itself satisfied, and thenceforth let the adulterous priest alone.

Shortly after, a curate of Lucerne eloped with a married woman, and lived with her. The husband went to Lucerne, and taking advantage of the priest's absence, brought away his wife. While returning they were met by the seducer, who immediately attacked the injured husband, and gave him a wound of which he died. All good men felt the necessity of re-establishing the divine law, which declares marriage honourable in all. The evangelical ministers had taught that the law of celibacy was of merely human origin, imposed by Roman pontiffs in opposition to the Word of God, which, when describing a true bishop, represents him as a husband and father, (1 Tim. iii. 2 and 4.) They saw at the same time, that of all the abuses which had crept into the Church, none had caused more numerous vices and scandals. They considered it not only as a thing lawful, but as a duty in the sight of God to withdraw from its authority. Several of them, at this time, returned to the ancient practice of apostolic times. Nylotet was married. Zwingle also married at this period. No lady was more respected in Zurich than Anna Reinhard, widow of Meyer of Knonan, the mother of Gerold. From the arrival of Zwingle she had been one of his most attentive hearers: she lived in his neighbourhood, and he observed her piety, modesty, and fondness for her children. Young Gerold, who had become, as it were, his adopted son, brought him into closer connection with his mother. The trials already endured by this Christian woman, who was one day to be the most cruelly tried of all the women whose history is on record, had given her a gravity which made her evangelical virtues still more prominent. She was now about thirty-five years of age, and her own fortune amounted only to four hundred florins. It was on her that Zwingle, on looking out for a companion for life, turned his eye. He felt how sacred and intimate the conjugal union is. He termed it "a most holy alliance." "As Christ," said he, "died for His people, and gave himself to them entirely, so ought husband and wife to do, and suffer everything for each other." But Zwingle, when he took Anna Reinhard to wife, did not immediately publish his marriage. This was undoubtedly a culpable weakness in a man otherwise so resolute. The light which he and his friends had acquired on the subject of celibacy was not generally diffused. The weak might have been offended. He feared that his usefulness in the Church might be paralyzed if his marriage were made public. He sacrificed part of his happiness to these fears—fears to which, though respectable perhaps, he should have been superior.¹

MEANWHILE still higher interests occupied the friends of truth. The diet, as we have seen, urged by the enemies of the Reformation, had ordered the evangelical preachers to desist from preaching the doctrines which troubled the people. Zwingle felt that the moment for action had arrived, and with the energy which characterized him, called a meeting of the ministers of the Lord, the friends of the Gospel, at Einsidlen. The strength of Christians is neither in carnal weapons, nor the flames of martyrdom; it is in a simple, but unanimous and intrepid profession of these great truths to which the world must one day be subjugated. In particular, God calls upon those who serve Him to hold these heavenly doctrines prominently forth in presence of the whole people, without being dismayed by the clamour of adversaries. Those truths are able of themselves to secure their triumph, and as of old with the ark of God, idols cannot stand in their presence. The time had come when God willed that the great doctrine of salvation should be confessed in Switzerland. It was necessary that the Gospel standard should be planted on some eminence. Providence was going to draw humble, but intrepid men out of unknown retreats, that they might bear a striking testimony in presence of the nation.

¹ Biographers, most respectable historians, and all the authors who have copied them, place Zwingle's marriage two years later, viz. in April, 1524. Without going at length into the reasons which satisfy me that this is a mistake, I will merely indicate the most decisive proofs. A letter from Zwingle's friend, Myconius, 22nd July, 1522, says: "Vale cum uxore quam felicissime."—"All happiness to you and your wife!" Another letter from the same friend, written towards the close of this year, has the words, "Vale cum uxore." The contents of the letters prove that they are correctly dated. But what is still stronger, is a letter of Bucer, from Strasbourg, at the time when the marriage was made public, 14th April, 1524, (the date of the year is wanting, but it is clearly 1524.) This letter contains several passages which shew that Zwingle had been for some time married. The learned editors of the letters of Zwingle ask: "May not Zwingle have already been secretly married to Anna Reinhard?"—Zw. Ep., p. 210. This seems to me not a matter of doubt, but a well ascertained historical fact.

APPENZEL.

Towards the end of June and the beginning of July, 1522, pious ministers were seen proceeding in all directions towards the celebrated chapel of Einsiedeln on a new pilgrimage. From Art, in the canton of Schwitz, came its curate, Balthasar Trachsel; from Weiningen, near Baden, curate Stäheli; from Zug, Werner Steiner; from Lucerne, canon Kilchmeyer; from Uster, curate Pfister; from Hogg, near Zurich, curate Stumpf; from Zurich itself, canon Fabricius, chaplain Schmidt, the preacher of the hospital, Grossmann, and Zwingle. Leo Juda, curate of Einsiedeln, most cordially welcomed all these ministers of Jesus Christ to the ancient abbey. Since the time when Zwingle took up his residence in it, this place had been a citadel of truth, and a hotel of the just. In like manner had thirty-three bold patriots, resolved to break the yoke of Austria, met two hundred years before in the solitary plain of Grütli. The object of the meeting at Einsiedeln was to break the yoke of human authority in the things of God. Zwingle proposed to his friends to present earnest addresses to the cantons, and to the bishop, praying for the free preaching of the Gospel, and, at the same time, for the abolition of compulsory celibacy, the source of so many irregularities. The proposal was unanimously adopted. Ulrich had himself prepared the addresses. That to the bishop was first read. It was dated 2nd July, 1522, and signed by all the evangelists we have mentioned. The preachers of the truth in Switzerland were united in cordial affection. Many others, besides, sympathized with the party at Einsiedeln: such were Haller, Myconius, Hedio, Capito, Ecolampadius, Sebastian Meyer, Hoffmeister, and Vanner. This harmony is one of the finest traits in the Swiss Reformation. These excellent persons always acted as one man, and remained friends till death.

The men of Einsiedeln were aware that it was only by the power of faith that the members of the confederation, divided by foreign enlistments, could become one body. But their views were carried higher. "The celestial doctrine," said they to their ecclesiastical head, in the address of 2nd July, "that truth which God, the Creator, has manifested by His Son to the human race now plunged in evil, has been long veiled from our eyes by the ignorance, not to say the malice of certain men. But God Almighty has resolved to re-establish it in its primitive condition. Join yourself to those who demand that the multitude of the faithful return to their head, who is Christ. For our part, we have resolved to promulgate His Gospel with indefatigable perseverance, and at same time with such wisdom that none can complain. Favour this enterprise; astonishing, perhaps, but not rash. Be like Moses on the march at the head of the people coming out of Egypt; and overthrow the obstacles which oppose the triumphant progress of truth."

After this warm appeal the evangelists met at Einsiedeln came to celibacy. Zwingle had no longer any demand to make on this head for himself, having already one answering the description given by Paul of what a minister's wife ought to be—grave, sober, faithful in all things, (1 Tim. iii. 2.) But he thought of his brethren, whose consciences were not yet, like his, emancipated from human ordinances. He sighed, moreover, for the time when all the servants of God might live openly, and without fear, in the bosom of their own family, keeping their children, says the apostle, in subjection, with all gravity, (1 Tim. iii. 4.) "You are not ignorant," said the men of Einsiedeln, "that hitherto chastity has been deplorably violated by the priests. When, on the consecration of the servants of the Lord, he who speaks for all is asked: 'Are those whom you present righteous?'—he answers: 'They are righteous.' 'Are they learned?'—They are learned.' But when he is asked: 'Are they chaste?'—he answers: 'As far as human weakness permits.' Everything in the New Testament condemns licentiousness; everything in it sanctions marriage." Then follows the quotation of a great number of passages. "Wherefore," they continued, "we implore you by the love of Christ, by the liberty which He has purchased for us, by the misery of so many weak and wavering souls, by the wounds of so many plerated consciences, by everything human and Divine; . . . allow that which was rashly done to be wisely repealed, lest the majestic edifice of the Church fall with fearful uproar, and drag boundless ruin after it. See with what storms the world is threatened. If wisdom interpose not, it is all over with the priesthood."

The petition to the confederation was of greater length. The band of Einsiedeln, addressing the confederates, thus conclude: "Honoured Sirs,—We are all Swiss, and you are our fathers. There are some among us who have shewn themselves faithful in combat, in plague, and other calamities. It is in the name of true chastity that we speak to you. Who knows not that we could satisfy sensual appetite far better by not submitting to the laws of a legitimate union? But it is necessary to put an end to the scandals which afflict the Church of Christ. If the tyranny of the Roman pontiff would oppress us, fear nothing, brave heroes! The authority of the Word of God, the rights of Christian liberty, and the sovereign power of grace, guard around us. We have the same country, we have the same faith, we are Swiss, and the valour of our illustrious ancestors always manifested its power by an indomitable defence of those oppressed by injustice."

Thus in Einsidlen itself, in this old rampart of superstition, which is still, in our day, one of the most famous sanctuaries of Roman superstition, Zwingle and his friends boldly raised the standard of truth and freedom. They appealed to the heads of the State and the Church. They fixed their thrones, like Luther, both on the gate of the episcopal palace, and on that of the national council. The friends met at Einsidlen parted calm, joyful, full of hope in that God to whom they had committed their cause. Some passing near the battle-field of Morgarten, others over the chain of the Albis, and others again by different valleys or mountains, all returned to their posts. "There was truly something grand in these times," says Henry Bullinger, "in men thus daring to put themselves forward, rallying around the Gospel, and exposing themselves to all dangers. But God defended them so, that no evil reached them; for God preserves His people at all times." It was, indeed, something grand: it was a great step in the progress of the Reformation, one of the brightest days of religions revival in Switzerland. A holy confederation was formed at Einsidlen. Humble and courageous men had seized the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, and the shield of faith. The gauntlet was thrown down, and the challenge given, not by a single man, but by men of different cantons, ready to sacrifice their lives. It only remained to await the battle.

Everything announced that it was to be fierce. Five days after, (7th July,) the magistracy of Zurich, wishing to give some satisfaction to the Roman party, summoned before them Conrad Grebel and Claus Hottlinger, two of those extreme men who seemed desirous to go beyond the bounds of a wise Reformation. "We forbid you," said Burgomaster Roust, "to speak against the monks or on controverted points." At these words a loud noise was heard in the chamber, says an ancient chronicle. God was so manifestly in favour of the work, that people were everywhere anticipating signs of His interposition. All present looked around in astonishment, without being able to discover the cause of this mysterious circumstance.

But indignation was carried to its greatest height in convents. Every meeting held in them, whether for discipline or festivity, witnessed some new attack. One day, when a great festival was celebrated in the convent of Fraubrunn, the wine having got into the heads of the guests, they began to shoot the most envenomed arrows at the Gospel. What especially excited the rage of these priests and monks was the evangelical doctrine, that in the Christian Church there ought to be no sacerdotal caste above believers. Only one friend of the Reformation, a simple layman,—Macrin, schoolmaster at Soleure,—was present. He at first shunned the contest by changing his seat to another table. But at last, no longer able to endure the furious invectives of the guests, he stood up boldly, and exclaimed: "Yes, all true Christians are priests, and offer sacrifice according to the words of St. Peter, You are a royal priesthood." At these words one of the most intrepid bawlers, the Dean of Burgdorf, a tall, stout man, with a stentorian voice, uttered a loud laugh: "You little Greeks and school rats! You a royal priesthood! . . . Beautiful priesthood! . . . Mendicant kings! . . . priests without prebends and benefices!" And instantly all the priests and monks fell with one accord on the impudent laic.

But it was in Lucerne that the bold step of the men of Einsidlen was to produce the strongest sensation. The diet had met in this town, and complaints arrived from all quarters against the rash preachers who were preventing Helvetia from quietly selling the blood of her sons to the stranger. On the 22d July, as Oswald Myeonius was entertaining Canon Kilchmeyer, and several other friends of the Gospel, at dinner, a boy, sent by Zwingle, knocked at the door. He was the bearer of the two famous petitions from Einsidlen, and of a letter from Zwingle, which requested Oswald to circulate them in Lucerne. "My advice is, that the thing be done quietly, by degrees, rather than all at once; but, for the love of Christ, it is necessary to forsake everything, even wife."

Thus the crisis approached in Lucerne,—the shell had fallen, and could not but burst. The guests read the petitions. "May God bless this beginning," said Oswald, looking up to heaven; and then added: "This prayer must, from this moment, be the constant occupation of our hearts." The petitions were forthwith circulated, perhaps with more ardour than Zwingle had requested. But the moment was singular. Eleven individuals, the flower of the clergy, had placed themselves in the breach,—it was necessary to enlighten men's minds, to fix the irresolute, and gain over the most influential members of the diet.

Oswald, in the midst of this labour, did not forget his friend. The young messenger had told him of the attacks which Zwingle had to endure from the monks at Zurich. Writing him the same day, he says: "The truth of the Holy Spirit is invincible. Armed with the shield of the Holy Scriptures, you have remained conqueror, not in one combat only, nor in two, but in three, and the fourth is now commencing. . . . Seize those powerful weapons which are harder than diamond! Christ, in order to protect His people, has need only of His Word. Your struggles give indomitable courage to all who have devoted themselves to Jesus Christ."

At Lucerne the petitions did not produce the result anticipated. Some pious men approved of them, but these were few in number. Several, fearing to compromise themselves, were unwilling either to praise or blame. "These folks," said others, "will never bring this affair to a good end!" All the priests murmured, grumbled, and muttered between their teeth. As to the people, they were loud against the Gospel. A rage for war was awakened in Lucerne after the bloody defeat of Bicoque, and engrossed all thoughts. Oswald, who was an attentive observer of these different impressions, felt his courage shaken. The evangelical future which he had anticipated for Lucerne and Switzerland seemed to vanish. "Our people," said he, uttering a deep sigh, "are blind to the things of heaven. In regard to the glory of Christ there is no hope of the Swiss."

Wrath prevailed, especially in the council and the diet. The pope, France, England, and the empire, all around Switzerland, was in agitation after the defeat of Bicoque, and the evacuation of Lombardy by the French under Lautrec. Were not political interests at that moment complicated enough before these eleven men came with their petitions to mingle religious questions with them? The deputies of Zurich alone were favourably disposed to the Gospel. Canon Xylotect, afraid for his own life, and that of his wife,—he had married into one of the first families in the country,—had refused, with tears of regret, to repair to Einsidlen, and sign the addresses. Canon Kilmeyer had shewn greater courage. He, too, had everything to fear. "Condemnation threatens me," he writes to Zwingle, on the 13th August; "I await it without fear." . . . As he was writing these words, an officer of the council entered the room, and cited him to appear next day. "If they put me in irons," said he, continuing his letter, "I claim your help; but it will be easier to transport a rock from our Alps than to move me a finger's-breadth from the Word of Jesus Christ." The regard which was deemed due to his family, and the resolution which they had taken to let the storm fall upon Oswald, saved the canon.

Berthold Haller, probably because he was not a Swiss, had not signed the petitions. But full of courage, he, like Zwingle, expounded the Gospel according to Matthew. A vast crowd filled the cathedral of Berne. The Word of God operated more powerfully on the people than Manuel's dramas. Haller was summoned to the town-house; the people accompanied their good-natured pastor, and remained around the spot. The council was divided. "This concerns the bishop," said the leading men. "The preacher must be handed over to my lord of Lausanne." The friends of Haller trembled at these words, and told him to withdraw as quickly as possible. The people flocked round, and accompanied him to his house, where a great number of burghers remained in arms, prepared to make a rampart of their bodies in defence of their humble pastor. The bishop and council were overawed by this energetic demonstration, and Haller was saved. Haller was not the only combatant at Berne. Sebastian Meyer at this time refuted the pastoral letter of the Bishop of Constance, and, in particular, the formidable charge, "that the Gospellers teach a new doctrine; but that the old doctrine is the true." "To be wrong for two thousand years," said Meyer, "is not to be right for a single hour; otherwise the heathen ought to have adhered to their belief. If the most ancient doctrines must carry the day, fifteen hundred years are more than five hundred years, and the Gospel is more ancient than the ordinances of the pope."

At this period the magistrates of Friburg intercepted letters addressed to Haller and Meyer by a canon of Friburg, named John Hollard, a native of Orbe. They imprisoned, then deposed, and at last banished him. John Vannius, a chorister in the cathedral, shortly after embraced the evangelical doctrine; for in the Christian warfare one soldier no sooner falls than another takes his place. "How could the muddy water of the Tiber," said Vannius, "subsist beside the pure water which Luther has drawn from the spring of St. Paul." But the chorister's mouth was also closed. Myconius wrote to Zwingle: "Scarcely will you find in Switzerland men more averse to the Gospel than the Friburgers."

Lucerne ought to have been stated as an exception. This Myconius knew. He had not signed the famous petitions; but his friends had, if he had not, and a victim was required. The ancient literature of Greece and Rome began, thanks to him, to shed some light in Lucerne; numbers arrived from different quarters to attend the learned professor; and the friends of peace were charmed with sounds sweeter than those of halberds, swords, and cuirasses, which alone had hitherto resounded in the warlike city. Oswald had sacrificed everything for his country. He had quitted Zurich and Zwingle; he had lost his health; his wife was pining; his son was in childhood; if even Lucerne rejected him he could nowhere hope for an asylum. But no matter, factions have no pity, and the thing which ought to excite their compassion stimulates their rage. Herbenstein, burgomaster of Lucerne, an old and valiant warrior who had gained a distinguished name in the wars of Swabia and Burgundy, followed up the deposition of the teacher, and wished to banish from the canton, with himself, his Greek, his Latin, and his Gospel. He succeeded. On coming out of the Council, after the sedentary at which Myconius had been deposed, Herbenstein met the Zurich deputy, Berguer. "We are sending you back your schoolmaster," said he to him, ironically; "get a good lodging for him." "We wont let him sleep in the open air," immediately replied the courageous deputy. But Berguer promised more than he could perform.

The news given by the burgomaster were but too true, and were soon intimated to the unhappy Myconius. He is deposed and banished; and the only crime laid to his charge, is that of being a disciple of Luther. He looks all around, but nowhere finds a shelter. He sees his wife, his son, and himself, all three feeble and sickly, exiled from their country; and Switzerland, all around, agitated by a whirlwind which breaks and destroys everything that stands in its way. "Here," said he, then, to Zwingle, "is poor Myconius banished by the Council of Lucerne. . . . Whither shall I go? I know not. . . . Assailed yourself by these furious storms, how could you shelter me? I cry, then, in my distress to that God who is the first in whom I hope, who is ever bountiful, ever kind, and who never calls upon any to seek His face in vain. May He supply my wants!"

Thus spoke Oswald; and he was not obliged to wait long for a word of consolation. There was one in Switzerland inured to the battles of the faith. Zwingle drew near to his friend, and comforting him, thus expressed himself; "The blows by which men attempt to overthrow the house of God are so violent, and the assaults which they make upon it so frequent, that not only do the wind and rain beat upon it, as our Saviour predicted, (Matt. vii. 27,) but the hail and the thunder.

Had I not perceived the Lord guiding the ship, I should, long ere now, have cast the helm into the sea; but I see Him amid the tempest, strengthening the tackling, arranging the yards, stretching the sails,—what do I say?—commanding the very winds. . . . Should I not, then, be a coward, unworthy of the name of a man, if I abandoned my post and fled to a shameful death? I confide entirely in His sovereign goodness. Let Him govern, transport, hasten, retard, precipitate, arrest, break down, let Him even plunge us to the bottom of the abyss, we fear nothing. We are vessels which belong to Him. He can use us as He pleases, for honour or disgrace." After words thus full of faith, Zwingle continues: "As to your case, this is my opinion. Present yourself before the council, and there deliver an address worthy of Christ and of yourself,—that is to say, proper to touch and not to irritate men's hearts. Deny that you are a disciple of Luther, declare that you are a disciple of Jesus Christ. Let your pupils surround you, and let them speak; and if all this does not succeed, come to your friend, come to Zwingle, and consider our home as your own fireside."

Oswald, strengthened by these words, followed the noble counsel of the reformer; but all his efforts were useless. The witness to the truth behoved to quit his country. His enemies in Lucerne were so loud against him, that the magistrates would not allow any one to give him an asylum. Broken-hearted at the sight of so much enmity, the confessor of Jesus Christ exclaimed: "All that now remains for me is to beg from door to door, to sustain my miserable life." Shortly after, the friend and most powerful assistant of Zwingle, the first man in Switzerland who had united literary instruction with the love of the Gospel, the reformer of Lucerne, and, at a later period, one of the leaders of the Helvetic church, was obliged, with his sickly wife and little boy, to quit this ungrateful city, where, out of all his family, the only one who had received the Gospel was a sister. He crosses its ancient bridges, and bade adieu to those mountains which seem to rise from the bosom of the Lake of Waldstetten up to the clouds. Canons Xyloctet and Kilchmeyer, the only friends whom the Reformation yet numbered among his countrymen, followed shortly after. And at the moment when this poor man, with two feeble companions, whose existence depended on him, with his eye turned towards its lake, and shedding tears for his deluded country, took leave of those sublime scenes which had surrounded his cradle, the Gospel itself took leave of Lucerne, and Rome reigns in it to this day.

Shortly after the diet itself, which was assembled at Baden, stung by the petitions of Einsiden, (which, being printed, produced a great sensation,) and urged by the Bishop of Constance to strike a blow at innovations, had recourse to measures of persecution, ordered the authorities of the villages to bring before it all priests and laymen who should speak against the faith, seized, in its impatience, on the evangelist who happened to be nearest at hand, Urban Weiss, pastor of Filispach, who had been previously released on caution, made him be brought to Constance, and then gave him up to the bishop, by whom he was long kept in prison. "Thus," says the chronicle of Bullinger, "the persecution of the Gospel by the confederates commenced, and that at the instigation of the clergy, who have at all times delivered Jesus Christ to Herod and Pilate."

Zwingle was not to escape his share of trial. Blows to which he was most sensible were then struck at him. The rumour of his doctrines and his contests had passed Santis, penetrated the Toekenburg, and reached the heights of Wildhaus. The pastoral family from whom the reformer had sprung were moved. Of the four brothers of Zwingle, some had continued peacefully to occupy themselves with their mountain toils; whilst others, to the great grief of their brother, had quitted their flocks and served foreign princes. All were alarmed at the news which rumour brought as far as their chalets. They already saw their brother seized, dragged perhaps to Constance to his bishop, and a pile erected for him at the same place which had consumed the body of John Huss. These proud shepherds could not bear the idea of being called the brother of a heretic. They wrote to Ulrich, describing their sorrow and their fears. Zwingle replied: "So long as God permits, I will perform the task which He has entrusted to me, without fearing the world and its proud tyrants. I know the worst that can happen to me. There is no danger, no misfortune, which I have not long carefully weighed. My own strength is mere nothingness, and I know the power of my enemies; but I know also that I can do everything through Christ strengthening me. Were I silent, some other would be constrained to do what God now does by me, and I would be punished by God. Cast far from you all your anxiety, my dear brothers. If I have a fear, it is that I have been gentler and more easily persuaded than is suitable for this age. What shame, you say, will be cast on all our family if you are burnt, or put to death in some other way! O dearly beloved brethren! the Gospel derives from the blood of Christ this wondrous nature, that the most violent persecutions, far from arresting, only hasten its progress. Those only are true soldiers of Christ who fear not to bear in their body the wounds of their Master. All my labours have no other end than to make men know the treasures of happiness which Christ has acquired for us, in order that all may flee to the Father through the death of His Son. If His doctrine offends you, your anger cannot stop me. You are my brothers,—yes, my own brothers,—the sons of my father, and the offspring of the same mother; . . . but if you were not my brethren in Christ, and in the work of faith, my grief would be so extreme that nothing could equal it. Adieu. I will never cease to be your true brother, provided you do not yourselves cease to be the brethren of Jesus Christ."

The confederates seemed to rise against the Gospel as one man. The petitions of Einsiden had been the signal. Zwingle, concerned for the lot of his dear Myconius, saw in this misfortune only the beginning of calamity. Enemies in Zurich, enenies abroad,—a man's own relatives becoming his enemies,—a furious opposition on the part of monks and priests,—violent measures of the diet and the councils,—rude, perhaps bloody, assaults on the part of the partisans of foreign service,—the highest valleys of Switzerland, the cradle of the confederation, sending forth phalanxes of invincible soldiers to save Rome, and, at the sacrifice of life, annihilating the growing faith of the sons of the Reformation,—such was the prospect at which the penetrating mind of the reformer shuddered when he beheld it in the distance. What a prospect! Was not the work, scarcely well begun, on the point of being destroyed? Zwingle, thoughtful and agitated, spread all his anguish before his God. “O Jesus!” said he, upon thee, as thou hast begun, so to finish. If in anything I have built up improperly, beat it down with thy mighty hand. If I have laid some other foundation beside thine, let thy powerful arm overthrow it. O most beloved vine, of which the Father is the vine-dresser, and of which we are the branches, forsake not thy offspring. For thou hast promised to be with us, even to the end of the world!”

FRIBURG CATHEDRAL.

It was on the 22nd of August, 1522, that Ulrich Zwingle, the reformer of Switzerland, when he saw violent storms descending from the mountains on the frail barque of faith, thus expressed the troubles and hopes of his soul in the presence of his God.

FIRST REFORMS.—1521-1522.

CHAPTER I.

Progress of the Reformation—New Period—Advantages of Luther's Captivity—Agitation of Germany—Melancthon and Luther—Enthusiasm.

FOUR years had elapsed since an ancient doctrine had again been preached in the Church. The great doctrine of salvation by grace, formerly published in Asia, Greece, and Italy, by Paul and his brethren; and again, after several centuries, discovered in the Bible by a monk of Wittemberg, had echoed from the plains of Saxony to Rome, Paris, and London; and the lofty mountains of Switzerland had repeated its energetic accents. The fountains of truth, liberty, and life, had been again opened to humanity. Crowds had repaired thither and quaffed with joy; but those who had pressed forward and taken the draught, had preserved their former appearance. All within was new, and yet all without seemed to have remained as before.

The constitution of the Church, its ritual, and discipline, had not undergone any change. In Saxony, at Wittemberg even, in every place where the new ideas had penetrated, the papal worship gravely continued its pomp; the priest at the foot of the altar, in offering the host to God, seemed to produce an ineffable transformation; monks and nuns entered convents to undertake obligations that were to bind them for ever; pastors lived not as heads of families; brotherhoods assembled; pilgrimages were performed; the faithful hung up their votive offerings on the pillars of chapels; and all ceremonies, even to the most insignificant formality of the sanctuary, were celebrated as before. There was a new doctrine in the world, but it had not given itself a new body. The language of the priest formed a striking contrast to the proceedings of the priest. He was heard thundering from the pulpit against the mass, as an idolatrous worship; and then seen descending and taking his place before the altar, to celebrate this pompous ceremony with scrupulous exactness. Everywhere the new Gospel resounded beside the ancient ritual. The priest himself did not perceive the strange inconsistency; and the people who listened with acclamation to the bold discourses of the new preachers, devoutly observed their ancient customs as if they were never to abandon them. At the domestic hearth and in social life, as in the house of God, everything remained the same. There was a new faith in the world, but not new works. The season of spring had appeared, but winter seemed still to hold nature in chains; no flowers—no leaves—nothing external gave indication of the new season. But these appearances were illusory; a potent, though hidden sap was already circulating beneath, and on the eve of changing the world.

To this course—a course fraught with wisdom—the Reformation perhaps owes its triumphs. Prior to the actual accomplishment of any revolution, there must be a revolution in thought. The inconsistency already alluded to did not even strike Luther at the first glance. He seemed to consider it quite natural that, while men were receiving his writings with enthusiasm, they should at the same time remain devotedly attached to the abuses which these writings attacked. It might even be thought that he had traced out his plan beforehand, and resolved to produce a change of minds before introducing a change of forms. This, however, were to ascribe to him a wisdom, the honour of which belongs to a higher source. He executed a plan which was not of his own devising. These matters he was able, at a later period, to acknowledge and comprehend; but he had not imagined them, and accordingly had not regulated them. God took the lead; Luther's part was to follow.

Had Luther begun with an external reform: had he, immediately after he had spoken, attempted to abolish monastic vows, the mass, confession, and the existing forms of worship, he should undoubtedly have encountered the keenest opposition. Man must have time before he can adapt himself to great revolutions. Luther was by no means the violent, imprudent, rash innovator, that some historians have represented.¹ The people, seeing nothing changed in the routine of their devotions, committed themselves without distrust to their new leader. They were even astonished at the attacks directed against a man who left them their mass, beads, and confessor; and attributed these attacks to the grovelling jealousy of obscure rivals, or the cruel injustice of powerful adversaries. Meanwhile Luther's ideas aroused the minds of men, improved their hearts, and so undermined the ancient edifice, that it soon fell of its own accord, without any human hand. Idens do not act instantaneously; they make their way in silence, like water which, filtering behind rocks, detaches them from the mountain on which they rest; all at once the work done in secret manifests itself; and a single day suffices to display the work of several years, perhaps several ages.

A new era in the Reformation commences. The truth is already re-established in doctrine, and doctrine is now going to re-establish the truth in all the forms of the Church and of society. The agitation is too great for men's minds to remain fixed and immovable at the point at which they have arrived. On those dogmas which have been so powerfully shaken, depend customs which are beginning to give way, and which must disappear along with them. There is too much courage and life in the new generation to feel under constraint in the presence of error Sacraments, ritual, hierarchy, vows, constitution, domestic life, public life, all are about to be modified. The ship which has been slowly and laboriously built, is about to leave the dock, and be launched on the vast ocean. We shall have to follow its track across numerous perils.

The captivity of the Wartburg separates these two periods. Providence, which designed to give a mighty impulse to the Reformation, had prepared its progress by leading him who was selected to be the instrument of it into profound retirement. For a time the work seemed buried with the workman; but the seed must be deposited in the earth in order to produce fruit; and from the prison which seemed destined to be the reformer's tomb, the Reformation is going to come forth to make new conquests, and rapidly diffuse itself over the whole world.

Hitherto the Reformation had been concentrated in the person of the reformer. His appearance before the Diet of Worms was, undoubtedly, the sublimest moment of his life. His character then appeared almost exempt from blemish; and hence it has been said, that if God, who hid the reformer during ten months within the walls of the Wartburg, had, at that moment, withdrawn him for ever from the eye of the world, his end would have been a kind of apotheosis. But God wills not an apotheosis for His servants; and Luther was preserved to the Church, in order that he might shew by his very faults that the faith of Christians must be founded on the Word of God alone. He was abruptly transported far from the scene where the great revolution of the sixteenth century was in course of accomplishment; the truth which he had for four years so powerfully preached continued, in his absence, to act upon Christendom; and the work, of which he was only a feeble instrument, thenceforth bore not the impress of a man, but the seal of God himself.

Germany was moved by the captivity of Luther. The most contradictory reports circulated throughout her provinces. Men's minds were more agitated by the absence of the reformer than they would have been by his presence. Here it was affirmed that friends, who had come from France, had set him in safety on the other bank of the Rhine. There it was said that assassins had put him to death. Even the smallest villages were anxious for information about Luther; the passing traveller was interrogated, and groups assembled in the market-place. Sometimes an unknown orator gave the people an animated narrative of the manner in which the doctor had been carried off; he shewed the barbarous horsemen binding fast the hands of their prisoner, hastening at full speed, dragging him on foot behind them, wearing out his strength, shutting their ears to his cries, causing the blood to spring from his fingers. "The dead body of Luther," added he, "has been seen pierced with wounds." Then cries of grief were heard. "Ah!" said the multitude, "no more shall we see, no more shall we hear, the noble-minded man whose voice stirred our hearts." The friends of Luther, muttering wrath, swore to avenge his death. Women and children, the lovers of peace, and the aged, looked forward with alarm to new struggles. Nothing could equal the terror of the partisans of Rome. The priests and monks, thinking themselves sure of victory, because one man was dead, at first had been unable to conceal their joy, and had raised their heads with an insulting air of triumph; but now they would gladly have fled far away from the wrath and threats of the people. These men who, while Luther was at liberty, had given free vent to their fury, trembled now that he was captive. Aleander especially was in consternation. "The only means of safety now left us," wrote a Roman Catholic to the Archbishop of Mentz, "is to kindle torches and make a search for Luther over the whole world, in order to restore him to the wishes of the nation." It might have been said that the reformer's ghost, all pale, and clanking its chains, had appeared to spread terror and demand vengeance. The general exclamation was: "Luther's death will cause torrents of blood to flow!"

Nowhere were the minds of men more deeply agitated than at Worms itself; energetic measures were proposed both among people and princes. Ulrich von Hütten and Hermann Busch filled the country with their plaintive songs and warlike cries. Charles V. and the nuncios were loudly accused. The nation took up the cause of the poor monk, who, by the power of his faith, had become its chief.

At Wittemberg his colleagues and friends, Melancthon especially, were at first astounded with grief. Luther had imparted to this young scholar the treasures of that sacred theology which had thenceforth completely filled his soul. It was Luther who had given substance and life to the purely intellectual culture which Melancthon had brought to Wittemberg. The profundity of the reformer's doctrine had struck the young Hellenist, and his courage in maintaining the rights of the eternal Word against all human authority had filled him with enthusiasm. He had been associated with him in his work; he had seized the pen, and in that admirable style which he had derived from the study of antiquity, had successfully, and with a powerful hand, lowered the authority of the Fathers and the authority of councils before the sovereign Word of God.

The decision which Luther had in action Melancthon had in science. Never were more diversity and more unity exhibited in two individuals. "Scripture," said Melancthon, "imparts to the soul a holy and marvellous delight. It is a heavenly ambrosia." "The Word of God," exclaimed Luther, "is a sword, a war, a destruction; it springs upon the children of Ephraim like the lioness in the forest." Thus, in Scripture, the one saw a power of consolation, and the other an energetic opposition to the corruption of the world. Both held it to be the greatest thing on earth, and hence they understood each other perfectly. "Melancthon," said Luther, "is a miracle—all now acknowledge this. He is the most formidable enemy of Satan and the schoolmen, for he knows their folly, and the Rock which is Christ. This little Greek surpasses me even in theology; he will be as useful to you as many Luthers." And he added, that he was ready to abandon an opinion if Philip did not approve of it. Melancthon, on his part, full of admiration for the knowledge which Luther had of Scripture, placed him far above the Fathers of the Church. He had a wish to excuse the pleasantries for which Luther was sometimes upbraided, and compared him to a vessel of clay containing precious treasure under a coarse covering. "I will take good care not to blame him for them inconsiderately," said he.

But these two souls, so intimately united, are now separated. These two valiant soldiers can no longer march together for the deliverance of the Church. Luther has disappeared, and is, perhaps, lost for ever. The consternation of Wittenberg was extreme; it might have been likened to an army standing, with sullen and downcast look, over the bloody remains of the general who was leading them on to victory.

Suddenly intelligence the most gratifying was received. "Our dearly beloved father lives!" exclaimed Melancthon in the joy of his heart; "take courage and be strong." But grief soon resumed the ascendancy. Luther was alive, but in prison. The edict of Worms, with its cruel prescriptions, had been circulated by thousands throughout the empire, and even in the mountains of the Tyrol. Could the Reformation avoid being crushed by the iron hand which lay upon it? Melancthon's gentle spirit sank within him while he uttered a cry of grief.

But above the hand of man a more powerful hand was at work,—God himself deprived the formidable edict of its force. The German princes, who had always sought to humble the power of Rome in the empire, trembled on seeing the alliance of the emperor with the pope, and feared lest it should result in the destruction of all their liberties. Accordingly, though Charles, on his passage through the Low Countries, smiled ironically as he saluted the flames which some flatterers and fanatics were kindling in the public places with the writings of Luther, these writings were read in Germany with constantly increasing avidity; and every day new pamphlets appeared to support the Reformation, and make new assaults on the papacy. The nuncios were disconcerted out of measure on seeing that the edict, which had cost them so much injustice, produced so little effect. "The ink of the emperor's signature," said some with bitterness, "was scarcely dry before the decree itself was everywhere torn in pieces." . . . The people become more and more attached to the wondrous man who, unawed by the thunders of Charles and the pope, had confessed his faith with the courage of a martyr. "He offered to retract," observed others, "if he was refuted; but none ventured to undertake the refutation. Is not this a proof that what he teaches is true?" Accordingly, at Wittenberg and throughout the empire, the first movement of alarm was succeeded by a movement of enthusiasm. Even the Archbishop of Mentz, seeing how strongly the sympathy of the people was expressed, did not venture to give permission to the Cordeliers to preach against the reformer. The university, which seemed on the eve of destruction, raised its head. There the new doctrines were too well established to be shaken by Luther's absence. In a short time the academic halls could scarcely contain the crowds of hearers.

CHAPTER II.

Luther in the Wartburg—Object of his Captivity—Agonies—Sickness—Labour of Luther—On Confession—To Latomus—Walks.

MEANWHILE Knight George (this was Luther's name in the Wartburg) lived solitary and unknown. "If you saw me," wrote he to Melancthon, "you would take me for a knight, and would scarcely be able to recognize me." Luther at first took some repose, enjoying a leisure which he had never tasted till this time. He moved freely within the fortress, but could not go beyond its walls. All his wants were supplied, and he had never been better treated. Many thoughts filled his soul, but none could trouble him. He cast his eyes alternately to the surrounding forests, and raised them towards heaven: "A singular captive!" exclaimed he, "captive both with and against my will."

Writing to Spalatin, he says: "Pray for me; your prayers are the only thing I want. I give myself no concern with all that is said and done with regard to me in the world. At length I am at rest." . . . This letter, as well as several others of the same period, is dated from the isle of Patmos. Luther compared the Wartburg to the celebrated island to which the anger of the Emperor Domitian banished the Apostle John.

The reformer reposed, amid the dark forests of Thuringia, from the violent struggles which had agitated his soul. Here he studied Christian truth, not for disputation, but as a means of regeneration and life. The commencement of the Reformation behaved to be polemical; new times demanded new exertions. After rooting up the thorns and brambles, it was necessary to sow the seed peacefully in men's hearts. Had Luther been obliged incessantly to fight new battles, he could not have accomplished a lasting work in the Church. By his captivity he escaped a danger which might perhaps have destroyed the Reformation,—that of always attacking and destroying, without ever defending and building up.

This humble retreat produced a result still more precious. Raised, as it were, upon a pedestal by his countrymen, he was within a step of the abyss; and a moment of giddiness might have sufficed to throw him headlong into it. Some of the first agents in the Reformation in Germany and Switzerland were dashed to pieces against the rock of spiritual pride and fanaticism. Luther was a man very subject to the infirmities of our nature, and he did not entirely escape these dangers. Still the hand of God delivered him from them for a time, by suddenly withdrawing him from intoxicating triumphs, and consigning him to the depth of an unknown retreat. His soul there communed with itself near to God; it was there bathed in the waters of adversity; his sufferings, his humiliations, constrained him, at least for a time, to walk with the humble; and the principles of the Christian life thenceforth were developed in his soul with new energy and freedom.

Luther's quiet was not of long duration. Seated on the walls of the Wartburg, he spent whole days absorbed in profound meditation. Sometimes the Church presented herself to his mind, and displayed all her miseries before him. At other times, turning his eye upwards with hope towards heaven, he exclaimed: How, O Lord, couldst thou have made all men in vain? (Ps. lxxxix. 48.) At other times, again abandoning this hope, he was downcast, and exclaimed: "Alas, there is no one, in the last day of His wrath, who can stand as a wall before the Lord to save Israel!" . . .

Then returning to his own destiny, he feared lest he should be accused of having abandoned the field of battle; and the idea afflicted his soul. "I would far rather," said he, "be laid on burning coals, than stagnate here half-dead."

Next, transporting himself in imagination to Worms and Wittenberg to the midst of his enemies, he regretted that he had yielded to the counsels of his friends, instead of remaining in the world, and offering his breast to the fury of men. "Ah!" said he, "there is nothing I desire more than to present myself before my cruel enemies."

Still some sweet thought arose, and gave a truce to these agonies. All was not torment to Luther; from time to time his agitated spirit found some degree of calmness and consolation. After the assurance of Divine aid, his greatest solace in his grief was the remembrance of Melancthon. "If I perish," wrote he to him, "the Gospel will lose nothing; you will succeed me as Elisha did, with a double measure of my spirit." But calling to mind Philip's timidity, he cried to him aloud: "Minister of the Word! guard the walls and towers of Jerusalem until the adversary strike you. We are still standing alone on the field of battle: after me they will next assail you."

The thought of this last attack which Rome was going to make on the rising Church, threw him into new anxiety. The poor monk, a solitary prisoner, had violent wrestling with himself. But suddenly he obtained a glimpse of his deliverance. It occurred to him that the attacks of the papacy would arouse the nations of Germany, and that the soldiers of the Gospel, proving victorious, would surround the Wartburg, and give liberty to the prisoner. "If the pope," said he, "lays hands on all who are for me, there will be a commotion in Germany; the more haste he makes to crush us, the more speedy will be the end both of him and his. And I . . . will be restored to you. God is awakening many minds, and stirring up the nations. Let our enemies only seize our cause in their arms, and try to strangle it; it will grow under their grasp, and come forth ten times more formidable."

But sickness brought him down from those heights to which his courage and his faith had elevated him. He had already suffered much at Worms; and his illness increased in solitude. He could not digest the food of the Wartburg, which was somewhat less homely than that of his convent: it was necessary to return to the poor fare to which he had been accustomed. He passed whole nights without sleep. Anguish of mind was added to bodily suffering. No work is accomplished without pain and self-denial. Luther, alone upon his rock, endured in his powerful nature a passion which the emancipation of humanity rendered necessary. "Seated at night in my chamber," says he, "I sent forth cries like a woman in travail—torn, wounded, and bleeding." Then, interrupting his complaints, and impressed with the thought that his sufferings were benefits from God, he gratefully exclaims: "Thanks be rendered unto thee, O Christ, in that thou hast been pleased not to leave me without the precious relics of thy holy cross!" He soon becomes indignant at himself, and exclaims: "Infatuated, hardened creature that I am! How grievous! I pray little, I wrestle little with the Lord, I do not groan for the Church of God. Instead of being fervent in spirit, my passions only are inflamed; I remain in sloth, sleep, and indolence." Then, not knowing to what this state should be ascribed, and accustomed to expect everything from the affection of his brethren, he exclaims, in the desolation of his soul: "O my friends! is it because you forget to pray for me that God is thus estranged from me?"

Those about him, as well as his friends at Wittenberg and in the elector's court, were uneasy and alarmed at this state of suffering. They trembled to think, that a life snatched from the scaffold of the pope and the sword of Charles V. should sadly wane and vanish away. Can the Wartburg be destined to be the tomb of Luther? "I fear," said Melancthon, "that the grief which he feels for the Church will be his death. A torch has been kindled by him in Israel: if it is extinguished, what hope will be left us? Would to God I were able, at the cost of my miserable life, to detain in the world one who is its brightest ornament." "Oh! what a man!" he exclaims, as if he were on the borders of the tomb; "we have not duly appreciated him."

What Luther called the unbecoming indolence of his prison, was labour almost above man's utmost strength. "I am here every day," said he, (14th May,) "in idleness and luxury, (referring, doubtless, to his fare, which at first was not quite so coarse as he had been accustomed to.) I read the Bible in Hebrew and Greek; I am going to write a discourse in German on auricular confession; I will continue the translation of the Psalms, and compose a collection of sermons as soon as I get from Wittenberg what I require. I write without intermission;" and yet these were only a part of Luther's labours.

His enemies thought that if he was not dead, at all events his voice would not again be heard; but their joy was of short duration, and the world was not left long in doubt whether he were alive. A multitude of writings, composed in the Wartburg, appeared in rapid succession, and the cherished voice of the reformer was everywhere received with enthusiasm. Luther published at once works fitted to edify the Church, and polemical treatises which interrupted the too hasty joy of his enemies. For nearly a year he instructed, exhorted, rebuked, and thundered from his mountain-top; and his adversaries, confounded, asked whether there were not some supernatural mystery in this prodigious activity. "He could not rest," says Cochleus.

The only mystery was, the imprudence of the partisans of Rome. They hastened to avail themselves of the edict of Worms to give a mortal blow to the Reformation; while Luther, condemned, placed under the ban of the empire, and shut up in the Wartburg, stood forth to defend sound doctrine, as if he had been still free and victorious. It was in the confessional especially that the priests strove to rivet the chains of their deluded parishioners; and accordingly confession was the object of Luther's first attack. "They found," says he, "on the words of St. James: Confess your sins one to another. Singular confession! He says, one to another; whence it should follow, that confessors ought also to confess to their penitents; that every Christian should, in his turn, be pope, bishop, priest; and that the pope himself should confess to all."

Scarcely had Luther finished this small work than he began another. Latomus, a theologian of Louvain, already celebrated for his opposition to Rencelin and Erasmus, had attacked the views of the reformer. In twelve days Luther's refutation was ready, and it is one of his masterpiece. He vindicates himself from the charge of wanting moderation. "The moderation of the age," says he, "is to bend the knee before sacrilegious pontiffs, impious sophists, and address them as gracious lord! excellent master! Then, when you have done so, you may put to death whomsoever you please; overturn the world, nay, you will still be a moderate man. Far from me be this moderation. I like better to be frank and deceive nobody. The shell, perhaps, is hard, but the kernel is sweet and tender."

Luther's health continuing to decline, he thought of quitting the Wartburg. But how was he to do it? To appear in public was to risk his life. The back of the mountain, on which the fortress stood, was traversed by numerous paths, the sides of which were bordered with tufts of strawberries. The massy gate of the castle was opened, and the prisoner ventured, not without fear, stealthily to gather some of the fruit. He became bolder by degrees, and began to survey the surrounding country in his knight's dress, and attended by a guard of the castle, a blunt but trustworthy man.

One day having entered an inn, he threw aside his sword, which encumbered him, and ran towards some book which happened to be lying. Nature was stronger than prudence. His attendant trembled, fearing that a proceeding so unusual in a warrior would be regarded as a proof that the doctor was not a true knight. On another occasion the two warriors descended into the convent of Reinhardtsbrunn, where Luther had slept a few months before, on his way to Worms. Suddenly a friar allowed a sign of surprise to escape from him. Luther is recognised. His attendant perceives it, and, dragging him off in all haste, they gallop away far from the convent, before the poor friar has time to recover from his astonishment.

The chivalric life of the doctor occasionally partook strongly of the theological. One day the nets are prepared, the gates of the fortress are thrown open, and the dogs, with long flapping ears, rush forth. Luther had wished to taste the pleasures of the chase. The hunters soon became animated, the dogs dart along, and drive the brown hares among the brushwood. In the midst of the turmoil the Chevalier George, standing motionless, had his mind filled with serious thoughts; at the sight of the objects around him his heart is bursting with grief. "Is it not," said he, "an image of the devil who arouses his dogs,—in other words, the bishops, those messengers of Antichrist,—and hounds them on in pursuit of poor souls?" A young hare had just been caught, and Luther, happy to save it, wraps it carefully in his cloak, and places it under a bush. Before he proceeds many steps the dogs scent out the poor creature and kill it. Luther, attracted by the noise, utters a cry of grief: "O pope!" says he; "and thou, Satan! it is thus you strive to destroy even those souls which have been already saved from death!"

CHAPTER III.

The Reformation Begins—Marriage of Feldkirchen—Marriage of Monks—Theses—Writes against Monachism—Luther Causes to be a Monk.

WHILE the doctor of Wittenberg, dead to the world, was relaxing himself by these sports in the environs of the Wartburg, the work was advancing as of itself; the Reformation had commenced. No longer confining itself to doctrine, it energetically advanced into act. Bernard Feldkirchen, pastor of Kemberg, who, under the direction of Luther, had first attacked the errors of Rome, was also the first to throw off the yoke of her institutious. He married.

ENTRANCE HALL, WARTBURG.

The German character delights in domestic life and the joys of home; accordingly, of all the ordinances of the papacy, that of forced celibacy had produced the worst consequences. The imposition of this law on the heads of the clergy had prevented the fiefs of the Church from becoming hereditary. But when extended by Gregory VII. to the lower clergy, it had led to deplorable results. Many priests had evaded the obligations imposed on them by shameful irregularities, and brought hatred and contempt on their order; while those who had submitted to Hildebrand's law felt inwardly indignant against the Church, because at the same time that it gave its high dignitaries so much power, wealth, and worldly enjoyment, it forced humble ministers, who were, however, its most useful supports, to sacrifices altogether contrary to the Gospel.

"Neither popes nor councils," said Feldkirchen and another pastor named Seidler, who followed his example, "can impose on the Church an ordinance which endangers soul and body. The obligation to maintain the law of God constrains us to violate the traditions of men." The re-establishment of marriage in the sixteenth century was an act of homage to the moral law. The ecclesiastical authority, taking alarm, immediately launched its decrees against the two priests. Seidler, who was in the territories of Duke George, was given up to his superiors, and died in prison. But the Elector Frederick refused to give up Feldkirchen to the Archbishop of Magdebourg. "His highness," said Spalatin, "has no wish to act as a police officer." Feldkirchen, therefore, though he had become a husband and a father, continued pastor of his flock.

The first emotion of the reformer on learning these things was to give expression to his joy. "I admire this new husband of Kenberg, who fears nothing, and hastens into the midst of the tumult." Luther was convinced that priests ought to marry. But this question led to another—the marriage of monks; and here Luther had to maintain one of those internal combats of which his whole life was composed; for every reformation must be effected by an intellectual struggle. Melancthon and Carlstadt, the one a layman and the other a priest, thought that the liberty of entering into the bonds of marriage ought to belong to monks as well as to priests. Luther, a monk, did not think so at first. One day the governor of the Wartburg having brought him some theses of Carlstadt on celibacy: "Good God!" exclaimed he, "will our Wittenbergers give wives to monks even?" . . . The idea astonished and confounded him; his mind was troubled. The liberty which he claimed for others, he rejected for himself. "Ah!" exclaimed he with indignation, "at all events they will not force me to take a wife." This saying is, doubtless, unknown to those who pretend that Luther effected the Reformation in order that he might be able to marry. Seeking the truth honestly, not through passion, he defended whatever presented itself to him as true, though it might be contrary to his system as a whole. He moved in a mixture of truth and error, waiting the time when all error would fall and truth alone remain.

There was, in fact, a great difference between the two questions. The marriage of the priests did not put an end to the priesthood; on the contrary, it alone could restore the secular clergy to the respect of the people; but the marriage of monks was the destruction of monachism. The question, then, was to determine whether it was necessary to break up and disband the mighty army which the popes held under their command? "The priests," wrote Luther to Melancthon, "are appointed of God, and consequently are free in regard to human commandments. But the monks have voluntarily chosen celibacy, and therefore are not free to withdraw themselves from the yoke of their own choice."

The reformer behaved to advance and carry this new position of the adversary by means of a new struggle. He had already put under his feet many abuses of Rome and Rome itself; but monachism was still standing. Monachism, which of old carried life into so many deserts, and which, after traversing many centuries, now filled so many cloisters with indolence, and often with luxury, seemed to have personified itself and come to defend its rights in the castle of Thuringia, where was to be decided, in the conscience of a single man, the question of its life or its death. Luther wrestled with it. Sometimes he was on the point of overcoming it, and sometimes he was on the point of being overcome. At length, unable any longer to maintain the combat, he prostrated himself in prayer at the feet of Jesus Christ, and exclaimed: "Instruct us! deliver us! In thy mercy establish us in the liberty which belongs to us, for certainly we are thy people."

He had not to wait for deliverance: an important revolution was produced in the reformer's mind; and it was again the doctrine of justification by faith that gave him the victory. This weapon, before which had fallen, in the mind of Luther and of Christendom, indulgences, the discipline of Rome, and the pope himself, also effected the downfall of the monks. Luther saw that monachism and the doctrine of salvation by grace were in flagrant opposition, and that monastic life was founded entirely on the pretended merits of man. Thenceforth, convinced that the glory of Jesus Christ was at stake, he heard a voice within incessantly repeating, "Monachism must fall." "So long," said he, "as the doctrine of justification continues in the Church unimpaired, no man will become a monk." This conviction always acquired more strength in his heart; and in the beginning of September, he sent "to the bishops and deacons of the Church of Wittenberg" the following theses, which formed his declaration of war against monastic life:—

"Whosoever is not of faith is sin, (Rom. xiv. 23.)

"Whosoever makes a vow of virginity, chastity, or service to God without faith, makes an impious and idolatrous vow, and makes it to the devil himself.

"To make such vows, is to be worse than the priests of Cybele, or the vestals of the heathen; for the monks pronounce their vows in the idea that they are to be faithful and saved by them; and what ought to be ascribed solely to the mercy of God, is thus attributed to the merit of works.

"Such convents should be completely overturned, as houses of the devil.

"There is only one order which is holy and produces holiness, and that is Christianity or faith.

"Convents, to be useful, should be schools, in which children might be trained to man's estate; whereas they are houses in which full grown men again become children, and so continue ever after."

We see that at this period Luther would still have tolerated convents as houses of education; but his attacks on these establishments soon became more energetic. The immorality of cloisters, and the shameful practices which prevailed in them, were vividly present to his mind. "I am desirous," wrote he to Spalatin on the 11th November, "to deliver young people from the infernal flames of celibacy." Then he wrote a treatise against celibacy, and dedicated it to his father. "Are you desirous," said he, in his dedication to the old man of Mansfeld,—"are you still desirous to snatch me from monasticism? You are entitled to do so, for you are still my father, and I am still your son. But it is no longer necessary; God has gone before you, and snatched me from it by His own power. What matters it whether I continue or lay aside the tonsure and monk's hood? Is it the hood—is it the tonsure, that makes a monk? All things are yours, says St. Paul, and you are Christ's. I belong not to the hood, but the hood to me. I am a monk, and yet not a monk; I am a new creature, not of the pope, but of Jesus Christ. Christ alone, and without any intermediate person, is my bishop, my abbot, my prior, my lord, my father; and I know no other. What matters it to me though the pope should condemn and butcher me? He will not be able to bring me forth from the tomb to do it a second time. The great day is approaching when the kingdom of abominations will be overthrown. Would to God we were worthy of being butchered by the pope. Our blood would cry to Heaven against him; and thus his judgment would be hastened, and his end brought near."

The transformation had been produced in Luther himself; he was no longer a monk. This change was not the result of external causes of human passions, of carnal precipitancy. There had been a struggle in it. Luther had at first been arrayed on the side of monachism; but truth also had entered the lists, and monachism had been vanquished. The victories which passion gains are ephemeral, whereas those of truth are durable and decisive.

CHAPTER IV.

Archbishop Albert—The Idol of Halle—Luther appears—Terror at the Court—Lutier to the Archbishop—The Archbishop's Reply—Jochim of Brandenburg.

WHILE Luther was thus making preparation for one of the greatest revolutions which was to be effected in the Church, and while the Reformation was beginning to act so powerfully on the state of society in Christendom, the partisans of Rome, blinded as those usually are who have long been in possession of power, imagined that because Luther was in the Wartburg, the Reformation was for ever dead and buried; and that henceforth they would be able, in peace, to resume their ancient practices, after being momentarily disturbed by the monk of Wittenberg. Albert, the Archbishop-Elector of Mentz, was one of those feeble spirits, who, when all things are equal, are in favour of truth; but as soon as their interest is thrown into the balance, are ready to array themselves on the side of error. The great point with him was, that his court should be as brilliant as that of any prince in Germany; his equipage as rich, and his table as well supplied; and to this end the traffic in indulgences contributed admirably. Hence, no sooner had the decree condemning Luther and the Reformation issued from the imperial chancery, than Albert, who was then with his court at Halle, assembled the indulgence merchants, who were still in alarm at the preaching of the reformer, and tried to encourage them by such words as these: "Fear no more; we have reduced him to silence; let us again begin to clip the flock; the monk is captive; he is under lock and key, and will this time be dexterous indeed if he again comes to disturb us." The market was opened anew, the merchandise exhibited, and the churches of Halle resounded once more with the harangues of the quacks.

But Luther was still alive, and his voice was powerful enough to pierce the walls and bars behind which he had been hid. Nothing could inflame his indignation to a higher degree. What! the fiercest battles have been fought; he has faced all dangers; the truth has come off victorious; and yet men dare to trample it under their feet as if it had been vanquished! . . . The doctrine which has already once overthrown this criminal traffic will again be heard. "I shall have no rest," wrote he to Spalatin, "till I have attacked the idol of Mentz, and its prostitutions at Halle.

Luther forthwith set to work; he gave himself little concern about the mysteriousness with which it was sought to envelope his residence in the Wartburg. Elijah in the desert forges new thunderbolts against impious Ahab. On the 1st November, he finished a tract Against the New Idol of Halle.

The archbishop received intelligence of Luther's design. Apprehensive and frightened at the thought, he, about the middle of October, sent two officials of his court—Capito and Auerbach—to Wittenberg to lay the storm. "It is necessary," said they to Melancthon, who most courteously received them,—"it is necessary for Luther to moderate his impetuosity." But Melancthon, though mild himself, was not one of those who imagine that wisdom consists in always yielding, always equivocating, always holding one's peace. "It is God himself who calls him," replied he; "and our age stands in need of an acrid and pungent salt." Capito then turned to Jonas, and endeavoured through him to act upon the court, at which intelligence of Luther's design had already arrived, and produced the greatest consternation. "What!" said the courtiers, "revive the flames which there has been so much difficulty in extinguishing! Luther can only be saved by allowing himself to be forgotten; and here he is setting himself in opposition to the first prince of the empire." "I wont allow Luther," said the elector, "to write against the Archbishop of Mentz, and thereby disturb the public peace."

Luther felt indignant when these words were reported to him. It is not enough to imprison his body;

they must also chain his mind, and truth herself. Do they imagine that he conceals himself from fear, and that his retirement is an acknowledgment of defeat? He, on the contrary, maintains that it is a victory. Who, then, at Worms, dared to rise up against him and to contradict the truth? Accordingly, when the prisoner of the Wartburg had read the chaplain's letter, which made him aware of the prince's sentiments, he threw it from him, determined not to reply to it. But he could not long refrain, and he again lifted the letter. "The elector will not permit!"

. . . wrote he to Spalatin; "and I will not suffer the elector not to permit me to write. . . . Sooner ruin you for ever—you, the elector—the whole world. If I have resisted the pope, who is the creature of your cardinal, why should I yield to his creature? It is really good to hear you say, that the public peace must not be disturbed, while you allow others to disturb the eternal peace of God. It will not be so, O prince. I send you a tract which I had already prepared against the cardinal before I received your letter. Hand it to Melancthon."

The perusal of this manuscript made Spalatin tremble. He again represented to the reformer how imprudent it would be to publish a work which would compel the imperial government to lay aside its apparent ignorance of Luther's fate, and to punish a prisoner who dared to attack the first prince of the empire and the Church. If Luther persisted in this design, peace was again disturbed, and the Reformation perhaps lost. Luther consented to delay the publication of his treatise; he even allowed Melancthon to erase the strongest passages. But indignant at the timidity of his friend, he wrote to the chaplain: "He lives, He reigns—the Lord in whom you court folks believe not, at least if He does not so accommodate His works to your reason, that there is no longer occasion to believe anything." He forthwith resolved on writing directly to the elector-cardinal.

It is the whole episcopate that Luther brings to his bar in the person of the primate of Germany. His words are those of an intrepid man, burning with zeal for the truth, and under a consciousness of speaking in the name of God himself.

Writing from the depth of the retreat in which he was concealed, he says: "Your electoral highness has again set up in Halle the idol which devours the silver and the souls of poor Christians. You think, perhaps, that I am off the field, and that his imperial majesty will easily stifle the cries of the poor monk. . . . But know that I will discharge the duty which Christian charity imposes on me, without fearing the gates of hell; and a fortiori, without fearing the pope, bishops, and cardinals.

"Wherefore, my most humble prayer is, that your royal highness will call to mind the commencement of this affair, and how one small spark produced a fearful conflagration. Then, also, the whole world felt secure. The thought was—the poor mendicant who is disposed, single-handed, to attack the pope, is too feeble for such a work. But God interposed, and has given the pope more toil and anxiety than he ever had since he seated himself in the temple of God, to domineer over the Church. The same God still lives—let no man doubt it. He knows how to withstand a cardinal of Mentz, were he even supported by four emperors; for He loves, above all things, to bow down the lofty cedars and humble proud Pharisees.

"Wherefore, I hereby give your highness to wit, that if the idol is not cast down, I must, in obedience to the command of God, publicly attack your highness, as I have attacked the pope himself. Let your highness act upon this notice; I expect a prompt and good answer within a fortnight. Given in my desert, Sunday after St. Catherine's day, 1521, by your electoral highness's humble and devoted,
MARTIN LUTHER."

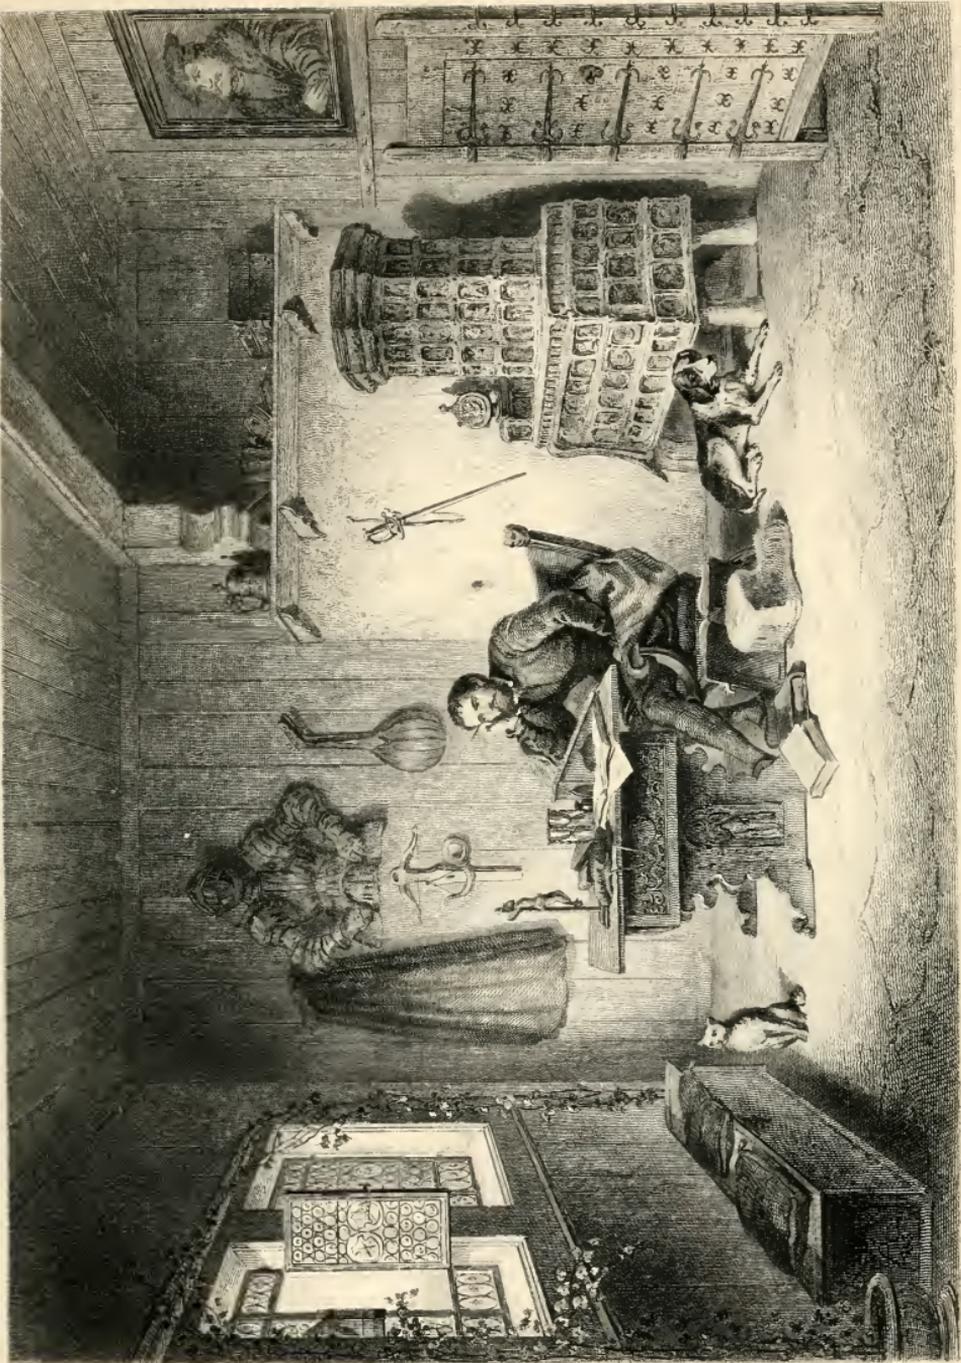

This letter was sent to Wittenberg, and from Wittenberg to Halle, where the cardinal-elector then resided; no attempt was made to stop it in its course, as it was foreseen what a storm such an audacious proceeding would have called forth. But Melancthon accompanied it with a letter to the prudent Capito, with a view to bring this difficult affair to a good termination.

We cannot say what were the feelings of the young and feeble archbishop on receiving the reformer's letter. The tract announced Against the Idol of Halle, was like a sword suspended over his head. At the same time, what rage must have been kindled in his heart by the insolence of this peasant's son, this excommunicated monk, who dared to hold such language to a prince of the house of Brandenburg, the primate of the German Church! Capito implored the archbishop to satisfy the monk. Terror, pride, conscience, whose voice he could not stifle, produced a fearful struggle in Albert's soul. At length, dread of the tract, and it may be also remorse, carried the day. He humbled himself, and gathered together whatever he thought fitted to appease the man of the Wartburg; scarcely had the fortnight elapsed, when Luther received the following letter, which is still more astonishing than his formidable epistle:—

"My dear Doctor,—I have received and read your letter, and taken it in good part. But I believe that for a long time the motive which led you to write me such a letter has not existed. I wish, with God's help, to conduct myself as a pious bishop and a Christian prince, and I acknowledge that I stand in need of the grace of God. I deny not that I am a sinful man, one who may sin and be mistaken, one even who sins and is mistaken every day. I know well, that without the grace of God I am useless and filthy mire, like other men, if not more so. In reply to your letter, I did not wish to conceal from you this gracious disposition; for, from the love of Christ, I am more than desirous to shew you all sorts of kindness and favour. I know how to receive a Christian and fraternal reprimand.

"With my own hand, ALBERT."

Such was the language held to the excommunicated of the Wartburg by the Elector-archbishop of Mentz and Magdebourg, whose office it was to represent and maintain in Germany the constitution of the Church. Had Albert, in writing it, obeyed the generous inspirations of his conscience, or his servile fears? In the former view, this letter is noble; in the latter, it deserves contempt. We prefer supposing that it proceeded from a good emotion in his heart. Be this as it may, it shews the immense superiority of the servant of God over earthly grandeur. While Luther, single, captive, and condemned, found indomitable courage in his faith, the archbishop cardinal-elect, surrounded by all the power and favour of the world, troubled in his chair. This contrast is constantly displayed, and it furnishes a key to the strange enigma with which we are presented in the history of the Reformation. The Christian is not called to sum up his forces, and make an enumeration of his means of victory. The only thing which ought to give him any concern is, whether the cause which he maintains is, indeed, that of God; and whether his sole aim is the glory of his Master. He has, doubtless, an examination to make, but it is wholly spiritual; the Christian looks to the heart, and not to the arm; to the justice of the cause, and not to its strength. And when once this question is decided, his path is marked out. He must advance boldly, even should it be against the world and all its hosts, in the unwavering conviction that God himself will fight for him.

The enemies of the Reformation thus passed from extreme rigour to extreme feebleness. They had already done so at Worms, and these abrupt transitions are ever appearing in the war which error makes upon truth. Every cause destined to give way is affected with an inward dissatisfaction, which makes it vacillating and dubious, and pushes it by turns from one extreme to the other. Far better were consistency and energy. It might be, that thereby the fall would be precipitated; but at all events when it did come it would come gloriously.

The Elector of Brandenburg, Joachim I., a brother of Albert, gave an example of this decision of character which is so rare, especially in our own age. Immoveable in his principles, firm in his actions, knowing when necessary to resist the will of the pope, he opposed an iron hand to the progress of the Reformation. At Worms he had insisted that Luther should not be heard, and even that he should be punished as a heretic, notwithstanding of his safe-conduct. No sooner was the edict of Worms issued than he ordered it to be rigorously executed in all his states. Luther was able to estimate a character thus energetic, and distinguishing Joachim from his other opponents, said: "We can still pray for the Elector of Brandenburg." The spirit of the prince seemed to have been communicated to his subjects. Berlin and Brandenburg long remained completely closed against the Reformation. But what was received slowly was kept faithfully, while countries which then received the Gospel with joy—Belgium, for instance, and Westphalia—were soon to abandon it. Brandenburg, the last of the German states to enter on the path of faith, was, at a later period, to take its place in the foremost ranks of the Reformation.

Luther did not receive the letter of the cardinal-archbishop without some suspicion of its having been dictated by hypocrisy, or in compliance with the counsels of Capito. He was silent, however, contenting himself with a declaration to the latter, that so long as the archbishop, who was scarcely capable of managing a small parish, would not lay aside the mask of the cardinalate and pomp of the episcopate, and become a simple minister of the Word, it was impossible he could be in the way of salvation.

CHAPTER V.

Translation of the Bible—Wants of the Church—Principles of the Reformation—Alarm at Court—Luther to the Archbishop—Temptations of the Devil—Condemnation of the Sorbonne—Melancthon's Reply—Visit to Wittenberg.

WHILE Luther was thus combating error, as if he had still been upon the field of battle, he was at work in his retreat as if he were a stranger to everything that was taking place in the world. The moment had arrived when the Reformation was to pass from the speculations of theologians into common life; and yet the great instrument by which this transaction was to be effected was not yet in existence. This wondrous and mighty engine, destined to assail the edifice of Rome from all quarters, with bolts which would demolish its walls, to lift off the enormous weight under which the papacy held down the half-suffocated Church, and give to humanity itself an impulse which it should retain to the latest ages, was to come forth from the old castle of the Wartburg, and enter the world with the reformer the very day when his captivity should terminate.

The farther the Church was removed from the period when Jesus Christ, the true Light of the world, dwelt in it, the more need she had of the lamp of the Word of God, which was to transmit the brightness of Jesus Christ unimpaired to the latest ages. But this Divine Word was then unknown to the people. Attempts at translation—from the Vulgate in 1477, 1490, and 1518—had succeeded ill, were almost unintelligible, and, from their high price, beyond the reach of the people. It had even been prohibited to give the Bible to the Germanic Church in the vulgar tongue. Besides, the number of those able to read was inconsiderable, so long as there was no work in the German tongue of deep and universal interest.

Luther was called to give the Scriptures to his country, Italy. The same God who withdrew St. John to Patmos, there to write His Revelation, had shut up Luther in the Wartburg to translate His Word. This great work, which it would have been difficult for him to undertake amid the distractions and occupations of Wittenberg, was destined to establish the new edifice on the primitive rock, and bring back Christians, after so many ages of scholastic subtleties, to the pure and primary source of redemption and salvation.

The wants of the Church pleaded strongly; they demanded this great work; and Luther was to be trained by his own deep experience for the performance of it. In fact, he had found in faith that spiritual repose which his agitated conscience and monastic ideas had long made him seek in his own merit and holiness. The doctrine of the Church—viz., scholastic theology, knew nothing of the consolations which faith gives; but these were forcibly announced in Scripture, and there he found them. Faith in the Word of God had made him free. By means of it he felt himself emancipated from the dogmatical authority of the Church, its hierarchy, its traditions, scholastic opinions, powerful prejudices, and all tyranny of man.

The numerous and powerful links which had for ages chained and bound Christendom, were broken, destroyed, and scattered in fragments around him; and he nobly raised his head, free of everything save the Word. This independence of men, this submission to God, which he had learned in the Holy Scriptures, he wished the Church to possess. But in order to accomplish this, it was necessary to give her back the revelation of God. It was necessary that a mighty hand should throw back the ponderous gates of that arsenal of the Word of God in which Luther himself had found his armour, and that those vaults and ancient halls which no foot had traversed for ages, should be again opened wide to the Christian people for the day of battle.

Luther had already translated different portions of the Holy Scriptures: the seven penitential Psalms had been his first labour. Jesus Christ, John Baptist, and the Reformation, alike began with the doctrine of repentance, which is the beginning of renovation in the individual and in the race. These essays had been received with avidity; all wished for more; and this call from the people was to Luther a call from God himself. He formed the design of responding to it. He was a captive behind high walls. True! He will employ his leisure in transferring the Word of God into the language of his people. This Word will shortly descend with him from the Wartburg; it will circulate among the population of Germany, and put them in possession of spiritual treasures—treasures like them shut up within the hearts of a few pious men. "Let this single book," exclaims he, "be in all tongues, in all hands, before all eyes, in all ears, and in all hearts." Admirable words! which a distinguished society for translating the Bible into the languages of all nations, is now, after three centuries, engaged in carrying into effect. "The Scripture, without any commentary," says he on another occasion, "is the sun from which all teachers receive light."

Such are the principles of Christianity and of the Reformation. According to those venerable words, we are not to take the Fathers in order to throw light on Scripture, but Scripture to throw light on the Fathers. The reformers and the apostles held up the Word of God alone for light, just as they hold up the sacrifice of Christ alone for righteousness. To attempt to mix up human authority with this absolute authority of God, or human righteousness with this perfect righteousness of Christ, is to corrupt Christianity in its two foundations. Such are the two fundamental heresies of Rome, heresy, moreover, which some teachers would fain introduce, though, doubtless, in a modified form, into the bosom of the Reformation.

Luther opened the Greek text of the evangelists and apostles, and undertook the difficult task of making these inspired teachers speak his mother tongue,—an important epoch in the history of the Reformation, which was thenceforth no longer in the hand of the reformer. The Bible came forward; Luther drew back; God shewed himself, and man disappeared. The reformer has placed THE BOOK in the hands of his contemporaries. Every one can now listen to God himself. As for Luther, he from this time mingles in the crowd, and takes his place among those who come to draw at the common fountain of light and life.

In the translation of the Holy Scriptures Luther found, in abundance, that consolation and strength which were most necessary to him. Sick, isolated, saddened by the efforts of his enemies, and the errors of some of his partisans, seeing his life wasting away in the gloom of this old castle, he had many fearful combats to maintain. In those times there was an inclination to transfer to the visible world the struggles which the soul maintains with its spiritual foes. The lively imagination of Luther easily gave a bodily shape to the emotions of his heart; while the superstition of the Middle Ages had still some hold upon his intellect, so that in this respect it may be said of him, as has been said of Calvin in the punishment of heretics—he had a remnant of popery.¹ In Luther's idea, Satan was not merely an invisible, though real being; he thought that this enemy of God appeared to man as he had appeared to Jesus Christ. Although the authenticity of several of the accounts given on this subject in the "Table Talk" and elsewhere, is more than doubtful, the historian is bound to point out this foible in the reformer. Never did these dark ideas assail him more than in the solitude of the Wartburg. He had defied the devil at Worms in the days of his strength; but now all the power of the reformer seemed broken, and his glory tarnished. He was thrown aside. Satan was victorious in his turn, and Luther, in the anguish of his spirit, thought he saw him raising his gigantic figure before him, pointing his threatening finger, triumphing with bitter and infernal leer, and gnashing his teeth in frightful rage. One day among others, it is said, when Luther was working at his translation of the New Testament, he thought he saw Satan, who, dreadfully terrified at this work, kept teasing him, and turning round and round him like a lion about to pounce upon his prey. Luther, frightened and irritated, seized his inkstand, and threw it at the head of his enemy. The figure vanished, and the inkstand struck against the wall.²

Luther's residence in the Wartburg began to be insupportable. He felt indignant at the pusillanimity of his protectors. Sometimes he remained a whole day absorbed in silent and profound meditation, and came out of it only to exclaim: "Oh that I were at Wittenberg!" At length he could hold out no longer; there has been enough of political management; he must see his friends again,—hear them and speak to them. True! he runs the risk of falling into the hands of his enemies; but nothing can stop him. Towards the end of November, he secretly quits the Wartburg, and sets out for Wittenberg.

A new storm had just burst upon him. The Sorbonne had at length broken silence. This celebrated school of Paris, the first authority in the Church after the pope, the ancient and venerable fountain whence theological dogmas had sprung, had just issued its verdict against the Reformation.

¹ M. Michélet, in his "Mémoires de Luther," devotes more than thirty pages to different accounts of the apparition of the devil.

² The keeper of the Wartburg is still careful to shew the traveller the mark made by Luther's inkstand.

The following are some of the propositions which it condemned. Luther had said: "God always pardons and remits sins gratuitously, and asks nothing of us in return, but only to live in future according to His will." He had added: "Of all mortal sins the most mortal is this, for any one to believe that he is not guilty before God of mortal and damnable sin." He had further said: "To burn heretics is contrary to the will of the Holy Spirit."

To all these propositions, and many others which were quoted, the faculty of theology replied: "Heresy! anathema!"

But a young man of twenty-four, of small stature, modest, and unostentatious, dared to take up the gauntlet which had been thrown down by the first school in the world. It was well known at Wittemberg what view ought to be taken of these pompous condemnations; it was known that Rome had yielded to the suggestion of the Dominicans; and that the Sorbonne was dragged along by two or three fanatical doctors, who were designated at Paris by derisive nicknames. Accordingly, Melancthon, in his apology, did not confine himself to the defence of Luther, but with the boldness which characterizes his writings, carried the assault into the camp of his adversaries. "You say he is a Manichean!—a Montanist!—let fire and flame repress his folly! Which, pray, is Montanist? Luther, who wishes men to believe in the Holy Scriptures, or yourselves, who will have them to believe the views of men rather than the Word of God."

To attribute more to man's word than to the Word of God, was in fact the heresy of Montanes, as it is still that of the pope, and of all those who set the hierarchical authority of the Church, or the internal inspiration of mysticism, above the positive declaration of the Sacred Writings. Accordingly, the young master of arts, who had said: "I will lose my life sooner than my faith," did not stop there. He accused the Sorbonne of having obscured the Gospel, extinguished faith, and substituted a vain philosophy for Christianity. After the work of Melancthon, the position of the question was changed; he proved to demonstration that heresy was at Paris and Rome, and catholic truth at Wittemberg.

Meanwhile Luther, giving himself little concern with the condemnation of the Sorbonne, repaired in his knight's dress to the university seat. On the way different reports reached him, that a spirit of impatience and independence was manifesting itself among his adherents, and he was grieved to the heart. At length he arrived at Wittemberg without having been recognised, and stopped at the house of Amsdorff. Forthwith all his friends were secretly summoned, Melancthon especially, who had often said: "If I must be deprived of him I prefer death." On their arrival, what a meeting!—what joy! The captive of the Wartburg, seated amidst them, enjoys all the sweets of Christian friendship. He learns the progress of the Reformation, and the hopes of his brethren; and overjoyed at what he sees and hears, prays, gives thanks, and then, after a short delay, returns to the Wartburg.

CHAPTER VI.

New Reforms—Gabriel Zwilling on the Mass—The University—The Elector—Monachism attacked—Emancipation of the Monks—Disturbances—Chapter of the Augustines—The Mass and Carlsbad—First Supper—Importance of the Mass in the Roman System.

LUTHER's joy was well founded—the Reformation was then advancing at an immense pace. Feldkirchen, always in the advanced guard, had first mounted to the assault: the main body was now shaken, and the power which carried the Reformation from doctrine which it had purified, into worship, common life, and the constitution of the Church, now manifested itself by a new explosion, still more formidable to the papacy than the former had been.

Rome, disencumbered of the Reformer, thought she had done with heresy. But in a short time all was changed. Death precipitated the man who had laid Luther under interdict from the pontifical throne. Disturbances arising in Spain, obliged Charles V. to repair beyond the Pyrenees. War broke out between this prince and Francis I., and, as if this had not been enough to occupy the emperor, Solymán advanced into Hungary. Charles, attacked on all sides, saw himself constrained to forget the monk at Worms, and his religious innovations.

About the same time the vessel of the Reformation, which, driven in all directions by contrary winds, had wellnigh foundered, righted, and floated firmly on the waves.

It was in the Augustine convent of Wittemberg that the Reformation broke out. We must not be surprised at this: the Reformer was no longer there; but no power could banish the spirit which had animated him.

For some time the church in which Luther so often preached had resounded with strange doctrines. Gabriel Zwilling, the preacher of the convent, a monk full of zeal, preached with ardour in favour of the Reformation. As if Luther, whose name was everywhere proclaimed, had become too powerful and too illustrious, God selected feeble and obscure individuals to commence the Reformation which Luther had prepared. "Jesus Christ," said the preacher, "instituted the sacrament of the altar as a memorial of His death, not to make it an object of adoration. To adore it is real idolatry. The priest who communicates alone, commits a sin. No prior is entitled to compel a monk to say mass alone. Let one, two, or three officiate, and let all the others receive the sacrament in both kinds."

Such was the demand of Friar Gabriel, and these bold words were listened to with approbation by the other friars, especially by those who came from the Low Countries. Being disciples of the Gospel, why should they not in everything conform themselves to its commands? Had not Luther himself, in the month of August, written to Melancthon: "Never more from this time will I say a private mass?" Thus the monks, those soldiers of the hierarchy, set free by the Word of God, boldly took part against Rome.

At Wittemberg they experienced an obstinate resistance on the part of the prior. Recollecting that all things ought to be done in order, they yielded, still declaring that to maintain the mass was to oppose the Gospel of God.

The prior had carried the day: one had proved stronger than all. It might therefore be supposed that the movement of the Augustines had only been one of those freaks of insubordination of which convents were so often the theatre. But it was in reality the Spirit of God that was then agitating Christendom. An isolated cry sent forth from the recess of a monastery found a thousand echoing voices; and that which it was wished to keep confined within the walls of a convent, came forth and assumed a distinct shape in the very heart of the city.

LA SORBONNE, PARIS.

A rumour of the dissensions of the monks was soon noised in the town. The citizens and students of the University took part either for or against the mass. The electoral court was alarmed. Frederick, in astonishment, sent his chancellor Pontanus to Wittemberg, with orders to tame the monks, by putting them, if necessary, on bread and water; and on the 12th October, at seven in the morning, a deputation of professors, of whom Melancthon was one, repaired to the convent to exhort the monks not to make any innovation, or at least to wait. On this all their zeal revived: unanimous in their belief, with the exception of the prior, who combated them, they appealed to the Holy Scriptures, to the intelligence of the faithful, and the consciences of theologians, and two days after returned a written declaration.

The teachers now examined the question more closely, and perceived that truth was on the side of the monks. They went to convince, but were themselves convinced. What were they to do? Their consciences spake aloud; their distress continually increased: at last, after long hesitation, they adopted a bold resolution.

On the 20th October, the university gave in their report to the elector. "Let your electoral highness," said they to him, after exposing the errors of the mass,—"let your electoral highness abolish all abuses, lest Christ, on the day of judgment, upbraid us as He once did Capernaum."

It is no longer some obscure monks who speak; but that university which all sober men have hailed for years as the national school. The very means employed to stifle the Reformation are going to contribute to its extension.

Melancthon, with the boldness which he shewed in speculation, published fifty-five propositions with a view to enlighten the public mind.

"Just," says he, "as to look at a crucifix is not to do a good work, but simply to contemplate a sign which reminds us of the death of Christ.

"As to look at the sun is not to do a good work, but simply to contemplate a sign which reminds us of Christ and His Gospel.

"So to partake of the table of the Lord, is not to do a good work, but simply to make use of a sign which reminds us of the grace given us by Christ.

"But herein is the difference: the symbols invented by men simply recall what they signify, whereas the signs given by God not only recall the things, but also make the heart sure of the will of God.

"As the sight of a cross does not justify, so the mass does not justify.

"As the sight of a cross is not a sacrifice for our own sins or for those of others, so the mass is not a sacrifice.

"There is only one sacrifice, only one satisfaction—Jesus Christ. Out of Him there is none.

"Let the bishops who do not oppose the impiety of the mass be anathema."

Thus spake the pious and gentle Philip.

The elector was in consternation. His wish had been to repress some young monks, and, lo! all the university, with Melancthon himself, rise up in their defence. To wait appeared to him to be in all things the surest means of success. He had no taste for sudden reforms, and wished every opinion to have full opportunity of shewing itself. "Time," thought he, "throws light on all things, and brings them to maturity." And yet the Reformation advances in spite of him, with rapid steps, and threatens to carry everything along with it. Frederick used all his efforts to arrest it. His authority, the weight of his character, the arguments which appeared to him most decisive—everything was put in requisition. He sent a message to the theologians: "Don't be in a haste; you are too few in number to carry out such a reformation. If it is founded on the holy Gospel, others will perceive it, and the whole Church will concur with you in abolishing these abuses. Speak, debate, preach as much on these subjects as you please; but preserve ancient customs."

Such was the struggle which took place on the subject of the mass. The monks had gone up courageously to the assault; the theologians, for a moment undecided, had soon supported them. The prince and his ministers alone defended the place. It has been said that the Reformation was effected by the power and authority of the elector; but so far from this, the assailants were obliged to retire at the venerated voice of Frederick, and the mass was saved for some days.

Moreover, the hottest of the assault had already been directed to another point. Friar Gabriel continued his fervid harangues in the church of the Augustines. It was against Monachism itself that he now directed those redoubled blows. If the mass constituted the strength of the Romish doctrine, Monachism constituted the strength of the hierarchy. These, therefore, were the two first positions which required to be carried.

"Nobody," exclaimed Gabriel, according to the prior's account,—"nobody in convents observes the commandments of God; nobody can be saved under the monk's cowl; every man in a cloister must have entered it in the name of the devil. Vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, are contrary to the Gospel."

These strange addresses were reported to the prior, who took good care to keep away from the church, that he might not hear them.

"Gabriel," it was also said, "wishes every means to be taken to empty cloisters." If monks are met in the street, it is proper, according to him, to pull them by the frock, and point the finger at them; and if mockery does not succeed in making them quit the convent, they must be violently hunted out of it. "Break open, destroy, throw down the monasteries," said he, "so that not a vestige of them may remain; and on the site which they have so long occupied let it be impossible to find any one of the stones which served to shelter so much idleness and superstition."

The monks were astonished; their consciences told them that what Gabriel said was only too true,—that the life of a monk was not conformable to the will of God, and that none was enabled to dispose of them but themselves.

Thirteen Augustines left the convent at once, and, laying aside the dress of their order, assumed common clothes. Those of them who had some education attended the lectures in the university, that they might one day become useful to the Church; and those whose minds were little cultivated, sought to gain their living by working with their own hands, according to the injunction of the apostle, and the example of the worthy burghers of Wittemberg. One of them, who was acquainted with the trade of carpenter, entered with the corporation, and resolved to marry.

If Luther's entrance into the convent of the Augustines of Erfurt was the first germ of the Reformation, the departure of these thirteen monks from the convent of the Augustines of Wittemberg was a sign that it was beginning to take possession of Christendom. For thirty years Erasmus had been exposing the uselessness, the follies, and vices of the monks; and with him all Europe had laughed or felt indignant. But it was no longer an affair of sarcasm. Thirteen spirited and brave men again appeared in the midst of their fellowmen to render themselves useful to society, and fulfil the orders of God. The marriage of Feldkirchen had been the first defeat of the hierarchy—the emancipation of these thirteen Augustines was the second.

Monachism, which had been formed the moment the Church commenced her period of bondage and error, behoved to fall the moment she recovered liberty and truth.

This bold proceeding caused a general fermentation in Wittemberg. Admiration was felt for the men who came to share in the common toils, and they were received as brethren. At the same time cries were heard against those who persisted in remaining idly hid behind the walls of a monastery. The monks who adhered to the prior trembled in their cells; and he, carried away by the universal movement, discontinued the celebration of low mass.

The smallest concession at so critical a moment could not but hasten the progress of events. This order by the prior caused a very lively sensation in the town and the university, and produced a sudden explosion. Among the students and citizens of Wittemberg were some turbulent men, whom the least excitement stirs up and hurries into culpable disorders. They were indignant at the idea that low mass, which was suspended even by the superstitious prior, should still be said in the parish church; and on Tuesday, the 3d December, when mass was about to be chanted, they made a sudden rush towards the altar, carried off the books, and drove away the priests. The council and the university were indignant, and met to punish the authors of these misdeeds. But the passions, when once roused, are not easily calmed. The Cordeliers had not taken part in the reform movement of the Augustines. The next day some students put up a threatening placard on the door of their monastery; thereafter, forty students entered their church, and, without proceeding to actual violence, mocked the monks, who, in consequence, did not venture to say mass except in the choir. Towards evening the fathers received intimation to be upon their guard. "The students," it was said, "intended to attack the monastery!" . . . The monks, in alarm, not knowing how to defend themselves against these real or supposed attacks, hastily petitioned the council to defend them. Some soldiers were sent; but the enemy did not appear. The university caused the students who had taken part in these disturbances to be arrested. They were discovered to be students from Erfurt, already marked for insubordination. University penalties were inflicted on them.

Still, it was felt necessary carefully to examine the lawfulness of monastic vows. A chapter, consisting of the Augustines of Thuringia and Misnia, met at Wittemberg in the month of December. Their views coincided with Luther's. They declared, on the one hand, that monastic vows were not sinful; but, on the other, that they were not obligatory. "In Christ," said they, "there is neither laic nor monk; every one is free to quit the monastery, or to remain in it. Let him who departs not abuse his liberty; let him who remains obey his superiors, and that from love." Then they abolished mendicancy and masses said for money; they also decreed that the most learned among them should apply themselves to the teaching of the Word of God, and that the others should support their brethren by the work of their hands.

The question of vows thus seemed determined; but that of the mass remained undecided. The elector continued to oppose the torrent, and protected an institution which was still standing in every part of Christendom. The orders of an indulgent prince were unable, however, long to restrain men's minds. The brain of Carlstadt especially fermented amid the general fermentation. Full of zeal, honesty, and intrepidity, and ready, like Luther, to sacrifice everything for the truth, he had less wisdom and moderation than the reformer. He was not free from a love of vain-glory; and, with a decided inclination to go to the bottom of every question, he had little judgment and little clearness in his ideas. Luther had drawn him from the midst of the schoolmen, and turned him towards the study of Scripture; but Carlstadt had not patience to study the original tongues, and had not perceived, like his friend, the full sufficiency of the Word of God. Accordingly, he was often seen to fasten on the most singular interpretations. So long as Luther was at his side, the superiority of the master kept the scholar within due bounds. But Carlstadt was now at liberty; and this little man, of sallow tint, who had never been conspicuous for eloquence, was heard at the university and the church, especially in Wittenberg, giving eager expression to ideas which, though sometimes profound, were often enthusiastic and extravagant. "What folly," exclaimed he, "to think that the Reformation should be left to the agency of God alone! A new order of things begins. The hand of man must interpose. Woe to him who stays behind, and will not mount the breach in the cause of the mighty God!"

The words of the archdeacon communicated to others the impatience which animated himself. Following his example, individuals who were sincere and straightforward exclaimed: "All that the popes have ordained is impious. Let us not become accomplices in these abominations by allowing them to subsist. What is condemned by the Word of God must be abolished in Christendom, whatever be the ordinances of men. If the heads of the State and Church will not do their duty, let us do ours. Let us renounce negotiations, conferences, theses, and debates, and have recourse to the true remedy for all these evils. There must be a second Elijah to destroy the altars of Baal."

The re-establishment of the Last Supper at this moment of fermentation and enthusiasm, doubtless, could not exhibit the solemnity and sacredness of its institution by the Son of God the evening before His death, and almost at the foot of His cross. But if God now made use of feeble, and, perhaps, passionate men, it was still His hand which re-established the feast of His love in the bosom of His Church.

As early as the month of October, Carlstadt, with twelve of his friends, had secretly celebrated the Lord's Supper, agreeably to its original institution. The Sunday before Christmas he intimated from the pulpit that, on the feast of the Circumcision, being New-year's-day, he would dispense the Supper under the two kinds of bread and wine to all who should present themselves at the altar; that he would omit all useless ceremonies; and in celebrating this mass would not put on either cope or chasuble.

The council, in alarm, requested Councillor Beyer to prevent so great an irregularity. On this Carlstadt resolved not to wait for the time he had appointed.

On Christmas, 1521, he preaches in the parish church on the necessity of abandoning the mass, and receiving the sacrament under the two kinds. After sermon he descends to the altar, pronounces the words of consecration in German, then turning to the people, who were all attention, he says in a solemn tone: "Whosoever feels the burden of his sins, and is hungering and thirsting for Divine grace, let him come and receive the body and blood of the Lord." Afterwards, without raising the host, he distributes the bread and wine to all, saying: "This is the cup of my blood, the blood of the new and everlasting covenant."

Different sentiments pervaded the audience. Some, feeling that new grace from God was given to the Church, came to the altar under deep emotion and in silence. Others, attracted particularly by the novelty, approached with agitation and a certain degree of impatience. Only five communicants presented themselves at the confessional. The others simply took part in the public confession of sins. Carlstadt gave general absolution to all, enjoining no other penitence than this: "Sin no more." At the close they sang the hymn, Lamb of God.

No opposition was made to Carlstadt; these reforms had already obtained the public consent. The archdeacon dispensed the Supper again on New-year's-day; then on the following Sunday; and thereafter the ordinance was regularly observed. Einsiden, one of the elector's councillors, having upbraided Carlstadt with seeking his own glory rather than the salvation of his hearers: "Mighty sir," replied he, "there is no death that can make me abandon Scripture. The Word has come to me so readily. . . . Woe to me if I preach not." Carlstadt married soon after.

In the month of January, the town council of Wittenberg and the university regulated the celebration of the Supper in accordance with the new form. At the same time, the means were taken into consideration of restoring the moral influence of religion; for the Reformation behoved to re-establish simultaneously faith, worship, and manners. It was decreed that mendicants, whether lay or not, should no longer be tolerated; and that in each street a pious man should be charged to take care of the poor, and cite scandalous offenders before the university or the council.

Thus fell the mass, the principal bulwark of Rome; thus the Reformation passed from doctrine to worship. Three ages before, the mass and transubstantiation had been definitively established, and thereafter everything in the Church had taken a new direction,—the general tendency being to give glory to man and reverence to the priest. The holy sacrament had been worshipped; feasts had been instituted in honour of the greatest miracles; the adoration of Mary had obtained an important place; the priest who, in his consecration, received the strange power of "making the body of Christ," had been separated from the laity, and had become, according to Thomas Aquinas, a mediator between God and man; celibacy had been proclaimed as an inviolable law; auricular confession had been imposed on the people, and the cup taken from them; for how could humble laity be placed on the same level with priests entrusted with the most august ministry? The mass was an insult to the Son of God; it was opposed to the perfect grace of His cross, and the spotless glory of His eternal kingdom. But if it degraded our Lord, it exalted the priest whom it invested with the extraordinary power of reproducing in his hands, at will, his sovereign Creator. The Church appeared henceforth to exist, not in order to preach the Gospel, but simply to reproduce Christ corporeally in the midst of her. The pontiff of Rome, whose most humble servants at pleasure created the body of God himself, sat as God in the temple of God, and ascribed to himself a spiritual treasure, out of which he drew unlimited indulgences for the pardon of sins.

Such were the gross errors which, together with the mass, had for three centuries been imposed on the Church. The Reformation, in abolishing this human institution, abolished all these abuses. The act of the Archdeacon of Wittenberg was therefore one of high consequence. The sumptuous festivals which amused the people, the worship of Mary, the pride of the priesthood, the power of the pope, all tottered with the mass. Glory was withdrawn from the priests and restored to Jesus Christ. The Reformation thus took an immense step in advance.

CHAPTER VII.

Spurious Reform—The New Prophets—The Prophets at Wittenberg—Melancthon—The Elector—Luther, Carlstadt, and Images—Disorders—Luther Sent for—He Hesitates not—Dangers.

STILL men under the influence of prejudice might have been unable to see in the work which was being accomplished, more than the effect of vain enthusiasm. Facts themselves behaved to prove the contrary, and demonstrate that there is a wide space between a Reformation founded on the Word of God and a giddy fanaticism.

When a great religious fermentation takes place in the Church, some impure elements always mingle with the manifestation of the truth. One or more false reforms proceeding from man rise to the surface, and serve as a testimony or countersign to true reform. Thus, in the days of Christ, several false messiahs attested that the true Messiah had appeared. The Reformation of the sixteenth century could not be accomplished without exhibiting a similar phenomenon. The place where it appeared was the little town of Zwickau.

There were some men who, excited by the great events which then agitated Christendom, aspired to direct revelations from the Deity, instead of simply seeking sanctification of heart, and who pretended they had a call to complete the Reformation which had been feebly sketched by Luther. "What use is there," said they, "in attaching oneself so strictly to the Bible? The Bible! always the Bible! Can the Bible speak to us? Is it not insufficient to instruct us? Had God designed to teach us by a book, would He not have sent a Bible from heaven? It is by the Spirit only that we can be illumined. God himself speaks to us. God himself reveals to us what we ought to do, and what we ought to say." Thus, like the partisans of Rome, these fanatics attacked the fundamental principle on which the whole Reformation rests,—the sufficiency of the Word of God.

A simple weaver, named Nicolas Storch, announced that the angel Gabriel had appeared to him during the night, and after having communicated to him things which he could not yet reveal, had said to him: "Thou, thou shalt sit upon my throne." An old student of Wittenberg, named Mark Stubner, joined Storch, and forthwith abandoned his studies, having, as he said, received the gift of interpreting the Holy Scriptures immediately from God. Mark Thomas, also a weaver, added to their number; and a new adept, Thomas Munzer, a man of a fanatical spirit, gave a regular organization to this new sect. Storch, wishing to follow the example of Christ, chose among his adherents twelve apostles and seventy-two disciples. All of these openly announced—as a sect in our days has done—that apostles and prophets are at length restored to the Church of God.

Shortly after the new prophets, pretending to walk in the footsteps of those of ancient times, delivered their message. "Woe! woe!" said they. "A Church governed by men so corrupt as the bishops, cannot be the Church of Christ. The wicked rulers of Christendom will ere long be overthrown. In five, six, or seven years, universal desolation will burst forth. The Turk will seize upon Germany; all the priests, even those who are married, will be put to death. No wicked man, no sinner, will be left alive; and after the earth shall have been purified by blood, God will set up His kingdom in it; Storch will be put in possession of supreme authority, and will commit the government of the nations to saints. Henceforth there will be only one faith and one baptism. The day of the Lord is at hand, and we are touching on the end of the world. Woe! woe! woe!" Then, declaring that the baptism received in infancy was of no value, the new prophets invited all men to come and receive the true baptism at their hands, as a sign of introduction into the new Church of God.

These discourses made a strong impression on the people. Some pious souls were moved at the idea that prophets were restored to the Church; and all who loved the marvellous, threw themselves into the arms of the eccentric men of Zwickau.

But scarcely had this old heresy, which had formerly existed in the times of Montanism, and in the Middle Ages, again found followers, than it encountered a powerful opponent in the Reformation. Nicolas Hausmann, to whom Luther bore this fine testimony, "What we teach, he practises," was pastor of Zwickau. This good man did not allow himself to be led astray by the pretensions of the false prophets. He laid an arrest on the innovations which Storch and his adherents wished to introduce, and in his his two deacons concurred with him. The fanatics, repulsed by the ministers of the Church, plunged into another excess. They formed assemblies, in which revolutionary doctrines were professed. The people were excited, and disturbances broke out; a priest, who was carrying the holy sacrament, was assailed with volleys of stones. The civil authority interposed, and threw the most violent into prison. Indignant at this proceeding, and impatient to justify themselves and state their complaint, Storch, Mark Thomas, and Stubner, repaired to Wittenberg.

They arrived on the 27th December, 1521. Storch walked in front with the bearing and mien of a trooper. Mark Thomas and Stubner followed him. The disquiet which prevailed in Wittenberg favoured their designs. The students and burghers, deeply moved, and already in a state of fermentation, were a soil well fitted for the new prophets.

Thinking themselves sure of their support, they immediately repaired to the professors of the university, in order to obtain a testimony in their favour. "We," said they, "are sent by God to instruct the people. We hold familiar converse with the Lord; we know things to come; in a word, we are apostles and prophets, and we appeal for the fact to Doctor Luther." This strange language astonished the professors.

"Who ordained you to preach?" asked Melancthon of Stubner, his old student, who had lodged in his house.—"Our Lord God." "Have you written any books?"—"Our Lord God has forbidden me." Melancthon is moved, astonished, and alarmed.

"There are extraordinary spirits in these men," says he; "but what kind of spirits? Luther alone can determine. On the one hand, let us beware of extinguishing the Spirit of God; and on the other, of being seduced by the spirit of the devil." Storch, who was of a restless temper, soon quitted Wittenberg. Stubner remained. Animated with an ardent spirit of proselytism, he went up and down the town, speaking sometimes to one, and sometimes to another. Several acknowledged him as a prophet of God. He applied particularly to a Swabian, named Cellarius, a friend of Melancthon, who kept a school, in which he instructed a great number of young people in literature, and who soon became a firm believer in the mission of the new apostles.

Melancthon became the more uncertain and perplexed. The visions of the new prophets did not disturb him so much as their new doctrine on baptism. It seemed to him agreeable to reason, and he considered it a subject worthy of examination; "for," said he, "it is not right either to admit or reject anything lightly."

Such is the spirit of the Reformation. Melancthon's hesitancy and anxiety are proofs of the uprightness of his heart, and, perhaps, do him more honour than a systematic opposition could have done.

The elector, whom Melancthon named "the lamp of Israel," was also hesitating. Prophets and apostles in the electorate of Saxony, as formerly at Jerusalem! "This is an important affair," said he; "and as a layman I cannot comprehend it. But sooner than act against God, I will take my staff in my hand and quit my throne."

At last he desired his councillors to say to the professors that they had enough of trouble on their hands at Wittenberg; that, in all probability, the pretensions of the men of Zwickau were only a delusion of the devil, and that the wisest course seemed to be to let the whole affair go off; that nevertheless, in every case where his electoral highness saw the will of God clearly, he would not take counsel either of brother or mother, but he would be ready to suffer everything for the cause of truth.

Luther in the Wartburg was apprised of the agitation which prevailed at the court and at Wittenberg. Strange men had appeared, and it was difficult to say whence their message came. He instantly perceived that God had permitted these sad events to humble His servants, and urge them by trials to make greater endeavours after sanctification.

"Your electoral highness," wrote he to Frederick, "for many years made search for relics in all countries. God has listened to your desires, and sent you a cross quite entire, with nails, spears, and scourges. . . . Grace and prosperity to the new relic! . . . Only let your highness extend your arms without fear, and allow the nails to sink into your flesh! . . . I always expected that Satan would send us this sore plague."

But at the same time nothing appeared to him more urgent than to secure others in the liberty which he claimed for himself. He had not two weights and two measures. "Beware," wrote he to Spalatin, "of throwing them into prison; let not the prince embroil his hands in the blood of these new prophets." Luther was far before his age, and even before several other reformers, on the subject of religious liberty.

Circumstances continued to become more serious at Wittenberg.

Carlstadt rejected several of the doctrines of the new prophets, and in particular their anabaptism; but there is in religious enthusiasm something contagious, from which a head like his could not easily defend itself. No sooner had the men of Zwickau arrived at Wittenberg than Carlstadt quickened his pace in the prosecution of violent reforms. "It is necessary," said he, "to make an assault on all impious customs, and overturn them in one day." Calling to mind all the passages of Scripture against images, he declaimed with increasing energy against the idolatry of Rome. "They bow and crouch before these idols," exclaimed he; "they kindle tapers to them, and present offerings to them. . . . Let us arise and pluck them from their altars!"

These words did not sound in vain in the ears of the people. They entered the churches, carried off the images, broke them in pieces, and burnt them. It would have been better to wait till their abolition had been legally determined; but it was thought that the tardiness of the leaders was compromising the Reformation itself.

Shortly, to hear these enthusiasts, there were no longer any true Christians in Wittenberg save those who did not confess, who assailed the priests, and ate flesh on forbidden days. Any one suspected of not rejecting all the observances of Rome as inventions of the devil, was a worshipper of Baal. "It is necessary," exclaimed they, "to form a Church composed only of saints."

The citizens of Wittenberg presented certain articles to the council for their adoption. Several of these articles were conformable to evangelical morality. In particular, they asked that all places of public amusement should be shut.

But Carlstadt soon went still farther; he began to despise learning; and the old professor was heard from his chair counselling his students to return to their homes, resume the hoe, hold the plough, and quietly cultivate the ground, since it was by the sweat of his brow that man was to eat bread. George Mohr, master of the school-boys at Wittemberg, led astray by the same crotchet, called from his school window to the assembled citizens, to come and take away their children. What was the use of making them study? Storch and Stubner had never been at the university, and yet they were prophets. In preaching the Gospel, therefore, a citizen was worth as much, perhaps worth more, than all the teachers of the world.

Thus arose doctrines in direct opposition to the Reformation, which the revival of letters had prepared. It was with the armour of theological science that Luther had attacked Rome; and yet the enthusiasts of Wittemberg, like the fanatical monks whom Erasmus and Reuchlin had combated, pretended to trample all human knowledge under their feet. Should Vandalism come to be established, the hope of the world was lost. A new invasion of barbarism would quench the light which God had again kindled in Christendom.

The effects of these strange harangues were soon seen. Men's minds were prejudiced, agitated, turned aside from the Gospel; the university was disorganized, and the students, becoming demoralized, were dispersed,—the governments of Germany recalling such as belonged to them. Thus the men who wished to reform, and give life to everything, were proceeding in a course of destruction. "One last effort more," exclaimed the friends of Rome, who were everywhere resuming courage,—“one last effort more, and all will be gained!”

The only means of saving the Reformation was a prompt suppression of the excesses of the fanatics. But who could do it? Melancthon? He was too young, too feeble, too much agitated himself by these strange apparitions. The elector? He was the most pacific man of his age. To build the castles of Altenburg, Weimar, and Coburg; to adorn the churches with the fine paintings of Lucas Cranach; to perfect the music of his chapels; to promote the prosperity of his university; to render his people happy; to stop in the midst of the children whom he met playing on the road, and distribute little presents among them,—such were the sweetest occupations of his life. And now, as he advanced in life, would he come to close quarters with fanatics, and oppose violence to violence? How could the good, the pious Frederick resolve to do so?

Accordingly, the evil continued, and none appeared to arrest it. Luther was away from Wittemberg. Trouble and ruin had invaded the city. The Reformation had seen an enemy arise in its bosom, more formidable than popes and emperors, and now stood on the brink of the precipice.

“Luther! Luther!” was the universal cry at Wittemberg. The burghers urgently called for him; the professors long for his counsels; the prophets themselves appealed to him. All implored him to return.

We can conceive what was passing in the mind of the reformer. All the severities of Rome were nothing in comparison of the distress which now afflicted his soul. The enemies of the Reformation were coming forth from her own bosom. She was tearing her own vitals; and the doctrine, which alone gave peace to his agitated heart, was becoming an occasion of fatal disaster to the Church.

He had said: “If I knew that my doctrine was hurtful to man, to any one simple obscure man, (this it cannot be, since it is the Gospel itself,) I would sooner die ten times than not retract it.”

And now a whole town, and this town Wittemberg, was falling into error. The doctrine was no way to blame; but from all quarters of Germany voices were raised to accuse him. Sorrows keener than any he had ever felt now assailed, and new temptations agitated him. “Can this, then,” he asked himself, “be the end to which the work of the Reformation was to lead?” But he repels these doubts. God began, and God will accomplish. “I creep and keep dragging on towards the grace of the Eternal,” exclaims he, “and entreat that His name may remain attached to this work, that if anything impure has mingled with it, He would remember that I am but a sinful man.”

The account sent to Luther of the inspiration of the new prophets, and their sublime converse with God, did not shake him for one moment. He knew the depths, the agonies, and humiliations of the spiritual life. At Erfurt and Wittemberg he had had experience of the power of God—experience which did not allow him to believe so easily that God should appear to the creature, and hold converse with him. “Ask them,” wrote he to Melancthon, “if they have experienced those spiritual tortures, those creations of God, those deaths and hells which accompany a true regeneration. And if they tell you only of enjoyment of what they call tranquil impressions of devotion and piety, believe them not, even should they pretend to have been carried to the third heaven. Christ, in order that He might arrive at His glory, behoved to pass through death; so must the believer pass through the anguish of sin before he arrive at peace. Would you know the time, the place, the manner, in which God speaks with men? Listen: He has broken all my bones like a lion; I am rejected before His face, and my soul is humbled to the lowest hell. No! the Divine Majesty (as they term it) does not speak to man so directly that man can visibly behold it; for no man, says He, can see me and live.”

But the conviction that the prophets were deluded only served to augment Luther's grief. Is it true, then, that the great doctrine of salvation by grace has so soon lost its attractions, that men turn aside from it to attach themselves to fables? He begins to experience that the work is not so easy as he had at first supposed. He stumbles over this first stone which the wanderings of the human mind have placed in his path. Distressed and in anguish, he is willing, at the cost of his life, to take it out of the way of his people, and determines on returning to Wittemberg.

Many were the dangers which then threatened him. The enemies of the Reformation were confident of destroying it. George of Saxony, whose wish was neither for Rome nor Wittemberg, had written, 16th October, 1521, to Duke John, the elector's brother, advising him to join the ranks of the enemies of reform. “Some,” said he, “deny the immortality of the soul. Others (and they are monks) drag the relics of St. Anthony with tinkling bells and swine, and cast them into the mire. And all this comes of Luther's doctrine! Entreat your brother the elector either to punish the impious authors of these innovations, or publicly to declare what his ultimate intentions are. The whitening of our locks warns us that we are drawing near the last stage of life, and urge us to put an end to all these evils."

After this George departed to take his seat in the imperial government established at Nuremberg, and immediately on his arrival used every means he could to induce the adoption of severe measures. In fact this body, on the 21st January, issued an edict, complaining bitterly that the priests said mass without being clothed in the sacerdotal dress, consecrated the holy sacrament in German, dispensed it without receiving the necessary confessions, placed it in the hands of laics, and did not even trouble themselves to inquire whether or not those who came forward to take it had broken their fast.

The imperial government accordingly called upon the bishops to search out and rigorously punish all the innovators who might be found within their respective dioceses. The bishops hastened to comply with these orders.

Such was the moment which Luther chose to reappear upon the scene. He saw the danger; he foresaw immense disasters. "In the empire," said he, "there will soon be a tumult, which will drag, pell mell, princes, magistrates, and bishops. The people have eyes: they neither will nor can be led by force. Germany will swim in blood. Let us place ourselves in the breach, and save our country in this great and terrible day of the Lord."

Departure from the Wartburg—New Position—Luther and Primitive Catholicism—Meeting at the Black Bear—Luther to the Elector—Return to Wittenberg—Discourses at Wittenberg—Charity—The Word—How the Reformation was effected—Faith in Christ—Effect—Didymus—Carlstadt—The Prophets—Conference with Luther—End of the Struggle.

SUCH was Luther's thought, but he saw a still more pressing danger. At Wittenberg, the fire, far from being extinguished, was becoming more violent from day to day. From the heights of the Wartburg Luther could discover in the horizon the signs of devastation—frightful blazes darting up suddenly into the air. Is not he the only one who can bring assistance in this extremity? Will he not throw himself into the midst of the flames, to extinguish the conflagration? In vain do his enemies prepare to strike the last blow; in vain does the elector implore him to continue in the Wartburg, and prepare his defence for the next diet. He has something more important to do—he has to defend the Gospel itself. "More serious news reach me from day to day," writes he. "I am preparing to depart; circumstances demand it."

In fact, on the morning of the 3rd of March, he rises with the determination to quit the Wartburg for ever. He bids adieu to its old towers and gloomy forests,—crosses the walls where the excommunication of Leo X. and the sword of Charles V. were unable to reach him, and descends the mountain. The world which extends at his feet, and in which he is going to re-appear, will perhaps raise a death-cry against him. But no matter: he advances joyfully, for it is in the name of the Lord that he is rejoining the society of his fellow-men.

Time had moved onward. Luther came out of the Wartburg for a different cause from that for which he had entered it. He had entered as the assailant of ancient tradition and ancient doctors; he left it as a defender of the doctrine of the apostles against new adversaries. He had entered as an innovator and assailant of the ancient hierarchy; he came out as its preserver, and for the defence of the Christian faith. Till now, Luther had had only one aim in his work, viz., the triumph of justification by faith; with this weapon he had struck down powerful superstitions. But if there had been a time to pull down, there behoved also to be a time to build up. Behind those ruins with which his arm had strewed the ground—behind those tattered letters of indulgences—those broken tiaras and torn cowls—behind all the abuses and errors of Rome, which lay in confused heaps on the field of battle, he discerned and exhibited the primitive Catholic Church, re-appearing always the same, and coming forth, after a long trial, with its immutable doctrines and heavenly accents. He knew how to distinguish between it and Rome: he hailed it and embraced it with joy. Luther did not, as he has been falsely accused, bring a novelty into the world. He did not build up an edifice for the future that had no connection with the past. He discovered and brought to light the old foundation, overgrown with thorns and brambles, and merely continuing the structure of the temple, built on the foundation which the apostles had laid. Luther understood that the ancient and primitive Church of the apostles required, on the one hand, to be re-built, in opposition to the papacy, which had so long oppressed it; and on the other, to be defended against enthusiasts and unbelievers, who pretended not to see it, and who, making no account of all that God had done in times past, wished to begin a work entirely new. Luther was no longer exclusively the apostle of a single doctrine,—that of justification, though he always reserved the first place for it;—he became the apostle of the whole Christian system; and while believing that the Church consists essentially of the whole body of the saints, he by no means despised the visible Church, but recognised the assembly of all who are called as the kingdom of God. Thus a great change now took place in Luther's soul, in his theology, and in the work of renovation which God was accomplishing in the world. The hierarchy of Rome might perhaps have urged the reformer into an extreme; the sects which then raised their heads so boldly helped to bring him to the proper medium. His residence in the Wartburg divides the history of the Reformation into two periods.

Luther was trotting along the road to Wittenberg on the second day of his journey, which was Shrove Tuesday. Towards evening a dreadful storm arose and inundated the roads. Two young Swiss, who were proceeding in the same direction, hastened on in order to take shelter in the town of Jena. They had studied at Bâle, but were on their way to Wittenberg, attracted by the great celebrity of its university. Travelling on foot, fatigued, and drenched, John Kessler of St. Gall and his companion quickened their pace. The town was in the full gaiety of the carnival: dances, masquerades, and noisy feasts occupied all the inhabitants of Jena; and when the two travellers arrived, every inn was occupied. At last the Black Bear, in front of the town gate, was mentioned to them. Jaded and out of spirits, they sadly repaired to it. The host received them kindly, and they sat down near the door opening into the public room, without presuming to enter, being ashamed of the state into which the storm had put them. At one of the tables sat a solitary individual in the dress of a knight; his head was covered with a red cap, and his underdress was covered by the skirts of his doublet; his right hand rested on the pommel of his sword, while his left held it by the hilt. A book was open before him, and he seemed to be reading with great attention. At the noise made by the two youths, he raised his head, saluted them courteously, and invited them to come forward and take a seat at table with him; then offering them a glass of beer, and referring to their accent, he said to them: "You are Swiss I see; but of what canton?"—"St. Gall." "If you are going to Wittenberg you will find a countryman there, Doctor Schurff." Encouraged by this kind reception, they asked: "Sir, are you not able to tell us where Martin Luther now is?"—"I know for certain," replied the knight, "that Luther is not at Wittenberg; but is to be soon. Philip Melancthon is there. Study Greek and Hebrew, that you may have a good understanding of the Holy Scriptures."—"If God spares our lives," replied one of the youths of St. Gall, "we shall not return home till we have seen and heard Doctor Luther, for it is on account of him we have undertaken this long journey. We know that he wishes to overthrow the priesthood and the mass; and as our parents have, from our infancy, intended us for priests, we would fain know on what he bottoms his enterprise." The knight was silent for a moment, and then said: "Where have you studied hitherto?"—"At Bâle." "Is Erasmus of Rotterdam still there?—what is he about?" They answered these questions, and there was a new pause. The two Swiss knew not what to think. "Is it not a strange thing," said they, "that this knight talks to us of Schurff, Melancthon, and Erasmus, and of the necessity of studying Greek and Hebrew?" "Dear friends," said the stranger abruptly, "what is thought of Luther in Switzerland?"—"Sir," replied Kessler, "opinions differ, as everywhere else; some cannot extol him sufficiently; others condemn him as an abominable heretic."—"Ah! the priests, no doubt," said the stranger.

The knight's affability had put the two students at their ease. They longed eagerly to know what book he was reading at the moment of their arrival. The knight had closed it and laid it down near him. Kessler's companion was at length emboldened to take it up. What was the astonishment of the two youths? The Psalms in Hebrew. The student immediately laid down the book, and wishing to make his indiscretion be forgotten, said: "I would willingly give one of my fingers to know this language."—"This you will certainly do," replied the stranger, "if you take the trouble to learn it."

Some moments after, Kessler heard himself called by the host. The poor young Swiss feared something was wrong; but the host whispered to him: "I perceive you have a great desire to see and hear Luther; very well, he is sitting beside you." Kessler, taking it for a joke, said: "Ah, host, you want to hoax me." "It is he, certainly," replied the host, "only don't let it be seen that you know who he is." Kessler gave no answer, and returned to the table, burning with eagerness to repeat what he had heard to his companion. But how was he to do it? At last it occurred to him to lean forward as if he were looking to the door, when, being close to his friend's ear, he whispered to him: "The host assures me that this is Luther." "He perhaps said Hütten," replied his companion; "you may have misunderstood him."—"It is quite possible," replied Kessler; "the host may have said Hütten: the two sounds are not unlike; I may have mistaken the one for the other."

At this moment the trampling of horses was heard in front of the hotel; and two merchants, who wished to pass the night there, entered the room. After taking off their spurs, and laying aside their cloaks, one of them put down on the table beside him an unbound volume, which immediately caught the eye of the knight. "What book is that?" said he.—"An exposition of some gospels and epistles by Doctor Luther," replied the merchant: "it has just appeared."—"I shall soon have it," replied the knight.

The host, at this moment, announced supper. The two students, fearing the expense of a repast in company with the chevalier Ulrich Von Hütten and the rich merchants, took the host aside, and begged him to give them something by themselves. "Along, my friends," replied the host of the Black Bear, "take your seat at table beside this gentleman; I will charge moderately." "Come," said the knight, "I will settle the charge."

During the repast the stranger knight made many simple and edifying observations. The merchants and students were riveted, and paid more attention to his conversation than to the dishes that were served up. "Luther must either be an angel from heaven, or a devil of hell," said one of the merchants in the course of the conversation; and then added: "I would willingly give ten florins to meet Luther and be able to confess to him."

When the supper was ended the merchants rose up, and the two Swiss remained alone with the knight, who, taking a large glass of beer, lifted it and said gravely, according to the custom of the country: "Swiss, one glass more for thanks." As Kessler was going to take the glass, the stranger put it down and presented him with one filled with wine: "You are not accustomed to beer," said he.

He then rose up, threw a military cloak on his shoulders, shook hands with the students, and said to them: "When you arrive at Wittenberg, give my compliments to Doctor Jerome Schurff."—"Willingly," replied they; "but from whom shall we say?"—"Say simply," replied he, "He who is coming salutes you."

On this he walked out, leaving them in admiration at his courtesy and meekness.

Luther—for it was indeed he—continued his journey. Be it remembered, he had been put under the ban of the empire; whosoever met him and recognised him might lay hands upon him. But at the moment when he was executing an enterprise which exposed him to every risk, he discoursed gaily with those whom he met on his way.

It was not because he was under any illusion. He saw the future big with storms. "Satan," said he, "is transported with rage, and all around me meditate death and hell. I advance, nevertheless, and throw myself in the way of the emperor and the pope, having none to defend me save God in heaven. On the part of man, power has been given to every one to slay me whosoever I am found. But Christ is the Lord of all; if it is His will that I be slain, so be it!"

The same day, being Ash-Wednesday, Luther arrived at Borna, a small town near Leipsic. Feeling that he ought to give notice to his prince of the bold step which he was going to take, he wrote him the following letter from the Conductor Tavern, where he had alighted:—

"Grace and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

"Most serene Elector! gracious lord!—what has happened at Wittenberg, to the great shame of the Gospel, has filled me with such grief, that if I were not certain of the truth of our cause, I would have despaired of it.

"Your highness knows—or if not, please to be informed—I received the Gospel not from men, but from heaven, by our Lord Jesus Christ. If I have asked for conferences, it was not because I had doubts of the truth, but from humility, and for the purpose of winning others. But since my humility is turned against the Gospel, my conscience now impels me to act in a different manner. I have yielded enough to your highness in exiling myself during this year. The devil knows it was not from fear I did it. I would have entered Worms though there had been as many devils in the town as there were tiles on the roofs. Now Duke George, with whom your highness tries so much to frighten me, is far less to be feared than a single devil. Had that which has taken place at Wittenberg taken place at Leipsic, (the duke's residence,) I would instantly have mounted my horse and gone thither, even though (let your highness pardon the expression) for nine days it should have done nothing but rain Duke Georges, and every one of them been nine times more furious than he is. What is he thinking of in attacking me? Does he take Christ, my Lord, for a man of straw? The Lord be pleased to avert the dreadful judgment which is impending over him!

"It is necessary for your highness to know that I am on my way to Wittenberg, under a more powerful protection than that of an elector. I have no thought of soliciting the assistance of your highness; so far from desiring your protection, I would rather give you mine. If I knew that your highness could or would protect me, I would not come to Wittenberg. No sword can give any aid to this cause. God alone must do all without human aid or co-operation. He who has most faith is the best protector. Now, I observe that your highness is still very weak in the faith.

"But since your highness desires to know what to do, I will answer with all humility. Your electoral highness has already done too much, and ought to do nothing at all. God does not wish, and cannot tolerate either your cares and labours, or mine. Let your highness, therefore, act accordingly.

"In regard to what concerns myself, your highness must act as elector. You must allow the orders of his imperial majesty to be executed in your towns and rural districts. You must not throw any difficulty in the way, should it be wished to apprehend or slay me; for none must oppose the powers that be save He who established them.

"Let your highness, then, leave the gates open, and respect safe-conducts, should my enemies themselves, or their envoys, enter the states of your highness in search of me. In this way you will avoid all embarrassment and danger.

"I have written this letter in haste, that you may not be disconcerted on learning my arrival. He with whom I have to deal is a different person from Duke George. He knows me well, and I know something of Him.

Borna, the Conductor Hotel, Ash-Wednesday, 1522.

"Your electoral highness's most humble servant,
"MARTIN LUTHER."

Thus Luther was drawing near to Wittenberg. He wrote to the prince; but not to apologize. Immovable confidence filled his heart. He saw the hand of God in the cause, and this sufficed him. Never, perhaps, was the heroism of faith more conspicuously displayed. One of the editions of Luther's works has on the margin these words: "This is a marvellous production of the third and last Elias."

On Friday, the 7th March, Luther again entered Wittenberg, having been five days in coming from Eisenach. Professors, students, citizens, all gave full utterance to their joy. They had recovered the pilot who alone could bring off the ship from the shallows on which it had been cast.

The elector, who was with his court at Lochau, was much affected on reading Luther's letter. He felt desirous to defend him before the diet, and wrote to Schurf: "Let him send me a letter explaining his motives for returning to Wittenberg; and let him say also in it that he returned without my permission." Luther agreed to do so.

"I am ready," wrote he to the prince, "to endure the displeasure of your highness and the anger of the whole world. Are not the inhabitants of Wittenberg my brood? Has not God entrusted them to me? And am not I bound to expose myself to death for them? I fear, moreover, the breaking out in Germany of some great revolution by which God will punish our country. Let your highness be well assured that the decision in heaven has been very different from that at Nuremberg." This letter was written the very day of Luther's arrival.

The next day, being the eve of the first Sunday of Lent, Luther repaired to the house of Jerome Schurf, where Melancthon, Jonas, Amsdorff, and Augustine

Schurff, were met. Luther eagerly asked them many questions; and they were informing him of all that had taken place, when it was announced that two foreign students wished to speak to Doctor Jerome. On appearing in the midst of this meeting of doctors, the two youths of St. Gall were at first abashed; but they soon recovered on perceiving among them the knight of the Black Bear, who immediately went up to them, accosted them as old acquaintances, smiled to them, and pointing with his finger to one of the doctors, said: "That is Philip Melancthon, of whom I spoke to you." In honour of the meeting at Jena, the two Swiss spent the whole day with the doctors of Wittemberg.

One great thought occupied the reformer, and made him forget the joy he felt at being again in the midst of his friends. No doubt the theatre on which he now appeared was obscure; it was in a small town of Saxony that he was going to raise his voice, and yet his undertaking had all the importance of an event which was to influence the destinies of the world. Many nations and many ages were to feel its effects. The point to be determined was, whether this doctrine, which he had drawn from the Word of God, and which was destined to exert so powerful an influence on the future progress of humanity, would be stronger than the principles of destruction which threatened its existence; whether it was possible to reform without destroying, and to pave the way for further progress without destroying that already made. To silence fanatics in the first heat of enthusiasm; to master a whole multitude broken loose; to calm them down, and bring them back to order, peace, and truth; to break the force of this impetuous torrent which was threatening to throw down the rising edifice of the Reformation, and scatter its wrecks around: such was the work for which Luther had returned to Wittemberg. But would his influence be sufficient? This events only could determine.

The soul of the reformer shuddered at the thought of the combat which awaited him. He stood up like a lion goaded on to battle, and shaking his bushy mane: "Now is the time," said he, "to trample Satan under foot, and combat the angel of darkness. If our adversaries retire not of their own accord, Christ will constrain them. We are the masters of life and death, we who believe in the Master of life and death."

But at the same time the impetuous reformer, as if subdued by a higher power, refused to make use of the anathemas and thunders of the Word, and became a humble pastor, a meek shepherd of souls. "It is by the Word," said he, "that we must fight; by the Word overturn and destroy what has been established by violence. I am unwilling to employ force against the superstitious or the unbelieving. Let him who believes approach; let him who believes not stand aloof. None ought to be constrained. Liberty is of the essence of faith."

The next day was Sabbath; and on that day, in the church, in the pulpit, the people were again to behold the teacher whom for nearly a year the Wartburg had concealed from every eye. The news spread in Wittemberg: Luther is returned—Luther is going to preach. These news, passing from mouth to mouth, were in themselves a powerful diversion to the notions by which the people had been led astray. The hero of Worms is going again to appear. Crowds press forward from all directions; and on Sabbath morning the church was filled with an attentive and excited audience.

Luther divines the feeling of his hearers; he mounts the pulpit, and there stands in presence of the flock whom he was wont to lead like one gentle sheep, but who had now broken loose and assumed the appearance of an untamed bull. His discourse is simple, yet dignified, replete at once with force and mildness. He might have been described as a tender parent just returned to his children, inquiring how they have behaved, and telling them kindly of what he had heard respecting them. He candidly acknowledges the progress which they had made in the faith. Having thus prepared and gained their minds, he continues in the following terms:—

"But there must be more than faith—there must be charity. When a man with a sword in his hand is by himself, it is of no consequence whether or not he keeps it in the scabbard; but if he is in the midst of a crowd, he must act in such a manner as not to hurt any one.

"How does a mother do with her child? At first she gives it milk, and thereafter the most easily digested food. Were she to begin by giving it flesh and wine, what would the result be? . . .

"So ought we to do with our brethren. Have you had enough of the breast, my friend?—very well; allow your brother to have it as long as you have had it yourself.

"Behold the sun. . . . There are two things he gives us—light and heat. There is no king so powerful as to be able to interrupt his rays; they come to us in a straight line; but the heat radiates and trans-fuses itself in all directions. Thus faith ought to be like light, straight and inflexible; but charity should, like heat, radiate in all directions, and bend to meet all the wants of our brethren."

Luther having thus prepared his hearers, comes to still closer quarters.

"The abolition of the mass, you say, is conformable to Scripture. Agreed. But what order, what decorum have you observed? You ought to have presented fervent prayers to the Lord; you ought to have applied to constituted authority, which, in that case, might have been able to perceive that the work was of God." . . .

Thus spake Luther. The bold man who had at Worms withstood the princes of the earth, produced a powerful impression by these words of wisdom and peace. Carlstadt and the prophets of Zwickau, who for some weeks had been so high and mighty, and who had agitated and lorded it over Wittemberg, became dwarfs when placed beside the prisoner of the Wartburg.

"The mass," he continues, "is a bad thing,—God is inimical to it,—it must be abolished; and I could wish that over the whole world it were supplanted by the supper of the Gospel. But let nobody be driven from it by violence. The affair must be committed to God. His Word must act, not we. And why? you will say. Because I do not hold the hearts of men in my hand, as the potter does the clay. We have a right to speak, but not to act. Let us preach—the rest belongs to God. If I employ force, what shall I obtain? Grimace, appearances, apishness, human ordinances, hypocrisy. . . . But there will be no sincerity of heart, no faith, no charity. Any work in which these three things are wanting, wants everything, and I would not give a pin for it.

“The first thing to be gained from people is their heart, and for this it is necessary to preach the Gospel. Then the Word will descend on one heart to-day, and on another to-morrow, and operate in such a way that each will withdraw from the mass, and abandon it. God does more by His mere Word than you and I and all the world could do by uniting our utmost strength. God takes possession of the heart; and when the heart is taken everything is taken.

“I do not say this in order to re-establish the mass. Since it is down, let it, in God’s name, so remain. But was the matter gone about as it ought to have been? Paul, having one day arrived at Athens, a great city, found altars erected to false gods. He went from one to another, viewed them all, and touched none. But he quietly repaired to the market-place, and declared to the people that all their gods were only idols. His words took possession of their hearts, and the idols fell without being touched by Paul.

“I wish to speak, to preach, to write; but I wish not to constrain any one, for faith is a voluntary matter. See what I have done! I have withstood the pope, indulgences, and the papists; but without tumult and violence. I have put forward the Word of God, have preached, have written; but this is all I have done. And while I was asleep, or seated in a friendly way at table with Amsdorff and Melancthon, conversing with them over a pot of Wittenberg beer, the Word which I had preached overthrew the papacy, assailing it more effectually than was ever done by prince or emperor. I have done nothing—the Word alone has done all. Had I chosen to appeal to force, perhaps Germany might have been bathed in blood. But what would have been the consequence? Ruin and desolation to soul and body. I therefore remained quiet, and allowed the Word itself to have free course in the world. Do you know what the devil thinks when he sees recourse had to force in order to spread the Gospel among men? Seated, with his arms across, behind the flames of hell, Satan, with malignant leer and frightful smile, says: ‘Ah! how sagely these fools are playing my game!’ But when he sees the Word running and wrestling alone on the field of battle, then it is he feels uneasy, and his knees tremble; he mutters, and swoons with terror.”

Luther again appeared in the pulpit on Tuesday; his powerful eloquence again resounded in the midst of a deeply impressed audience. He preached successively on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Sabbath. He passed in review the destruction of images, the distinction of meats, the observances at the Supper, the restoration of the cup, and the abolition of confession. He shewed that those points were still more indifferent than the mass, and that the authors of the disorders which had taken place at Wittenberg had grossly abused their liberty. He gave utterance alternately to accents of Christian charity and to bursts of holy indignation.

In particular, he inveighed forcibly against those who communicated thoughtlessly at the Lord’s Supper. “What makes the Christian,” said he, “is not the external eating; but the internal and spiritual eating which is produced by faith, and without which all forms whatsoever are only show and vain grimace. Now this faith consists in firmly believing that Jesus Christ is the Son of God; that being laden with our sins and iniquities, and having borne them upon the cross, He is himself the sole, the all-powerful expiation; that He is now continually in the presence of God; that He reconciles us with the Father, and has given us the sacrament of His body, in order to confirm our faith in this ineffable mercy. If I believe these things God is my defender; with Him I defy sin, death, hell, devils,—they cannot do me any harm, nor even ruffle a hair of my head. This spiritual bread is the consolation of the afflicted, the cure of the sick, the life of the dying, the food of the hungry, and the treasure of the poor. He, then, who is not sorry for his sins, ought not to come to this altar: what would he do there? Ah! let our conscience accuse us, let our hearts be torn at the thought of our faults, and we will not approach the holy sacrament with so much rashness.”

Crowds ceased not to fill the temple; numbers even flocked from the neighbouring towns to hear the new Elias. Capito, among others, came and spent two days at Wittenberg, and heard two of the doctor’s sermons. Never had Luther and the chaplain of Cardinal Albert been so much of one mind. Melancthon, the magistrates, the professors, and all the people, were overjoyed. Schurf, delighted at this issue of an affair which promised to be so serious, hastened to acquaint the elector, to whom he wrote, Friday, 15th March, (the day on which Luther had delivered his sixth discourse:) “What joy the return of Doctor Martin diffuses among us! His discourses, by the help of Divine grace, are daily bringing back our poor erring souls into the way of truth. It is clear as the sun that the Spirit of God is in him, and that by His special appointment he has returned to Wittenberg.”

In fact, these discourses are models of popular eloquence, though not of the sort which aroused men’s minds in the days of Demosthenes, or even Savonarola. The task which the orator of Wittenberg had to perform was more difficult. It is easier to rouse a wild beast than to calm its fury. The thing required was to appease a fanatical multitude; to tame passions which had been let loose; and this Luther did. In his eight discourses, the reformer did not allow a single painful allusion to escape,—a single word calculated to offend the authors of the disturbances. But the more moderate, the stronger he was; the greater the delicacy towards those who had gone astray, the more he avenged insulted truth. How could the people of Wittenberg resist his powerful eloquence? The discourses which recommend moderation are usually attributed to moderation, policy, or fear. Here there was nothing of the kind. Luther appeared before the people of Wittenberg, braving the excommunication of the pope and the proscription of the emperor. He returned, though forbidden by the elector, who declared his inability to defend him. Even at Worms Luther had not shewn more courage. He was confronting the most threatening dangers, and accordingly his voice was not disregarded. This man who braved the scaffold was entitled to exhort others to submission. He may boldly preach obedience to God, who, in doing so, exposes himself to every kind of persecution from man. At Luther's preaching objections vanished, tumult was appeased, sedition ceased its clamour, and the citizens of Wittenberg returned to their quiet homes.

Gabriel Didymus, an Augustine monk, and the one who had been most enthusiastic, had not lost a word spoken by the reformer. "Dont you think Luther an admirable teacher?" asked a hearer under deep emotion. "Ah!" replied Gabriel, "methinks I hear the voice not of a man, but an angel." Shortly after he openly acknowledged his error. "He has become another man," said Luther.

The same effect was not at first produced on Carlstadt. Despising study, and affectedly visiting the workshops of mechanics, that he might there get a knowledge of the Scriptures, he felt hurt when he saw his work crumbling to pieces before the appearance of Luther. In his eyes this was equivalent to an arrest laid on the Reformation itself. Accordingly he had always a depressed, gloomy, and discontented look. He, however, sacrificed his self-love, to peace, suppressed his vindictive feelings, was reconciled, apparently at least, with his colleague, and shortly after resumed his course at the university.

The principal prophets happened not to be at Wittenberg when Luther arrived. Nicolas Storch had been scouring the country; and Mark Stubner had quitted the hospitable roof of Melancthon. It may be their prophetic spirit had vanished, and they had neither voice nor anctee, from the moment they learned that this new Elias was bending his steps towards this new Carmel. The old schoolmaster, Cellarius, had been left alone. Meanwhile, Stubner, having been informed that the sheep of his flock were dispersed, returned in all haste. Those who had remained faithful to the "heavenly prophesy," gathered round their master, relating Luther's discourses to him, and asking with uneasiness what they were to think. Stubner exhorted them to remain firm in their faith. "Let him shew himself," exclaimed Cellarius,—"let him grant us a conference—let him allow us to explain our doctrine, and we shall see."

Luther had little inclination to meet with these men; he knew that there was in them a violent, impatient, haughty spirit, which could not endure warnings, however charitably given, and who claimed submission to their every word as a sovereign authority. Such are the enthusiasts of all times. Still, as an interview was asked, the doctor could not refuse it. Besides, it might be useful to the simple ones of the flock to unmask the imposture of the prophets. The conference took place. Stubner spoke first, and explained how he proposed to renew the Church and change the world. Luther listened with great calmness. "Nothing that you have said," replied he, at length, gravely, "rests on the Holy Scriptures. It is all fable." At these words Cellarius loses all self-possession; he raises his voice, gesticulates like a madman, stamps and strikes the table that was before him; gets into a passion, and exclaims that it is an insult to presume to speak thus to a man of God. Then Luther resumes: "St. Paul declares that the proofs of his apostleship were manifested by miracles: prove yours by miracles."—"We shall," replied the prophets. "The God whom I worship," replied Luther, "will keep a bridle hand on your gods." Stubner, who had remained more calm, fixing his eyes on the reformer, said to him with an air of inspiration: "Martin Luther, I am going to declare to you what is now passing in your soul. You are beginning to think that my doctrine is true." Luther, after a few moments' silence, replied: "The Lord rebuke thee, Satan." At these words all the prophets are transported. "The Spirit! the Spirit!" they exclaim. Luther, with that cool disdain, and that cutting, yet familiar language, which was one of his characteristics, says: "I care not a fig for your spirit." The clamour is redoubled. Cellarius was especially violent. He raged, roared, and foamed. Not a word more could be heard. At length the prophets withdrew, and the same day quitted Wittenberg.

Thus Luther had accomplished the work for which he had left his retreat. He had withstood fanaticism, and chased from the bosom of the renovated Church the enthusiasm and disorder which were trying to invade it. If with one hand the Reformation overthrew the musty decretals of Rome, with the other it repelled the pretensions of the mystics, and secured the living and immutable Word of God in possession of the territory which it had conquered. The character of the Reformation was thus well established. It behoved constantly to move between these two extremes, equally distant from the convulsive throes of fanatics and the lifeless state of the papacy.

A population aroused, misled, and broken loose from all restraint, is appeased, becomes calm and submissive, and the most perfect tranquillity is restored to a city which, a few days before, was like a raging sea.

Complete liberty was, moreover, established at Wittenberg. Luther continued to reside in the convent, and to wear the monastic dress; but every one was free to do otherwise. Communicants, in taking the Supper, might content themselves with a general, or ask a particular absolution. One established principle was to reject nothing but what was opposed to a clear and formal declaration of the Holy Scriptures. This was not indifference. On the contrary, religion was thus brought back to what constitutes its essence. Religious sentiment was drawn away from accessory forms when it had been wellnigh lost, and again placed on its true basis. Thus the Reformation was saved, and doctrine could continue to be developed in the Church in accordance with charity and truth.

CHAPTER IX.

Translation of the New Testament—Faith and Scripture—Opposition—Importance of Luther's Publication—Need of a Systematic Exposition—Melancthon's "Common Places"—Original Sin—Salvation—Free-will—Effect of the "Common Places."

No sooner was the calm re-established than the reformer turned towards his dear Melancthon, and asks his assistance in putting the finishing hand to the version of the New Testament which he had brought from the Wartburg. Melancthon, as early as 1519, had laid down the grand principle, that the Fathers ought to be explained according to Scripture, and not Scripture according to the Fathers. Continuing thoroughly to investigate the writings of the New Testament, he felt at once enraptured with their simplicity, and struck with their profundity. "Here only," was the open declaration of one so familiar with all the philosophers of antiquity—"Here only is found the true food of the soul." Hence he gladly responded to Luther's invitation, and thereafter the two friends spent many long hours together in studying and translating the inspired Word. Often did they interrupt their laborious researches to give vent to their admiration. "Reason thinks," said Luther, "Oh! if I could only once hear God!—to hear Him I would run to the end of the world. . . . Listen, then, O man, my brother! . . . God, the creator of heaven and earth, is speaking to you."

The printing of the New Testament was begun and carried on with unexampled zeal. It seemed as if the workmen themselves felt the importance of the work which they were preparing. Three presses were employed, and ten thousand sheets were printed daily.

At length, on the 21st September, appeared the complete edition of three thousand copies, in two volumes, folio, with this simple title: "The New Testament—German—Wittemberg." It bore no human name. Every German could thenceforth procure the Word of God for a moderate sum.¹

The new translation, written in the very spirit of the sacred books, in a language still recent, and displaying its many beauties for the first time, seized, enraptured, and deeply impressed the humblest of the people, as well as the most elevated classes. It was a national work; it was the people's book; it was more, it was truly the Book of God. Even enemies could not withhold their approbation of this admirable work, while some indiscreet friends of the Reformation, struck with the beauty of the work, imagined that they beheld in it a second inspiration. This translation did more to propagate Christian piety than all the other writings of Luther. The work of the sixteenth century was thus placed on a basis which could not be shaken. The Bible given to the people brought back the human mind, which for ages had been wandering in the tortuous labyrinth of scholastics, to the divine source of salvation. Accordingly, the success of the work was prodigious. In a short time all the copies were disposed of. A second edition appeared in December; and in 1533, seventeen editions of Luther's

New Testament had been printed at Wittemberg; thirteen at Augsburg; twelve at Bale; one at Erfurt; one at Grimma; one at Leipzig; thirteen at Strasburg. . . . Such were the mighty engines which lifted and transformed the Church and the world.

The first edition of the New Testament was still at press when Luther engaged in the translation of the Old Testament. This work, begun in 1522, was prosecuted without interruption. It was published in parts as it was finished, in order more rapidly to satisfy the impatience which was manifested in all quarters, and make it more easy for the poor to purchase it.

From Scripture and faith, two sources, which, in substance, are only one, evangelical life flowed, and is still diffused in the world. These two principles combated two fundamental errors; faith was opposed to the Pelagian tendency of Catholicism; Scripture, to the tradition and authority of Rome. Scripture led to faith, and faith led back to Scripture. "Man cannot do any meritorious work: the free grace of God, which he receives by faith in Christ, alone saves him." Such was the doctrine proclaimed in Christendom; and the tendency of this doctrine was to urge Christians to the study of Scripture. In fact, if faith in Christ is everything in Christianity—if the practices and ordinances of the Church are nothing—what we ought to adhere to is not the teaching of the Church, but the teaching of Jesus Christ. The tie which unites to Christ will become all in all to the believer. What cares he for the external tie which unites him to an external Church enslaved to human opinions? . . . Thus, as the doctrine of the Bible had urged Luther's contemporaries towards Jesus Christ, so the love which they had for Jesus Christ in its turn urged them towards the Bible. They returned to Scripture, not, as is imagined in our day, from a philosophical principle, from a feeling of doubt, or longing for investigation, but because they found in it the Word of Him whom they loved. "You have preached Christ to us," said they to the reformer, "enable us now to hear His own voice." And they eagerly laid hold of the sheets which were delivered to them as they would a letter come down from heaven.

But if the Bible was thus joyfully received by those who loved Christ, it was repulsed with hatred by those who preferred the traditions and practices of men. Violent persecution awaited this work of the Reformer. On hearing of Luther's publication, Rome trembled. The pen which transcribed the sacred oracles was the realization of that which the Elector Frederick had seen in his dream, and which, reaching as far as the Seven Hills, had caused the tiara of the papacy to totter. The monk in his cell, and the prince on his throne, sent forth a cry of rage. Ignorant priests shuddered at the thought that every citizen, every peasant even, would now be in a condition to debate with them on sacred subjects. The King of England denounced the work to the Elector Frederick, and Duke George of Saxony. But, previous to this, as early as November, the duke had enjoined all his subjects to deliver every copy of Luther's New Testament into the hands of the magistrates. Bavaria, Brandenburg, Austria, all the states devoted to Rome, issued similar decrees. In some towns a sacrilegious pile was erected, and the books were burnt in the market-place. Thus, in the sixteenth century, Rome renewed the attempts by which Paganism had tried to destroy the religion of Jesus Christ at the moment when the empire was escaping from priests and their idols. But who can arrest the triumphant progress of the Gospel? "Even since my prohibition," wrote Duke George, "several thousand copies have been sold and read in my states."

God, in diffusing His Word, made use of the very hands which were endeavouring to destroy it. The Catholic theologians, seeing it impossible to suppress the reformer's work, published the New Testament in a translation of their own. It was Luther's translation, with occasional corrections by the editors. No objection was made to the reading of it. Rome knew not as yet that, wherever the Word of God is established, her power is in danger. Joachim of Brandenburg gave full permission to his subjects to read any translation of the Bible, Latin or German, provided it came not from Wittenberg. The inhabitants of Germany, those of Brandenburg in particular, thus made a rapid advance in the knowledge of the truth.

The publication of the New Testament constitutes an important epoch in the Reformation. If the marriage of Feldkirchen was the first step in passing from doctrine to practice, if the abolition of monastic vows was the second, if the establishment of the Lord's Supper was the third, the publication of the New Testament was perhaps the most important of all. It effected a complete change in society—not only in the presbytery of the priest, the cell of the monk, and the service of the Church, but also in the mansions of the great, and the dwellings both of the citizens in towns, and of the rural population. When the Bible began to be read in the households of Christendom, Christendom was changed. There were thenceforth new customs, new manners, new conversations, a new life. With the publication of the New Testament the Reformation came forth from the school and the Church, and took possession of the firesides of the people.

The effect produced was immense. The Christianity of the primitive Church, brought forth by the publication of the Holy Scriptures from the oblivion into which it had fallen for ages, was thus presented to the eyes of the nation; and this fact is sufficient to justify the attacks which had been made upon Rome. The humblest individuals, provided they knew the German alphabet, women, and mechanics, (this is the account given by a contemporary, a great enemy of the Reformation,) read the New Testament with avidity. Carrying it about with them, they soon knew it by heart, while its pages gave full demonstration of the perfect accordance between the Reformation of Luther and the Revelation of God.

Still, it was only by piecemeal that the doctrine of the Bible and of the Reformation had, till then, been established. Some one truth had been established in this writing, and some one error attacked in that. The remains of the ancient edifice, and the materials of the new, lay scattered in confusion over a large space of ground; but the new edifice itself was still wanting. The publication of the New Testament was fitted to supply this want. The Reformation, on receiving this work, could say: There is my system! But as every person is ready to maintain that the system he holds is that of the Bible, the Reformation behoved to give a systematic form to what she had found in Scripture. This Melancthon did in her name.

He had advanced with cautious but sure steps in his theological career, and had always boldly published the results of his inquiries. So early as 1520, he had declared, that in several of the seven sacraments he saw only an imitation of Jewish ceremonies; and, in the infallibility of the pope, only an arrogant pretence, equally at variance with Scripture and common sense. "To combat these dogmas," said he, "we have need of more than one Hercules." Thus, Melancthon had arrived at the same point with Luther, though by a calmer and more scientific path. The moment had arrived when it behoved him, in his turn, to make a confession of his faith.

In 1521, during Luther's captivity, his celebrated work, "On the Common Places of Theology," had presented Christian Europe with a body of doctrine solidly based, and admirably proportioned. A simple and majestic system was exhibited to the astonished view of the new generation. The translation of the New Testament vindicated the Reformation to the common people: the "Common Places" of Melancthon vindicated it to the learned.

The Christian Church was fifteen centuries old, and no similar work had yet appeared. Abandoning the ordinary methods of scholastic theology, Luther's friend at length presented Christendom with a theological system derived solely from Scripture, and exhibiting a spirit of life and intellect, a force of truth and simplicity of expression in striking contrast with the subtle and pedantic systems of the schools. The most philosophical minds and the strictest theologians alike agreed in admiring it.

Erasmus described the work as a host set in admirable array against the pharisaical tyranny of false teachers; and, while declaring that he did not agree with the author on all points, he added, that though he had always loved him, he never loved him so much as after reading this work. "So true is it," says Calvin, at a later period, in introducing the work to France, "that, in treating Christian doctrine, the greatest simplicity is the greatest virtue."

But none was so much overjoyed as Luther. This work was, through life, the object of his admiration. Those isolated sounds which, in the deep emotion of his soul, his quivering hand had drawn from the harp of the prophets and apostles, were here arranged in enrapturing harmony. Those scattered stones, which he had laboriously quarried out of the sacred volume, were now formed into a majestic building. Hence, he invariably recommended the reading of this work to the youths who came to prosecute their studies at Wittenberg, saying to them: "If you would be theologians, read Melancthon."

According to Melancthon, a deep conviction of the misery to which man has been reduced by sin, is the basis on which the structure of Christian theology must be reared. This incalculable calamity is the primary fact, the generating idea in theological science, the characteristic which distinguishes it from all sciences which have reason only for their instrument.

The Christian theologian, probing to the very bottom of man's heart, explained its laws and mysterious attractions, as the philosopher of a later period explained the laws and attractions of bodies. "Original sin," said he, "is an inclination born with us, a kind of impulse which is pleasing to us, a kind of force which draws us into sin, and which has been transmitted by Adam to all his posterity. As there is in fire a native force which carries it upward, as there is in the magnet a natural power to attract steel, so there is in man a primary force disposing him to evil. I acknowledge that Socrates, Xenocrates, and Zeno, displayed constancy, temperance, and chastity,—these shadows of virtue existed in impure minds, they proceeded from the love of self, and hence they must be regarded not as genuine virtues, but as vices." These words may seem harsh; but they are so only when we misapprehend Melancthon's meaning. None was more disposed than he to recognise in the heathen virtues deserving of human esteem; but he laid down this great truth, that the sovereign law given by God to all His creatures is, to love Him above all things. Now, if man, in doing what God commands, does it, not from love to God, but from love to self, will God approve of his presuming to prefer himself to His infinite Majesty? and will there be nothing vicious in an act containing indirect rebellion against His supremacy?

The theologian of Wittenberg afterwards shows how man is saved from this wretchedness. "The apostle," says he, "calls you to contemplate the Son of God on the right hand of His Father as a powerful Mediator who intercedes for us; and He asks you to be assured that your sins are forgiven, and that you are accounted righteous, and received by the Father for the sake of His Son, offered as a victim on the cross."

What makes this first edition of the "Common Places" particularly remarkable, is the manner in which the theologian of Germany speaks of free will. He perceives, perhaps, still more clearly than Luther had done,—being more of a theologian than he,—that this doctrine could not be separated from that which constituted the essence of the Reformation. The justification of man before God, proceeds only from faith: this is the first point. This faith is produced in man's heart only by the grace of God: this is the second point. Melancthon is well aware that, by conceding to man any natural ability to believe, the great doctrine of grace established in the first point, will be destroyed in the second. He had too much discrimination and knowledge of the Scriptures to be mistaken in so weighty a matter. But he went too far. Instead of confining himself within the limits of the religious question, he takes up the metaphysical question, maintaining a fatalism, which might cause God to be regarded as the author of evil, and which, consequently, has no foundation in Scripture. "All that happens," said he, "happening necessarily according to Divine predestination, it is evident that our will has no liberty."

But the object which Melancthon had especially in view, was to present theology as a system of godliness. The schoolmen had frittered doctrine away until they deprived it of life. The reformer's task, therefore, was to bring it back to life. In subsequent editions, Melancthon saw the necessity of giving a clear exposition of doctrine. But the case was somewhat different in 1521. "To know Christ," said he, "is to know His benefits. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans, when wishing to give a summary of Christian doctrine, does not philosophize on the mystery of the Trinity, on the mode of the incarnation, on creation, action, and passion, &c. Of what, then, does he speak? Of the law—of sin—of grace. On these the knowledge of Christ depends."

The publication of this system of doctrine was of inestimable service to the cause of the Gospel. Calumny was refuted, and prejudice subdued. In churches, courts, and universities, Melancthon was admired for his genius, and loved for the beauties of his character. Even those who did not know the author were won to his creed by his work. Several had been repulsed by the harshness and occasional violence of Luther's language; but here was a man who, with great elegance of style, exquisite taste, admirable clearness, and the most exact method, expounded the powerful truths which had suddenly burst forth and shaken the world. The work was in general request, was read with avidity, and studied with ardour. So much meekness and modesty won all hearts. So much nobleness and force subdued them; while the upper classes of society, till then undecided, were gained by a wisdom which expressed itself in such beautiful language.

On the other hand, the enemies of the truth, whom Luther's formidable blows had not struck down, remained for some time mute and disconcerted after the appearance of Melancthon's treatise. It told them that there was another man as worthy of their hatred as Luther. "Alas!" they exclaimed, "unhappy Germany! to what extremities must this new birth reduce you?"

From 1521 to 1595, seventy-seven editions of the "Common Places" appeared, without counting translations. After the Bible, it is, perhaps, the book which contributed most powerfully to the establishment of evangelical doctrine.

CHAPTER X.

Opposition—Henry VIII.—Wolsey—The Queen—Fisher—Thomas More—Luther's Books Burnt—Henry Attacks Luther—Presentation to the Pope—Effect on Luther—Force and Violence—His Book—Reply of the Bishop of Rochester—Reply by More—Step by the King.

WHILE the "grammarian" Melancthon was, by his mild accents, giving such effectual aid to Luther, men in power, hostile to the reformer, were turning with violence against him. Escaped from the Wartburg, he had again appeared on the stage of the world, and at the news his old enemies had resumed all their rage.

Luther had been three months and a-half at Wittenberg, when rumour, with all its exaggerations, brought him the news that one of the greatest kings of Christendom had risen up against him. The head of the house of the Tudors, a prince, uniting in his person the houses both of York and Lancaster, and on whose head, after torrents of blood had been shed, the red rose and the white rose were at length combined,—Henry VIII., the powerful king of England, who aspired to re-establish the ancient influence of his crown on the continent, and especially in France, had just composed a book against the poor monk of Wittenberg. In a letter to Lange, 26th June, 1522, Luther writes: "A great boast is made of a little book by the King of England."

Henry VIII. was then thirty-one years of age; "he was tall, strong-built, and proportioned, and had an air of authority and empire;" his features expressing the vigour of his intellect. Of a vehement temper, determined to make everything bend to the violence of his passions, and thirsting for glory, he at first concealed his faults under a kind of boisterousness common to youth, and was surrounded by flatterers who encouraged them. He often repaired with his band of favourites to the house of his chaplain, Thomas Wolsey, son of a butcher of Ipswich. This man, gifted with great abilities, of an excessive ambition, and an arrogance which knew no bounds, being patronized by the Bishop of Winchester, chancellor of the kingdom, had rapidly advanced in the favour of his master, whom he attracted to his house by the seduction of pleasures and irregularities, in which the young prince would not have ventured to indulge in his own palace. Such is the account given by Polydore Virgil, at that time the pope's sub-collector in England. At these licentious meetings the chaplain outstripped the young courtiers who accompanied Henry VIII. He was seen forgetting the gravity of a minister of the altar, singing, dancing, laughing, frolicking, using obscene language, and fencing. In this way he soon obtained the first place in the king's council, and governing the kingdom with absolute sway, was courted by all the princes of Christendom.

Henry, living in a round of balls, festivities, and jousts, foolishly squandered the treasures which had been slowly amassed by the avarice of his father. Magnificent tournaments succeeded each other without interruption. The king, who, in manly beauty, surpassed all the combatants, invariably took the lead. If, for an instant, the contest appeared doubtful, the dexterity and strength of the prince, or the adroit policy of those opposed to him, assured him the victory, and the arena resounded with shouts of applause. The vanity of the young prince was inflated by these easy triumphs; and there was no species of success to which he did not think himself entitled to aspire. The queen was occasionally present among the spectators. Her grave figure, her downcast look, her sedate and melancholy air, contrasted with the boisterous sounds of these festivities. Henry VIII., shortly after his accession to the throne, had, for reasons of state, married Catherine of Arragon, who was five years older than himself, the widow of his brother, Arthur, and aunt to Charles V. While her husband was giving himself up to pleasure, the virtuous Catherine, with a piety truly Spanish, rose at midnight to take silent part in the prayers of the monks. She threw herself upon her knees, without cushion or carpet. At five o'clock in the morning, after a short repose, she was again up; she was clad in the habit of St. Francis; for she had entered the tertiary order of this saint; then, hastily covering it with royal vestments, she repaired to the church at six, to the holy offices.

Two beings, living in two such different worlds, could not remain long united.

Romish piety, however, had other representatives besides Catherine at the court of Henry VIII. John Fisher, bishop of Rochester, on the borders of seventy, equally distinguished by his learning and the purity of his morals, was the object of general veneration. He had been the oldest councillor of Henry VII.; and the Duchess of Richmond, the grandmother of Henry VIII., when on her death-bed, had sent for Fisher, and recommended to his care the youth and inexperience of her grandson. Amidst his irregularities, the king long venerated the bishop as a father.

A man much younger than Fisher, a layman and lawyer, had begun to attract general attention by his genius and the nobleness of his character. He was named Thomas More, and was the son of a judge of the King's Bench. Poor, austere, indefatigable in exertion, he had endeavoured at twenty to extinguish the passions of youth by wearing a hair shirt, and subjecting himself to discipline. One day, when attending mass, being sent for by the king, he replied, that the service of God must take precedence of that of his majesty. Wolsey brought him under the notice of Henry VIII., who employed him on different embassies, and vowed to have a great affection for him. He often sent for him, and conversed with him about the planets, Wolsey, and theology.

In fact, the king himself was no stranger to the Romish doctrines. It would even appear that, if Arthur had lived, Henry would have been destined to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury. Thomas Aquinas, St. Bonaventure; tournaments, festivals; Elizabeth Blunt, and other mistresses besides, all mingled in the thoughts and actions of this prince, who caused masses of his own composition to be chanted in his chapel.

As soon as Henry VIII. heard of Luther, his wrath was kindled against him; and scarcely was the decree of the Diet of Worms known in England, when he ordered the papal bull to be executed against the reformer's books. On the 12th May, 1521, Thomas Wolsey, who, to the office of Chancellor of England, united those of Cardinal and Roman legate, repaired to St. Paul's in solemn procession. This man, whose pride knew no bounds, thought himself the equal of kings. His chair was of gold, his bed of gold, and cloth of gold covered the table at which he dined. On this occasion he displayed great pomp. The haughty prelate walked, surrounded by his household, consisting of eight hundred individuals, among whom were barons, knights, and cadets, of the most distinguished families, who hoped by serving him to obtain public appointments. Gold and silk were not only conspicuous in his dress, (he was the first ecclesiastic who had ventured to clothe so sumptuously,) but also on the trappings and harness of his horses. Before him a priest of a stately figure carried a rod, surrounded by a crucifix; behind him another, no less stately, carried the archiepiscopal cross of York; a nobleman, walking at his side, carried his cardinal's hat. He was attended by nobles, prelates, ambassadors of the pope and the emperor, and these were followed by a long train of miles, carrying trunks with the richest and most splendid coverings. At London, amidst this magnificent procession, the writings of the poor monk of Wittemberg were carried to the flames. On arriving at the cathedral, the proud priest made even his cardinal's hat be placed upon the altar. The virtuous Bishop of Rochester took his station at the foot of the cross, and there, in an animated tone, inveighed against heresy. The impious writings of the heresiarch were then brought forward, and devoutly burned in presence of an immense crowd. Such was the first news which England received of the Reformation.

Henry did not choose to stop here. This prince, whose sword was ever raised against his enemies, his wives, and his favourites, in a letter to the elector-palatine, thus expresses himself: "It is the devil who, by Luther as his organ, has kindled this immense conflagration. If Luther will not be converted, let the flames consume him and his writings."

Even this was not enough. Henry, convinced that the progress of heresy was owing to the ignorance of the German princes, thought that the moment was come for displaying all his learning. The conquests of his battle-axe allowed him not to doubt of the conquests reserved for his pen. But another passion still—one which is always strong in little minds, vanity—spurred on the king. He felt humbled at having no title to oppose those of "Catholic" and "Most Christian," borne by the kings of Spain and France, and he was long a suppliant at the Romish court for a similar distinction. What better fitted to procure such a title than an attack upon heresy? Henry, therefore, threw aside the royal purple, and descended from his lofty throne into the arena of theologians. He made a compilation from Thomas Aquinas, Peter Lombard, Alexander Hales, and Bonaventure; and the world beheld the publication of the "Defence of the Seven Sacraments against Martin Luther, by the most invincible King of England, France, and Ireland, Henry, Eighth of the name."

"I will throw myself before the Church," said the King of England in this writing; "I will receive in my breast the poisoned darts of the enemy who is assailing her. To this the present state of affairs calls me. Every servant of Jesus Christ, whatever be his age, rank, or sex, must bestir himself against the common enemy of Christendom.

"Let us arm ourselves with double armour—with heavenly weapons, that by the arms of truth we may vanquish him who combats with the arms of error. But let us also arm ourselves with terrestrial armour, in order that, if he proves obstinate in his wickedness, the hand of the executioner may constrain him to silence; and he may thus, for once at least, be useful to the world by his exemplary punishment."

Henry VIII. could not conceal the contempt which he felt for his able opponent. "This man," said the crowned theologian, "seems as if he were in labour: he makes incredible efforts, but only brings forth wind. Pluck off the dress of arrogant expression in which his absurdities are clothed, just as an ape is clothed in purple, and what will remain? . . . Miserable, empty sophistry!"

The king defends, in succession, the mass, penance, confirmation, orders, and extreme unction. He spares no insulting epithets, calling his opponent, by turns, an infernal wolf, a venomous viper, a limb of the devil. Even Luther's honesty is assailed. Henry VIII. crushes the mendicant monk with his royal anger, and in the words of a historian, "writes as 'twere with his sceptre."

Still, however, it must be admitted, the work was not bad for the author and his age. The style is not without vigour. But the public could not content themselves with merely doing it justice. A burst of applause received the theological treatise of the powerful King of England. "The most learned work that ever the sun saw!"¹ exclaimed some.—"It deserves," rejoined others, "to be compared with the works of St. Augustine. He is a Constantine, a Charlemagne!"—"He is more," exclaimed a third party, "he is a second Solomon!"

These exclamations were soon heard beyond the limits of England. Henry desired the Dean of Windsor, John Clarke, his ambassador to the pope, to deliver his book to the sovereign pontiff. Leo X. received the ambassador in full consistency. Clarke, in presenting the royal work, said: "The king, my master, assures you that, after refuting the errors of Luther with his pen, he is ready to combat his adherents with the sword." Leo X., deeply gratified with this promise, replied that the book of the King of England could only have been composed with the aid of the Holy Spirit, and named Henry "Defender of the Faith,"—a title which the kings of England still bear.

The reception given to the king's work at Rome contributed greatly to its circulation. In a few months several thousands of copies issued from different presses. "The whole Christian world," says Cochlæus, "was filled with admiration and joy."

These extravagant praises increased the vanity of the chief of the Tudors. He was brought to fancy he had written with some degree of inspiration. Afterwards he would not submit to the least contradiction. To him the papacy was no longer at Rome, but at Greenwich; and infallibility rested on his own head. At a later period this contributed greatly to the Reformation of England.

Luther read Henry's book with mingled disdain, impatience, and indignation. The falsehood and insults which it contained; but especially the air of contempt and pity affected by the king, irritated the doctor of Wittemberg in the highest degree. The thought that the pope had crowned the writing, and that the enemies of the Gospel were everywhere trampling on the Reformation and the reformer, as already overthrown and vanquished, increased his indignation. Besides, what occasion had he for delicacy? Was he not fighting for a King greater than all the kings of the earth? Evangelical mildness seemed to him out of season: eye for eye, tooth for tooth. He kept no measure. Pursued, goaded, tracked, and wounded, the raging lion turned round and prepared to tear his enemy. The elector, Spalatin, Melancthon, and Bugenhagen, tried in vain to appease him. They would have prevented him from replying; but he was not to be stopped. "I will not deal mildly with the King of England," said he; "it is in vain (I know it is) to humble myself, to yield, beseech, and try the ways of peace. I will at length shew myself more terrible than the ferocious beasts who are constantly butting me with their horns. I will let them feel mine: I will preach and irritate Satan until he wears himself out, and falls down exhausted. If this heretic retracts not, says the new Thomas, Henry VIII., he must be burnt. Such are the weapons now employed against me; first, the fury of stupid asses and Thomastical swine, and then the fire. Very well! Let these swine come forward, if they dare, and burn me! Here I am, waiting for them. My wish is, that my ashes, thrown, after my death, into a thousand seas, may arise, pursue, and engulf this abominable crew. Living, I will be the enemy of the papacy; burnt, I will be its destruction! Go, swine of St. Thomas, do what seemeth to you good. You shall ever find Luther as a bear in your way, and a lion in your path. He will thunder upon you from all quarters, and leave you no peace until he has brayed your brains of iron, and ground to powder your foreheads of brass."

At the outset Luther upbraids Henry VIII. with having based his doctrines only on the decrees and sentences of men. "For me," says he, "I cease not to cry, The Gospel! the Gospel!—Christ! Christ!—while my opponents cease not to reply: 'Customs! customs!—Ordinances! ordinances!—Fathers! Fathers!' Let your faith, says St. Paul, stand not in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God. And the apostle, by this thunderbolt from heaven, overthrows and scatters, like the dust before the wind, all the silly crotchets of this Henry. In confusion and consternation the Thomists, the papists, and the Henrys, fell to the ground before the thunder of these words."

He afterwards refutes the king's production in detail, overthrowing his arguments, one by one, with clearness, ability, and a thorough knowledge of the Holy Scriptures and the history of the Church; but also with a confidence, disdain, and occasionally a violence, at which we must not be surprised.

On arriving at the conclusion, Luther again expresses indignation at his opponent for drawing arguments only from the Fathers: this was the essence of the whole controversy. "To all the sayings of Fathers, men, angels, devils," says he, "I oppose not the antiquity of custom, not the multitude, but the Word of the Eternal Majesty, the Gospel, which they themselves are constrained to approve. By it I hold; on it I rest; in it I glory, triumph, and exult over papists, Thomists, Henrys, and all the hellish stye. The King of heaven is with me, and therefore I fear nothing, even should a thousand Augustines, a thousand Cyprians, and a thousand churches, of which Henry is the defender, rise up against me. It is a small matter for me to despise and lash an earthly king, who himself has not feared, in his writing, to blaspheme the King of heaven, and profane His holiness by the most audacious falsehood."

"Papists!" exclaims he, in concluding, "will you not desist from your vain pursuits? Do as you please,—the result, however, must be, that before the Gospel which I, Martin Luther, have preached, popes, bishops, priests, monks, princes, devils, death, sin, and whatever is not Jesus Christ, or in Jesus Christ, shall fall and perish."

Thus spoke the poor monk. His violence, certainly, cannot be excused, if it is judged by the rule to which he himself appeals,—viz., the Word of God. We cannot even justify it by alleging either the coarseness of the age,—for Melancthon was able to discover his courtesy in his writings,—or the energy of his disposition, for if this energy had some effect on his language, passion had still more. The best course, therefore, is not to attempt to defend it. However, to be just, let it be observed, that in the sixteenth century this violence did not seem so strange as it appears in the present day. The learned were then one of the existing powers as well as princes. Henry had attacked Luther by becoming an author. Luther replied conformably to the law received in the Republic of Letters,—viz., that the thing to be considered is the truth of what is said, and not the quality of him who says it. Let us also add, that when this very king turned against the pope, the insults which he received from the Romish writers, and the pope himself, far exceeded anything that had been said by Luther.

Besides, if Luther called Doctor Eck an ass, and Henry VIII. a hog, he indignantly rejected the intervention of the secular arm; whereas Dr. Eck wrote a dissertation to prove that heretics ought to be burned; and Henry erected scaffolds agreeably to the precepts of the doctor of Ingolstadt.

A deep sensation was produced at the king's court. Surrey, Wolsey, and the tribe of courtiers broke off the pomps and festivities of Greenwich, to vent their indignation in contumely and sarcasm. The venerable Bishop of Rochester, who had been delighted when he saw the young prince, who had been early committed to his charge, breaking a lance for the Church, was deeply wounded by the monk's attack, and immediately replied to it. His words are very characteristic of his time and his Church. "Catch for us the small foxes that spoil the vines, says Christ in the Song of Songs. This shews," says Fisher, "that we must lay hands on heretics before they grow up. Now Luther has become a great fox,—a fox so old, and cunning, and malicious, that it is very difficult to catch him. What do I say?—a fox! . . . He is a mad dog, a ravening wolf, a cruel bear, or rather, all these animals at once; for the monster has several beasts in his bosom."

Thomas More also descended into the arena to encounter the monk of Wittenberg. Although a layman, he pushed his zeal against the Reformation the length of fanaticism, if he did not push it the length of blood. When young noblemen undertake the defence of the papacy, their violence often outstrips that of ecclesiastics themselves. "Reverend brother, father, drunkard, deserter of the Augustine order, mis-shapen bacchanalian as to both kinds of law, untaught teacher of sacred theology!" Such are the terms addressed to the reformer by one of the most illustrious men of his time. Then, explaining the mode in which Luther has composed his book against Henry, he says: "He called together his companions, and asked each to go his way, and rummage for buffoonery and insult. One went to waggons and boatmen, another to baths and gambling-houses, a third to barbers' shops and taverns, a fourth to mills and brothels. Everything they heard most insolent, filthy, and infamous, they noted down, and bringing it back, threw it into that impure sink called the mind of Luther."—"If he retracts his lies and calumnies," he continues, "if he lays aside his folly and fury, if he again swallows his abominations, he will find some one to debate gravely with him. But if he continues as he has begun, jesting, raging, playing the mountebank, slandering, vomiting nothing but filth, . . . then let others do as they will; for us, we prefer leaving the little friar alone with his fury and his filth." Thomas More had better have reserved his own. Luther had never stooped so low in his style. He made no reply.

This production increased Henry's attachment to More. He once paid him a visit in his modest dwelling at Chelsea. After dinner, the king walked with him in his garden, with his arm resting on the shoulder of his favourite; while Lady More and her children, concealed behind the lattice, could not withdraw their astonished eyes. After one of these walks, More, who knew Henry's character, said to his wife: "If my head could gain him a single castle in France, he would never hesitate."

The king, thus defended by the Bishop of Rochester and his future chancellor, had no occasion to resume his pen. Confounded at seeing himself treated in the face of Europe as a mere author, Henry abandoned the dangerous position he had taken up, and throwing away his theological pen, had recourse to the more efficacious methods of diplomacy.

An ambassador set off from the court at Greenwich with a letter from the king to the elector and the dukes of Saxony. Henry thus expressed himself: "Luther, the true dragon fallen from heaven, is pouring out his venomous floods on the earth. He is stirring up revolt in the Church of Jesus Christ, abolishing the laws, insulting the powers, exciting laymen against priests, laymen and priests against the pope, and subjects against kings; his only wish being to see Christians fighting together and destroying each other, and the enemies of our faith grinning with delight over the scene of carnage.

"What is this doctrine, which he terms evangelical, but the doctrine of Wickliffe? Now, most honoured uncles, I know what your ancestors did to destroy it. They pursued it in Bohemia as if it had been a wild beast, and causing it to fall into a trap, then enclosed and barricaded it. You will not allow it to escape by your negligence, steal into Saxony, and take possession of all Germany, sending forth from its fuming nostrils the fire of hell, and spreading far and wide the conflagration which your country so often desired to extinguish in its blood.

"Wherefore, most excellent friends, I feel myself called to exhort you, and even to implore you, by all that is most sacred, speedily to strangle the cursed sect of Luther. Put no one to death if it can possibly be avoided; but if heretical obstinacy continues, shed blood without fear, in order that this abominable sect may cease from under heaven."

The elector and his brother referred the king to the future council. Thus Henry was far from succeeding in his object. "So great a man mingling in the dispute," says Paul Sarpi, "served to excite more curiosity, and procure universal favour for Luther, as usually happens in combats and tournaments, where the spectators always incline to the weakest party, and take pleasure in giving a higher place to his humble exploits.

CHAPTER XI.

General Movement—The Monks—How the Reformation is Accomplished—Ordinary Believers—The Old and the New Teachers—Printing and Literature—Booksellers and Hawkers.

In fact, an immense movement was taking place. The Reformation which, after the Diet of Worms, was supposed to be shut up with its first teacher within the narrow chamber of a strong castle, burst forth, spreading throughout the empire, and even throughout Christendom. The two parties, till then confounded, began to stand apart from each other; and the partisans of a monk who had nothing on his side but his eloquence, fearlessly took up their position, confronting the servants of Charles V. and Leo X. Luther had just quitted the walls of the Wartburg, the pope had communicated all who had adhered to him, the imperial diet had condemned his doctrine, princes were hastening to crush it in the greater part of the Germanic States, the ministers of Rome were tearing it to pieces before the people by their violent invectives, the other states of Christendom were calling upon Germany to sacrifice an enemy, whose attacks they dreaded even at a distance; and yet this new and not numerous party, without organization, without connecting ties, with nothing, in short, to concentrate the common strength, had already, by the energy of their faith and the rapidity of their conquests, spread terror over the vast, ancient, and mighty domain of Rome. Everywhere, as in the first breathings of spring, the seed was seen bursting forth from the ground without effort, and, as it were, spontaneously. Every day gave evidence of new progress. Individuals, villages, burghs, whole towns, united in the new confession of the name of Jesus Christ. There was stern resistance and dreadful persecution; but the mysterious power which urged forward the people was irresistible, and the persecuted hastening on and advancing, amid exile, imprisonment, and scaffolds, were everywhere succeeding against the persecutors.

The monastic orders which Rome had stretched over Christendom, like a net destined to take souls and hold them captive, were the first to break these bonds, and rapidly propagate the new doctrine throughout the Western Church. The Augustines of Saxony had advanced with Luther, having, like him, that intimate experience of the Divine Word which gives an interest in God himself, and so dispenses with Rome and her arrogant pretensions. But in the other convents of the order, evangelical light had also arisen. Sometimes it was old men who, like Staupitz, had preserved the sound doctrines of truth in the bosom of ill-used Christendom, and were now asking Go!

to let them depart in peace, because their eyes had seen His salvation. At other times, it was young men who, with all the eagerness of early life, had received the lessons of Luther. At Nuremberg, Osnabruck, Dettingen, Ratisbon, Hesse, Wurtemberg, Strasburg, Antwerp, the Augustine convents turned towards Christ, and by their courage provoked the wrath of Rome.

But the movement was not confined to the Augustines. They were initiated in the monasteries of the other orders by bold individuals, who, in spite of the clamour of such monks as were unwilling to abandon their carnal observances, in spite of wrath, contempt, and sentences of condemnation, in spite of discipline and cloistral prisons, fearlessly raised their voice for this holy and precious truth, which, after so many painful searches, so many distressing doubts, so many internal struggles, they had found at last. In the greater part of the cloisters, the most spiritually minded, the most pious and best informed of the inmates declared in favour of reform. In the Franciscan convent at Ulm, Eberlin and Kettenbach attacked the servile works of Monachism, and the superstitious practices of the Church, with an eloquence which might have carried a nation, calling, in one breath, for the suppression of the abodes of monks and the abodes of debauchery. Stephen Kempe, another Franciscan, standing alone, preached the Gospel at Hamburg, and with undaunted breast, withstood the hatred, envy, menaces, snares, and attacks of priests, irritated when they saw the people forsaking their altars, and crowding with enthusiasm to his sermons.

Often even the heads of convents were the first to move in the direction of reform. At Halberstadt, Neuenwerk, Halle, and Sagan, the priors set their monks the example, or at least declared, that if any monk felt his conscience burdened by monastic vows, so far from detaining him in the convent, they would take him on their shoulders to carry him out.

In fact, throughout Germany, monks were seen depositing their frocks and cowls at the door of their monastery. Some were expelled by the violence of the friars or abbots; others of a mild and pacific character could not endure the disputes which were perpetually springing up, the insult, clamour, and hatred which pursued them even in their sleep. The majority were convinced that the monastic life was opposed to the will of God and the Christian life. Some had arrived gradually at this conviction, and others all at once while reading some passage of the Bible. Idleness, coarseness, ignorance, and meanness, the essential characteristics of the mendicant orders, produced ineffable disgust in men of an exalted spirit, who felt it impossible any longer to endure the company of their vulgar associates. A Franciscan, begging his round, presented himself one day, with his box in his hand, at a smithy in Nuremberg: "Why," said the smith to him, "do you not rather gain your bread by working with your own hands?" At these words the sturdy monk threw away his dress, and seizing the hammer with a vigorous hand, made it fall with force on the anvil. The useless mendicant had become an honest mechanic. His box and frock were sent back to the monastery.

Nor were monks the only persons who ranged themselves under the standard of the Gospel; priests in still greater numbers preached the new doctrine. But it did not even need preachers to diffuse it—it often acted on the minds of men, and awoke them from their deep sleep before any one had addressed them.

In towns, burghs, and even villages, Luther's writings were read in the evening at the fireside, or in the house of the schoolmaster. Some of the inhabitants were struck by this reading; they applied to the Bible to clear up their doubts, and were astonished when they saw the strange contrast between their Christianity and the Christianity of the Bible. Hesitating for a time between Rome and the Holy Scriptures, they took refuge in that living Word which shed a sudden and delightful light on their souls. Meanwhile, some evangelical preacher appeared, perhaps a priest, perhaps a monk. He spoke with eloquence and conviction; he declared that Christ had satisfied fully for the sins of the people, proving from Scripture the vanity of human works and penances. A formidable opposition burst forth. The clergy, and frequently the magistrates, used every effort to bring back those souls which they would have destroyed; but there was in the new preaching an accordance with Scripture, and a hidden energy which won men's hearts, subduing the most rebellious. At the risk of their goods, or, if need were, at the risk of their lives, they embraced the cause of the Gospel, and abandoned the barren fanatical orators of the papacy. Sometimes the people, irritated at being so long imposed upon, compelled the priests to withdraw; but more frequently the priests, abandoned by their flocks, without tithes, without offerings, went off in sadness of their own accord, to go and seek a living elsewhere. And while the props of the ancient hierarchy withdrew sullen and downcast, sometimes taking leave of their old flocks in words of malediction, the people, overjoyed at having found truth and liberty, gathered round the new preachers with acclamation, and eager to hear the Word, carried them, as it were, in triumph into the church and the pulpit.

A powerful doctrine, which came from God, was then renovating society. The people or their leaders frequently wrote for some man of known faith to come and enlighten them; and he, for the love of the Gospel, forthwith abandoned all—family, friends, and country. Persecution often forced the friends of the Reformation to quit their homes. Arriving in some place where it was not yet known, finding some house which offered an asylum to poor travellers, they spoke of the Gospel, read some pages of it to the attentive burghers, and obtained leave, perhaps at the request of their new friends, to preach one sermon in the church. Then a vast conflagration burst forth in the town, and the utmost efforts were unable to extinguish it. If permission to preach in the church was denied, they preached elsewhere. Every place became a church. At Hunsim, in Holstein, Hermann Tast, who was on his way from Wittenberg, and against whom the parish clergy had shut the church, preached to an immense crowd in the burying-ground, under the shade of two large trees, not far from the spot where, seven centuries before, Anshar had proclaimed the Gospel to the pagans. At Arnstadt, the Augustine, Gaspard Güttel, preached in the market-place. At Dantzic, the Gospel was preached on a hill in the neighbourhood of the town. At Gosslar, a student of Wittenberg preached the new doctrine in a grove of linden trees,—a circumstance which procured for the evangelical Christians the name of Linden Brothers.

produced a profound impression. The great idea of the equality of all men, and of an universal brotherhood in Jesus Christ, enraptured those who had long been weighed down under the yoke of feudalism and the papacy of the Middle Ages.

Often unlettered Christians, with the New Testament in their hands, offered to defend the reformed doctrine. The Catholics, adhering to Rome, withdrew in alarm; for the business of studying the Holy Scriptures was committed to priests and monks only. These, accordingly, saw themselves obliged to come forward. A discussion commenced; but the priests and monks, overwhelmed by laymen with quotations from the Holy Scriptures, soon knew not what to oppose to them. . . . "Unfortunately," says Cocheleus, "Luther had persuaded his followers that faith was to be given only to the oracle of the sacred books." A shout arose in the assembly, and proclaimed the shameful ignorance of these old theologians, who, till then, had passed with their party for men of learning.

The humblest individuals, even the weaker sex, with the help of the Word, persuaded and gained converts. Extraordinary acts are done in extraordinary times. At Ingolstadt, under the very eyes of Doctor Eck, a young weaver read the writings of Luther to the assembled multitude. In the same place, the university having resolved to force a retraction from a pupil of Melanethon, a female, named Argula of Staufen, undertook his defence, and challenged the professors to a public disputation. Women and children, artisans and soldiers, were more learned in the Bible than teachers in schools, and priests at altars.

Christendom was divided into two camps, whose appearance presented a striking contrast. Confronting the old supporters of the hierarchy, who had neglected the acquisition of languages and the cultivation of letters, (this is the account given by one of themselves,) stood a generous youth, accustomed to study, deeply read in the Scriptures, and familiar with the masterpieces of antiquity. Gifted with a ready understanding, an elevated mind, and an intrepid heart, these youths soon acquired such knowledge, that for a long time none could compete with them. Their superiority to their contemporaries consisted, not merely in their living faith, but also in an elegance of style, a savour of antiquity, a true philosophy, a knowledge of the world, completely unknown to the theologians veteris

CATHEDRAL, ULM.

While the priests were exhibiting in the eyes of the people a sordid avidity, the new preachers thus addressed them: "We received it freely, and we give it to you freely." An idea often proclaimed from the pulpit by the new preachers,—viz., that Rome had, of old, sent the Germans a corrupted Gospel, and that Germany was now, for the first time, hearing the Word of Jesus Christ in its divine and primitive beauty, farina, (of the old stock,) as Cochleus himself designates them. Accordingly, when these young defenders of the Reformation happened to come in contact, at some public meeting, with the Roman doctors, they attacked them with so much ease and confidence, that the illiterate doctors hesitated, became confused, and fell, deservedly, into universal contempt.

The ancient edifice gave way under the weight of superstition and ignorance, and the new edifice was reared up on the basis of faith and knowledge. New elements were introduced into common life. Lethargy and stupidity were everywhere succeeded by a spirit of inquiry, and thirst for instruction. An active, enlightened, and living faith took the place of superstitious observances and ascetic contemplation. Devout works succeeded devotee practices and penances. The pulpit was preferred to the ceremonies of the altar, and the ancient and sovereign authority of the Word of God was again established in the Church.

Printing, that mighty engine which the fifteenth century had invented, seconded all these efforts, and by means of its powerful projectiles, was continually making breaches in the walls of the enemy.

In Germany, an immense impulse was given to popular literature. Up to 1517, only thirty-five publications had appeared; but the number increased with astonishing rapidity after the publication of Luther's theses. In 1518, we find seventy-one different works; in 1519, a hundred and eleven; in 1520, two hundred and eight; in 1521, two hundred and eleven; in 1522, three hundred and forty-seven; in 1523, four hundred and ninety-eight. . . . And where were all these published? Almost invariably at Wittenberg. And who was their author? Most frequently, Luther. In 1522, two hundred and thirty writings of the Reformer appeared; and in the following year, one hundred and eighty-three. This same year the whole of the Catholic publications amounted only to twenty. The literature of Germany was thus formed at the same time as its religion, amidst contention; and already gave promise of being learned, profound, bold, and active, as it has since appeared. The national mind was thus displayed, for the first time, in an unsophisticated form, and at the very moment of its birth was baptized with the fire of Christian enthusiasm.

What Luther and his friends composed, others disseminated. Monks, convinced of the unlawfulness of monastic ties, desirous to substitute a life of activity for long idleness, but too ignorant to be themselves preachers of the Word, traversed the provinces, and visited the hamlets and huts, selling the works of Luther and his friends. Germany was soon covered with these bold colporteurs. Printers and booksellers eagerly received all the writings in defence of the Reformation, but declined those of the opposite party, which were usually a mere compound of ignorance and barbarism. When any one of them ventured to sell a book in favour of the papacy, and to expose it at fairs, at Frankfurt, or elsewhere, dealers, purchasers, or literary men assailed him with a shower of derision and sarcasm. In vain had the emperor and the princes issued severe edicts against the writings of the Reformers. Whenever an inquisitorial visit was to be made, the merchants, who had secret notice of it, concealed the books which were proscribed; and the people, always eager for what is sought to be kept from them, afterwards got possession of these writings, and read them more greedily than before. These things were not confined to Germany. Luther's writings were translated into French, Spanish, English, and Italian, and disseminated among these nations.

CHAPTER XII.

Luther at Zwickau—The Castle of Freyberg—Worms—Frankfort—Universal Movement—Wittenberg, the Centre of the Reformation—Luther's Sentiments.

If the humblest individuals inflicted such heavy blows on Rome, what must it have been when the monk of Wittenberg made his own voice be heard? Shortly after the defeat of the new prophets, Luther, dressed as a layman, crossed the territory of Duke George in a car. His frock was concealed, and his appearance was that of an ordinary citizen of the country. Had he been recognised, or had he fallen into the hands of the angry duke, perhaps it would have been all over with him. He was going to preach at Zwickau, the cradle of the new prophets. No sooner was this known at Schneeberg, Annaberg, and the neighbourhood, than crowds began to flock to it. Fourteen thousand persons arrived in the town; and as there was no church capable of containing such a multitude, Luther got up on the balcony of the town-house, and preached to an audience of twenty-five thousand, who covered the public square, some of them seated on a heap of building materials which happened to have been laid down. The servant of Christ was speaking with fervour on the election of grace, when suddenly some cries were heard from the middle of the audience. An old woman, with haggard looks, was stretching out her bony arms from the top of the stone on which she stood, and seemed desirous, by her earnest gesture, to keep back the crowd who were going to throw themselves at the feet of Jesus Christ. Her wild cries interrupted the preacher. Seekendorff says: "It was the devil, in the shape of an old woman, trying to excite a disturbance." But it was in vain: the voice of the reformer having silenced the evil spirit, thousands of hearers were seized with a feeling of enthusiasm, exchanging looks, and shaking hands with each other. The monks, struck dumb, could not quell the storm, and shortly saw themselves obliged to quit Zwickau.

Duke Henry, the brother of Duke George, was residing in the castle of Freyberg; he was married to a princess of Mecklenburg, who, the year before, had given him a son, named Maurice. To a love of the table and pleasure, Henry joined the bluntness and rudeness of a soldier. He was, moreover, pious, after the fashion of the times, and had made one pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and another to St. James of Compostella. "At Compostella," he was wont to say, "I placed a hundred gold florins on the altar of the saint, saying to him: O! St. James, it was to please you I came hither,—I make you a present of this money; but if those rogues (the priests) take it from you, I cannot help it: look, then, to yourself."

A Fraunceiscan and a Dominiccan, disciples of Luther, had for some time been preaching the Gospel at Freyberg. The duchess, whose piety had inspired her with a horror at heresy, listened to their discourses, wondering how that sweet doctrine of a Saviour could be the doctrine which she had been made to dread so much. Her eyes were gradually opened, and she found peace in Jesus Christ. No sooner did it reach the ears of Duke George, that the Gospel was preached at Freyberg, than he prayed his brother to set his face against these novelties. Chancellor Strehlin and the canons seconded him with their fanaticism. There was a great explosion at the court of Freyberg. Duke Henry harshly reprimanded and upbraided the pious duchess, who, on more than one occasion, shed tears over the cradle of her child. Her prayers and gentleness gradually won the duke's heart; the harshness of his nature was softened, and complete harmony was established between the spouses, who could now pray together beside their son. A great destiny was reserved for this child; from this cradle, over which a Christian mother had so often poured forth her griefs, God was one day to bring forth the defender of the Reformation.

The inhabitants of Worms had been deeply moved by Luther's intrepidity. The magistrates durst not contravene the imperial decree, and all the churches were shut; but in an open space, covered with an immense assemblage, a preacher from a pulpit of rude construction preached the Gospel with power. If the authorities made their appearance, the crowd dispersed in a moment, secretly carrying off the pulpit; but when the storm blew over, it was immediately erected in some more distant spot, whither the crowd again flocked to hear the Word of Christ. This temporary pulpit was daily carried from place to place, and served to confirm the people in the impression which they had received from the grand scene at the Diet.

In one of the free towns of the empire, Frankfurt on the Maine, the greatest agitation prevailed. Ibach, a courageous evangelist, was there preaching salvation by Jesus Christ. The clergy,—of whom Coehleus, so well known by his writings and his hatred, was one,—enraged at this audacious colleague, denounced him to the Archbishop of Mentz. The council, though timid, tried to defend him, but in vain; he was deposed by the clergy, and banished. Rome triumphed, and all seemed lost. The faithful in humble life thought themselves for ever deprived of the Word. But at the moment when the citizens seemed disposed to yield to those tyrannical priests, several of the nobility declared in favour of the Gospel. Max of Molnheim, Hurnauth of Cronberg, George of Stockheim, Emeric of Reiffenstein, whose estates were in the neighbourhood of Frankfurt, wrote to the council: "We are constrained to oppose these wolves." In an address to the clergy, they say: "Embrace the evangelical doctrine, recall Ibach, or we will withhold our tithes."

The people who relished the reformed doctrine were endeared by this language of the nobles; and one day, when Peter Mayer, the priest most opposed to the Reformation, and the persecutor of Ibach, was going to preach against the heretics, a great tumult suddenly arose. Mayer took flight, and rushed out of the church. This commotion decided the council, who issued an order enjoining all preachers simply to preach the Word of God, or quit the town.

The light which had radiated from Wittemberg as its centre, was thus diffused over the whole empire. In the west,—the districts of Berg, Cleves, Lippstadt, Munster, Wesel, Miltenberg, Mentz, Deux-Ponts, and Strasburg, heard the Gospel. In the south,—Hof, Schlesstadt, Bamberg, Esslingen, Halle in Swabia, Heilbronn, Augsburg, Ulm, and many other places, hailed it with joy. In the east,—the duchy of Liegnitz, Prussia, and Pomerania, opened their gates to it. In the north,—Brunswick, Halberstadt, Goslar, Zell, Friesland, Bremen, Hamburg, Holstein, and even Denmark, and other neighbouring countries, were moved at the sound of the new doctrine.

The elector had declared that he would give the bishops full liberty to preach in his states, but that he would not deliver any person up to them. Accordingly, the evangelical preachers, persecuted in other countries, soon began to take refuge in Saxony. Ibach of Frankfort, Eberlin of Ulm, Kauxdorf of Magdebourg, Valentine Musteus,—whom the canons of Halberstadt had horribly mutilated,—and other faithful ministers from all parts of Germany, flocked to Wittemberg as the only asylum in which they could feel secure. There, by intercourse with the reformers, they had their own faith strengthened, and communicated the results of their experience, and of the light which they had received,—just as the water of rivers is brought back by the clouds from the boundless ocean to feed the glaciers from which it formerly flowed into the plain.

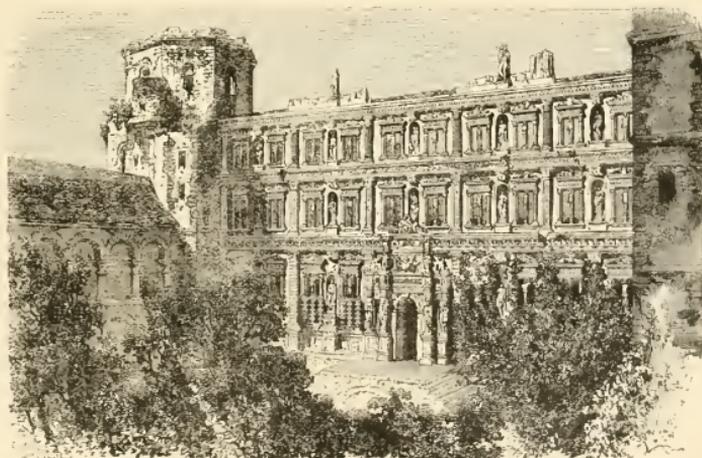

The work which was in course of development at Wittemberg, thus composed of many different elements, was constantly becoming more and more the work of the nation—of Europe—of Christendom. This school, founded by Frederick, and animated by Luther, was the centre of the vast revolution which was renewing the Church, and imprinted on it a real and living unity, far superior to the apparent unity of Rome. The Bible reigned at Wittemberg, and its oracles were everywhere heard. This university, the most recent of all, had acquired, in Christendom, the rank and influence which had hitherto belonged to the ancient university of Paris. The crowds who flocked to it from every part of Europe, told the wants of the Church and the nations; and, on quitting its walls, now become sacred in their eyes, carried back to the Church and to the people the Word of grace, destined to cure and save the nations.

Luther, at the sight of this success, felt his courage strengthened. He saw a feeble enterprise, begun amid numerous fears and agonies, changing the face of the Christian world, and he was astonished. He had foreseen nothing of the kind when he first rose up against Tetzel. Prostrating himself before the God whom he adored, he acknowledged that this work was His work, and he triumphed in the conviction of having gained a victory which could not again be wrested from him. "Our enemies threaten us with death," said he to the Chevalier Humuth of Cronberg; "had they as much wisdom as they have folly, it would, on the contrary, be life that they would threaten us with. It is not mere jest or insult to threaten Christ and Christians with death,—in other words, those who are the masters and the conquerors of death. It is as if I were to try to frighten a man by saddling his steed and helping him to mount it. Do they not know, then, that Christ is risen from the dead? As to them, He is still lying in the sepulchre. Where do I say? In hell. But we know that He lives!" He was indignant at the idea of being regarded as the author of a work, in the minutest details of which he recognised the hand of God. "Several," said he, "believe on my account; but those only are in the truth who would remain faithful though they were to believe (which God forbid) that I had denied Jesus Christ. The true disciples believe not in Luther, but in Jesus Christ. For my own part, I care not for Luther. Be he saint, or be he rogue, what is it to me? It is not him I preach; it is Christ. If the devil can take him, let him take him. But let Christ remain with us, and we shall remain also."

In fact, it were vain to attempt to explain this movement by natural means. The literati, it is true, whetted their pens, and threw sharp darts at the monks and the pope,—the cry of freedom, which Germany had so often raised against the tyranny of the Italians, again resounded in castles and provinces,—the people rejoiced when they heard the notes of the "nightingale of Wittenberg," a presage of the spring which was everywhere beginning to bud. But the movement which was then taking place was not similar to that which a longing for earthly freedom produces. Those who say that the Reformation was produced by offering the property of convents to princes, marriage to priests, and liberty to the people, strangely misapprehend its nature. No doubt a useful employment of the funds which had till then fostered the idleness of monks,—no doubt marriage and liberty, both of them gifts from God, might favour the development of the Reformation; but the moving force was not there. An internal revolution was then produced in the depths of the human heart. The Christian people again learned to love, forgive, pray, suffer, and even die, for a truth which promised repose only in heaven. The Church was transformed. Christianity burst the swathes which had so long enwrapped it, and again returned full of life to a world which had forgotten its ancient power. The hand which made the world was again at work upon it, and the Gospel re-appearing amidst the nations, pursued its course in spite of the powerful and reiterated efforts of kings and priests,—in the same way as the ocean, when the hand of God presses on its waves, rises calmly and majestically along the shore, while no human power is capable of arresting its progress.

AGITATION, REVERSES, AND PROGRESS.—1522-1526.

CHAPTER I.

Political Element—Want of Enthusiasm at Rome—Siege of Pampeluna—Courage of Inigo—Transformation—Luther and Loyola—Visions—The Two Principles.

THE Reformation, which at first had existed only in the heart of some pious individuals, had entered the worship and life of the Church. It was natural for it to take a new step—to penetrate into civil relations and the movements of nations. Its progress was invariably from within to without. We shall now see this great revolution taking its place in the political world.

For nearly eight centuries Europe formed a vast sacerdotal state. Emperors and kings were under the patronage of popes. Though there had been in France, and especially in Germany, energetic resistance to audacious claims, Rome had finally succeeded, and princes had been seen acting as the docile executioners of her horrible judgments, fighting in order to secure her empire against private Christians subject to their sway, and on her account profusely shedding the blood of their people.

No assault could be made on this vast ecclesiastical state, of which the pope was the head, without powerfully affecting political relations.

At this time two great ideas agitated Germany; on the one hand, a renovation of faith was desired; on the other, a national government, in which the German states should be represented, and a counterpoise thereby formed to the power of the emperors.

The Elector Frederick had insisted on this at the election which had given a successor to Maximilian, and young Charles had acceded to it. A national government, consisting of the emperor and the representatives of the electors and circles, had, in consequence, been formed.

Thus Luther reformed the Church; and Frederick of Saxony reformed the State.

But while, in correspondence to the religious reform, important political modifications were introduced by the heads of the nation, there was a danger that "the commonality" might also begin to move, and, by religious and political excesses, compromise both reformations.

This violent and fanatical intrusion of the populace and certain of their leaders, which seems inevitable whenever society is shaken and transformed, failed not to be manifested in Germany at the time of which we now treat.

There were other causes besides which gave rise to these agitations.

The emperor and the pope had leagued against the Reformation, which seemed destined to fall under the blows of such mighty adversaries. Policy, interest, and ambition, prompted Charles V. and Leo X. to attempt its destruction. But these are poor champions against the truth. Devotedness to a cause which is regarded as sacred, can only be overcome by counter devotedness. Now, Rome, docile to the impulse of Leo X., was enthusiastic for a sonnet or a melody, but insensible to the religion of Jesus Christ. Even when visited with some less frivolous thought, instead of purifying herself and returning to the Christianity of the apostles, she became engrossed with alliances, wars, conquests, treaties, under which she might save her provinces, while with cool disdain she left the Reformation to revive religious enthusiasm, and move forward in triumph to still nobler conquests. The enemy, whose destruction had been vowed in the basilisk of Worms, presented himself full of courage and might; the struggle behoved to be keen; blood must flow.

Meanwhile, some of the most pressing dangers with which the Reformation was threatened seemed to diminish. One day, before the publication of the edict of Worms, young Charles, when standing at a window with his confessor, had said, putting his right hand upon his heart: "I swear that I will cause the first person who, after the publication of my edict, will declare himself a Luther, to be hung at this window." But ere long his zeal had become greatly cooled. His project of re-establishing the ancient glory of the holy empire had been received with coldness. Dissatisfied with Germany, he quitted the banks of the Rhine, proceeded to the Low Countries, and took advantage of the period of his residence there, to give the monks some gratifications which he found himself unable to grant them within the empire. Luther's works were burnt at Ghent by the hands of the executioner with all possible solemnity. More than fifty thousand spectators were present at this auto-da-fé, and the emperor himself countenanced it with an approving smile. He next proceeded to Spain, when wars and troubles compelled him, for some time at least, to let Germany alone. Since the power which he claims in the empire is refused, let others pursue the heretic of Wittemberg. He is engrossed by graver cares.

In fact, Francis I., impatient to come to blows with his rival, had thrown down the gauntlet. Under the pretext of reinstating the children of John of Albert, king of Navarre, in their patrimony, he had begun a long and bloody struggle, which was to last as long as his life, by sending into that kingdom, under the command of Lesparre, an army, whose rapid conquests were not arrested till they arrived before the fortress of Pampeluna.

On these strong fortifications an enthusiasm was to be kindled which should one day oppose the enthusiasm of the reformer, and breathe into the papacy a new spirit of energy, devotedness, and power. Pampeluna was to be the cradle of the rival of the monk of Wittenberg.

The chivalric spirit which had so long animated the Christian world, now existed only in Spain. The wars against the Moors, scarcely ended in the Peninsula, and still constantly renewed in Africa, with distant and adventurous expeditions in foreign lands, kept alive in the Castilian youths that enthusiastic and spirited valour of which Amadis had been the beau idéal.

Among the defenders of Pampeluna was a young gentleman, named Don Inigo Lopez of Recalda, the cadet of a family of thirteen children. Brought up at the court of Ferdinand the Catholic, Recalda, richly endowed with personal graces, skilful in the use of the sword and the lance, was ardent in the pursuit of chivalric renown. To deck himself in glittering armor, to mount a noble steed, to expose himself to the brilliant dangers of a tourney, to run hazardous adventures, to take part in the impassioned debates of factions, and display as much devotion to St. Peter as to his mistress,—such was the life of this young knight. The governor of Navarre having gone into Spain to ask assistance, had left Pampeluna in the charge of Inigo and a few nobles. The latter, seeing the superiority of the French troops, resolved to withdraw. Inigo conjured them to make head against Lesparre. Finding that their purpose could not be shaken, he turned upon them with looks of indignation, accused them of cowardice and perfidy, and then threw himself single-handed into the fortress, determined to defend it at the cost of his life.

The French, who had met with an enthusiastic reception in Pampeluna, having summoned the governor of the citadel to capitulate, "Let us," said the fiery Inigo to his companions, "bear anything sooner than surrender." The French began to batter the walls with their powerful engines, and soon after attempted an assault. The Spaniards, animated by the courage and words of Inigo, repulsed the assailants with their arrows, swords, and halberds. Inigo fought at their head. Standing on the wall with blazing eye, the young knight, brandishing his sword, dealt blows on the enemy. All at once a bullet struck the wall at the place where he was defending; a shivered stone severely wounded the knight in his right leg, and the shot, in rebounding, broke his left. Inigo fell insensible. The garrison immediately surrendered; and the French, filled with admiration at the courage of their young opponent, caused him to be carried in a litter to his friends and parents in the Castle of Loyola. In this seignorial mansion, from which he afterwards took his name, Inigo was born, eight years after Luther, of one of the most distinguished families in the kingdom.

A painful operation had become necessary. Amidst the most acute sufferings, Inigo clenched his hands, but did not utter a single cry.

Constrained to a painful repose, he behoved somehow to employ his lively fancy. In the absence of romances of chivalry, which he had hitherto been accustomed to deavour, he was furnished with the "Life of Christ," and the "Flowers of the Saints." This reading, in his solitary and sickly condition, produced an extraordinary impression on his mind. He thought he saw the noisy life of tournaments and battles, which, till then, had completely engrossed his youth, withdrawn, effaced, and extinguished; and at the same time a more glorious career opened on his astonished sight. The humble actions of the saints and their heroic sufferings suddenly appeared to him more deserving of praise than all the feats of chivalry. Stretched on his feverish bed, he gave himself up to the most contradictory thoughts. The world which he was abandoning, and the other, whose holy macerations he was welcoming, appeared to him at the same moment; the one with its pleasures, the other with its severities. These two worlds carried on a fierce combat in his soul. "What," said he, "if I were to do what St. Francis or St. Dominick have done?" Then the image of the mistress to whom he had devoted his heart presenting itself to his imagination, he exclaimed with natural vanity: "She is not a countess, she is not a duchess; but she is more." But these thoughts left a feeling of bitterness and weariness, whereas his plan of imitating the saints filled him with peace and joy.

From that time his choice was fixed. When scarcely recovered, he resolved to bid adieu to the world. After having, like Luther, partaken of an entertainment with his companions in arms, he set out alone, in the greatest secrecy, for the solitary abodes which the hermits of St. Benedict had hewn out in the rock in the mountains of Montserrat. Urged on, not by a conviction of his sins or the need of Divine grace, but by a longing to become the "knight of Mary," and gain renown by mortifications and pious works, like all the army of the saints, he confessed during three days, gave his rich clothing to a beggar, put on sackcloth, and girded himself with a cord. Then, calling to mind the celebrated vigil of Amadis of Gaul, he hung up his sword before an image of Mary, and passed the night watching in his new and strange costume. Sometimes on his knees, sometimes standing, but always in prayer, and with the pilgrim's staff in his hand, he employed himself in all the devout exercises which Amadis of Gaul had of old performed. "Thus," observes the Jesuit Maffei, one of the biographers of the saint, "while Satan was arming Martin Luther against all laws, human and divine, and while this infamous heresiarch was appearing at Worms, and there declaring impious war on the apostolic see, Christ, in the exercise of His Divine providence, was raising up this new champion, and binding him, and at a later period all his followers, to the service of the Roman pontiff, opposing him to the licentiousness and fury of heretical perverseness."

Loyola, still lame in one leg, dragged along through winding and desert paths to Mauresa, and there entered a convent of Dominicans, that he might devote himself, in this obscure spot, to the severest penances. Like Luther, he daily begged his bread from door to door. He remained seven hours on his knees, and flagellated himself thrice every day; at midnight he was again at prayer. He allowed his hair and nails to grow; and it would have been impossible to recognise the young and brilliant knight of Pampeluna in the pale was monk of Manresa.

Meanwhile the moment had arrived when the religious ideas which had hitherto been to Inigo merely a sport of chivalry, were to reveal themselves to him with greater seriousness, and make him feel a power of which he was still ignorant. Suddenly, without any presentiment of what was to happen, the joy which he had hitherto experienced disappeared. In vain did he apply to prayer and the singing of hymns; he could find no rest. His imagination had ceased to surround him with amiable illusions: he was left alone with his conscience. He could not comprehend a state which was so novel to him; and he asked, in alarm, whether God, for whom he had made so many sacrifices, was still angry with him. Night and day terrors agitated his soul: he shed bitter tears; and with loud cries called for the peace which he had lost . . . but all in vain. He then resumed the long confession which he had made at Montserrat. "It may be," thought he, "I have forgotten something." But the confession only increased his agony, by reminding him of all his faults. He wandered gloomy and depressed: his conscience cried aloud that during his whole life he had done nothing but heaped sin upon sin; and the unhappy man, overwhelmed with terror, made the cloister echo with his groans.

Strange thoughts then found admission into his heart. Experiencing no comfort in confession and the various ordinances of the Church, he began, like Luther, to doubt their efficacy. But, instead of turning aside from human works, and applying to the all-sufficient work of Christ, he asked if he ought not again to pursue worldly glory. His soul darted impetuously towards the world from which he had fled; but he immediately drew back in alarm.

Was there, then, some difference between the monk of Manresa and the monk of Erfurt? In secondary features, doubtless, there was; but the state of their souls was the same. Both had a deep conviction of the magnitude of their sins. Both sought reconciliation with God, and wished to have the assurance of it in their hearts. Had a Staupitz, with the Bible in his hand, presented himself at the convent of Manresa, Inigo might, perhaps, have become the Luther of the Peninsula. These two great men of the sixteenth century—these two founders of the two spiritual powers, which, for three hundred years, have been warring with each other, were at this time brethren; and, perhaps, had they met, Luther and Loyola would have fallen into each other's arms, and mingled their tears and their vows.

But these two monks were from this moment to follow very different paths.

Inigo, instead of perceiving that his remorse was sent to urge him to the foot of the cross, persuaded himself that these internal upbraidings came not from God, but from the devil; and adopted the resolution of thinking no more of his sins, of effacing them, and consigning them to eternal oblivion. Luther turned towards Christ; Loyola only fell back upon himself.

Inigo was shortly after confirmed in the conclusion at which he had arrived by visions. His own resolutions had been substituted for the grace of Christ, and his own imagination for the Word of Christ. The voice of God in his conscience, he had regarded as the voice of a demon; and, accordingly, his future history exhibits him as given up to the inspirations of the spirit of darkness.

One day Loyola met an old woman, just as Luther, in the time of his agony, had been visited by an old man. But the Spanish female, instead of telling the penitent of Manresa of the remission of sins, foretold him of apparitions of Jesus. Such was the Christianity to which Loyola, like the prophets of Zwickau, had recourse. Inigo did not seek the truth in the Holy Scriptures, but in their stead imagined immediate communications from the kingdom of spirits. His life soon consisted only of ecstasies and contemplations.

One day, while going to the church of St. Paul, which is situated outside the town, plunged in meditation, he followed the banks of the Llobregat. At last he sat down. His eyes were fixed on the river, which was slowly rolling its deep waters at his feet; and he became completely absorbed in meditation. Suddenly he was seized with ecstasy: he saw with his eyes what men scarcely comprehend after much reading, watching, and labour. He rose up, stood on the brink of the river, and seemed to himself to become a new man; he afterwards put himself upon his knees before a cross which happened to be in the neighbourhood, disposed to sacrifice his life in the cause, the mysteries of which had just been revealed to him.

From that time his visions became more frequent. One day, while seated on the stair of St. Dominick, at Manresa, he was singing hymns to the holy Virgin. Suddenly his soul was seized with ecstasy; he remained motionless, absorbed in contemplation; the mystery of the Holy Trinity was revealed to his eyes under magnificent symbols. He shed tears, sobbed aloud, and during the whole day ceased not to speak of the ineffable vision.

These numerous apparitions had dissipated all his doubts. Unlike Luther, he believed, not because the things of faith were written in the Word of God, but in consequence of the visions which he had seen. "Even though there had been no Bible," says his apologists,—"even had these mysteries never been revealed in Scripture,—he would have believed them; for God had been unveiled to him." Luther, on receiving his degree of doctor, had taken an oath to the Holy Scriptures; and the authority of the Word of God, the only infallible authority, had become the fundamental principle of the Reformation. Loyola took his oath to dreams and visions; and fantastical apparitions became the principle of his life and of his faith.

The residence of Luther in the convent of Erfurt, and that of Loyola in the convent of Manresa, explain to us respectively the Reformation and the modern papacy. We shall not follow the monk who was to reanimate the exhausted powers of Rome to Jerusalem, whither he repaired on quitting the cloister. We shall meet with him again in the course of this history.

CHAPTER II.

Victory of the Pope—Death of Leo X.—Oratory of Divine Love—
Adrian VI.—Schemes of Reform—Opposition.

WHILE these things were passing in Spain, Rome herself seemed to assume a more serious character. The great patron of music, hunting, and festivity, disappeared from the pontifical throne to give place to a grave and pious monk.

Leo X. had felt great delight on hearing of the edict of Worms, and the captivity of Luther; and forthwith, as a token of his victory, had caused the effigy and writings of the reformer to be given to the flames. This was the second or third time that the papacy had enjoyed this pleasure. At this time Leo, wishing to testify his gratitude to Charles V., united his army to that of the emperor. The French were obliged to quit Parma, Placenza, and Milan; which latter town was entered by a cousin of the pope, Cardinal Giulio de Medici. The pope was thus mounting to the pinnacle of power.

This was at the beginning of the winter of 1521. Leo X. was accustomed to pass the autumn in the country, and at this time left Rome without his surplice, and what, says his master of the ceremonies, was still more scandalous, in boots. He had hawking at Viterbo, and stag-hunting at Corneto, enjoyed the sport of fishing in the lake of Bolsena, and then went to pass some time in the midst of festivities at Malliana, his favourite residence. Musicians, improvisatori, all artists whose talents could enliven this delicious villa, surrounded the sovereign pontiff. He was here at the time when news reached him of the taking of Milan. The whole villa was immediately astir. The courtiers and officials could not restrain their joy. The Swiss fired feu de joie; and Leo, in transport, walked up and down his room the whole night, often looking out of his window at the rejoicings of the Swiss and the people. He returned to Rome, fatigued, but intoxicated with delight. Scarcely had he returned to the Vatican when he was suddenly taken ill. "Pray for me," said he to his servants. He had not even time to receive the holy sacrament, and died in the vigour of life, (forty-seven,) in the hour of triumph, and amid the noise of festivity.

The people, while accompanying the hearse of the sovereign pontiff, gave utterance to invectives. They could not forgive his having died without the sacraments, and left debts consequent on his great expenditure. "Thou didst rise to the pontificate as a fox," said the Romans; "there thou playedst the lion, and now thou art gone like a dog."

Such was the mourning with which Rome honoured the pope who excommunicated the Reformation, and whose name serves to mark one of the great epochs in history.

Meanwhile a feeble re-action against the spirit of Leo and Rome had already begun in Rome herself. Some pious individuals had there founded an oratory for their common edification, near the place where tradition bears that the meetings of the primitive Christians were held. Contarini, who had heard Luther at Worms, took the lead among these priests. In this way a species of Reformation began at Rome almost at the same time as at Wittemberg. It has been truly said, that wherever there are germs of piety, there are also germs of reform. But these good intentions were soon to be dissipated.

At other times the choice of a successor to Leo X. would have fallen on a Gregory VII., or an Innocent III., if they could have been found; but the interest of the empire now took precedence of that of the Church, and Charles V. behoved to have a pope who was devoted to himself. The Cardinal de Medici, afterwards pope under the name of Clement VII., seeing that he could not yet obtain the tiara, exclaimed: "Take the Cardinal of Tortosa, who is old, and universally regarded as a saint." This prelate, born at Utrecht, of burgher parentage, was, in fact, elected, and reigned under the name of Adrian VI. He had formerly been a professor at Louvain, and afterwards became preceptor to Charles, by whose influence, as emperor, he was, in 1517, invested with the Roman purple. The Cardinal de Vio seconded the proposal. "Adrian," said he, "had, through the doctors of Louvain, a great share in Luther's condemnation." The cardinals, worn out and off their guard, appointed this stranger; but shortly, on recovering themselves, "they were," says a chronicler, "as it were dead with amazement." The idea that the rigid Netherlander would not accept the tiara, at first somewhat soled him; but this was of short duration. Pasquin caricatured the pontiff elect under the figure of a schoolmaster, and the cardinals under that of boys whom he was chastising. The populace were so enraged that the members of the conclave were happy to escape without being thrown into the river. In Holland, on the contrary, there were great rejoicings at having given a pope to the Church. "Utrecht planted—Louvain watered—the emperor has given the increase," was displayed on tapestry hung in front of the houses. Some one wrote beneath: "And God did nothing at all in the matter!"

Notwithstanding the dissatisfaction originally expressed by the people of Rome, Adrian VI. repaired thither in August, 1522, and was well received. It was said that he had more than five thousand benefices at his disposal, and every one counted on obtaining a share. For long the papal throne had not been occupied by such a pontiff. Just, active, learned, pious, simple, of irrepachable manners, he did not allow himself to be blinded either by favour or anger. He arrived at the Vatican with his old housekeeper, whom he charged to continue to provide for his modest wants in the magnificent palace which Leo had filled with luxury and dissipation. He had none of the tastes of his predecessor. When shewn the magnificent statue of the Laocoon, which had been discovered a few years before, and purchased for a large sum by Julius II., he turned away coldly, saying: "These are pagan idols." "I would far rather," he wrote, "serve God as provost of Louvain, than as pope of Rome."

Adrian, struck with the danger with which the Reformation menaced the religion of the Middle Ages, and not like the Italians, with those to which it exposed Rome and its hierarchy, was sincerely desirous to combat and arrest it; and it seemed to him that the best method of succeeding, was a reform of the Church produced by the Church herself. "The Church," said he, "is in need of a reform; but we must proceed in it step by step." "The opinion of the pope," says Luther, "is, that between two steps there must be an interval of several ages." In fact, there were ages when the Church was moving towards a Reformation. It was no longer time to temporize; it was necessary to act.

Adrian, faithful to his plan, was engaged in clearing the city of the profane, of forgers, and usurers. The task was not easy, for they formed a considerable part of the population.

At first the Romans jeered at him; but shortly they hated him. Sacerdotal ascendancy, and the immense profits which it produced—the night of Rome—the sports, luxury, and festivities, which abounded in it, would all be irreversibly lost by a return to apostolic manners.

In particular, the restoration of discipline encountered energetic opposition. "To succeed in it," said the grand Penitentiary, (a cardinal), "it would first be necessary to bring back Christian fervour. The cure is too much for the strength of the patient, and will be his death. Have a care that, in trying to preserve Germany, you do not lose Italy!" In fact, Adrian had soon much more to dread from Romanism than from Lutheranism.

Attempts were made to bring him back to the path which he was desirous to quit. The old and wily Cardinal Soderinus de Volterra, an intimate friend of Alexander VI., Julius II., and Leo X., often expressed himself to honest Adrian in terms fitted to acquaint him with the part, to him so novel, which he was called to perform. "The heretics," said he to him one day, "have at all times spoken of the corrupt manners of the court of Rome; notwithstanding, the popes have never changed them." On another occasion he said: "Hitherto it has not been by reforms that heresies have been extinguished, but by crusades." "Ah!" replied the pontiff, with a deep sigh, "how unfortunate the condition of the popes, since they have not even the liberty of doing good!"

CHAPTER III.

Diet of Nuremberg—Invasion of Solymán—The Nuncio demands the Death of Luther—The Preachers of Nuremberg—Promise of Reform—National Grievances—Decree of the Diet—Thundering Letter of the Pope—Luther's Advice.

On the 23rd March, 1522, before Adrian's arrival at Rome, the diet had assembled at Nuremberg. Previous to this, the bishops of Mersburg and Misnia had asked permission from the Elector of Saxony to make a visitation of the convents and churches in his states. Frederick, thinking that the truth should be strong enough to resist error, had given a favourable answer. The visitation took place. The bishops and their doctors preached fiercely against reform. They exhorted, threatened, supplicated; but their arguments seemed without force, and, when wishing to recur to more efficacious weapons, they asked the secular arm to execute their decrees, the elector's ministers replied, that the affair required to be examined by the Bible, and that the elector could not, at his advanced age, sit down to the study of theology. These efforts of the bishops did not bring back a single soul to the fold of Rome; and Luther, who, a short time after, travelled over these countries, and made his powerful eloquence be heard, effaced any feeble impressions which they had produced.

There was reason to fear that Archduke Ferdinand, the emperor's brother, would do what Frederick had refused. This young prince, who presided at part of the sittings of the diet, gradually assuming more resolution, might, in his zeal, rashly draw the sword which his more prudent and politic brother wisely left in its sheath. In fact, Ferdinand had commenced a cruel persecution of the partisans of the Reformation in his hereditary states of Austria. But for the deliverance of reviving Christianity, God repeatedly employed the same instrument which He had used in destroying corrupted Christianity. The crescent appeared in the terrified provinces of Hungary. On the 9th of August, after a siege of six weeks, Belgrade, the bulwark of that kingdom and of the empire, yielded to the assaults of Solymán. The followers of Mohammed, after their evacuation of Spain, seemed desirous to re-enter Europe by the East. The Diet of Nuremberg forgot the monk of Worms, to think only of the Luther of Constantinople. But Charles V. kept both adversaries in his view. Writing the pope from Valladolid on the 31st October, he said: "It is necessary to arrest the Turks, and punish the partisans of the poisonous doctrines of Luther with the sword."

The storm which seemed to have turned away from the Reformation, and proceeded toward the East, gathered anew over the head of the reformer. His return to Wittenberg, and the zeal which he then displayed, had awakened the old hatred. "Now that we know where to take him," said Duke George, "let the decree of Worms be carried into execution!" It was even confidently affirmed in Germany, that both the emperor and Adrian would appear together at Nuremberg to advise this. "Satan feels the wound which he has received," said Luther, "and, therefore, puts himself into all this rage. But Christ has already stretched forth His hand, and will trample him under His feet in spite of the gates of hell."

In December, 1522, the diet again assembled at Nuremberg. Everything appeared to announce that, if Solymán was the great enemy who engrossed the attention of the spring session, Luther would be the engrossing one of the winter session. Adrian VI., being of German origin, flattered himself his countrymen would give him a more favourable reception than a pope of Italian origin could hope for. He accordingly charged Chieregati, whom he had known in Spain, to repair to Nuremberg.

No sooner was the diet met than several princes made violent speeches against Luther. The Cardinal Archbishop of Salzburg, who was in the full confidence of the emperor, was desirous that prompt and decisive measures should be taken before the arrival of the Elector of Saxony. The Elector Joachim of Brandenburg, always resolute in his course, and the Chancellor of Trèves, were equally pressing for the execution of the Diet of Worms. The other princes were, in a great measure, undecided, and divided in opinion. The state of turmoil in which the Church was placed filled her most faithful servants with anguish. The Bishop of Strasburg broke out in full diet with the exclamation: "I would give one of my ten fingers not to be a priest."

Chieregati, in unison with the Archbishop of Salzburg, demanded the death of Luther. "It is necessary," said he, on the part of the pope, and with a papal brief in his hands—"it is necessary to amputate this gangrened limb from the body. Your fathers at Constance put to death John Huss and Jerome of Prague; but they revive in Luther. Follow the glorious example of your ancestors, and, with the assistance of God and St. Peter, carry off a magnificent victory over the infernal dragon."

On hearing the brief of the pious and moderate Adrian, the most of the princes were seized with terror. Several were beginning to have a better understanding of the arguments of Luther, and had hoped other things of the pope. So then, Rome, under an Adrian, refuses to acknowledge her faults; she is still preparing her thunder, and the Germanic provinces are to be covered with desolation and blood. While the princes kept a mournful silence, the prelates and the members of the diet were in an uproar. "Let him be put to death!" exclaimed they, within hearing of the envoy of Saxony, who was present at the sitting.

Very different expressions were heard in the churches of Nuremberg. Crowds flocked into the chapel of the hospital and the churches of the Augustines, St. Sibald and St. Laurence, to the preaching of the Gospel. Andrew Osiander preached powerfully in the latter church. Several princes, and, in particular, Albert, Margrave of Brandenburg, who, in his quality of Grand Master of the Teutonic Order, took rank immediately after the archbishop, was a frequent attendant. Monks, quitting the convents of the town, learned trades, in order to gain a livelihood by their own hands.

Chieregati could not tolerate this boldness. He demanded that the rebellious priests and monks should be cast into prison. The diet, notwithstanding strong opposition from the envoys of the Elector of Saxony and the Margrave Casimir, resolved to order the apprehension of the monks, but agreed previously to communicate the nuncio's complaints to Osiander and his colleagues. A committee, with the fanatical Cardinal Salzburg for its president, was entrusted with the execution of it. The danger was imminent; the struggle was on the eve of commencing; and it was with the National Council that it was to commence.

However, the citizens prevented it. While the diet was deliberating as to what should be done in regard to their ministers, the town council was deliberating as to what should be done in regard to the resolution of the diet. The decision was, that, if it was attempted by the strong hand to carry off the ministers of the town, they would, with the strong hand, set them at liberty. Such a resolution was significant. The diet, in astonishment, intimated to the nuncio that it was contrary to law to apprehend the ministers of the free town of Nuremberg without having convicted them of heresy.

Chieregati was deeply moved at this new affront to the omnipotence of the pope. "Very well," said he proudly to Ferdinand, "do nothing but leave me to act. I will seize these heretical preachers in the pope's name." No sooner had the Cardinal Archbishop of Mentz and the Margrave Casimir been apprised of this strange resolution, than they repaired in haste to the legate, and implored him to abandon it. The nuncio shewed himself inflexible, declaring that within the bosom of Christendom the pope must be obeyed. The two princes took leave of the legate, saying: "If you persist in your design, we call upon you to give us intimation; for we will quit the town before you have proceeded to lay hands on these preachers." The legate abandoned his project.

Having no longer any hope of succeeding in the way of authority, he resolved to have recourse to other expedients, and with this view communicated to the diet the intentions and injunctions of the pontiff, which he had hitherto concealed.

But honest Adrian, who was a stranger to the world, by his very frankness injured the cause which he had so much at heart. "We know well," said he, in the resolutions transmitted to his legate, "that for several years many abuses and abominations have existed in the holy city. The contagion has spread from the head into the members; it has descended from the popes to the other ecclesiastics. We desire the reformation of this Roman court, whence proceed so many evils; the whole world desires it; and it was with a view to its accomplishment that we were resigned to mount the pontifical throne."

The partisans of Rome blushed for shame when they heard these strange words. Like Pallavicini, they thought the confession too frank. On the contrary, the friends of the Reformation rejoiced on hearing Rome proclaiming her corruption. There was no longer any doubt that Luther was right, since the pope himself declared it.

The reply of the diet shewed how much the authority of the sovereign pontiff had fallen in the empire. The spirit of Luther seemed to have passed into the hearts of the representatives of the nation. The moment was favourable; Adrian's ear was open; the emperor was absent; the diet resolved to collect into one body all the grievances which Germany complained of against Rome, and despatch them to the pope.

The legate, alarmed at this determination, supplicated and menaced by turns, but in vain. The secular estates were decided, and the ecclesiastical offered no opposition. Eighty-four grievances were specified. The abuses and stratagems of the Roman court in making extortions on Germany,—the scandals and profanations of the clergy,—the irregularities and simony of the ecclesiastical tribunals,—the encroachment on the secular power in enslaving consciences,—were exposed with equal frankness and force. The states hinted that human traditions were the source of all this corruption. They concluded thus: "If these grievances are not redressed within a limited time, we will consider other means of escaping from all this oppression and suffering." Chieregati, foreseeing the fearful detail into which the diet would enter, quitted Nuremberg in haste, that he might not be the bearer of so disagreeable and insolent a message.

Still, was there not room to apprehend that the diet might be willing to compensate for their boldness by sacrificing Luther? It was thought so at first; but a spirit of truth and justice had fallen on this assembly. They, like Luther, demanded that a free council should be convened in the empire; and added, that until it took place the pure Gospel only should be preached, and nothing should be printed without the approbation of certain individuals of character and learning. These resolutions enable us to apprehend the immense progress which the Reformation had made since the Diet of Worms; and yet the Saxon envoy, the Chevalier von Ferlitsch protested solemnly against any censure which the diet might pronounce, how moderate soever the terms might be. The decision of the diet was regarded as a first victory gained by the Reformation, and was to be succeeded by others still more decisive. Even the Swiss, in their mountains, thrilled with joy. "The Roman pontiff is vanquished in Germany," said Zwingle; "all that remains is to wrest his arms from him. This is the battle we have now to wage, and it will be the fiercest; but we have Christ as witness of the combat." Luther declared aloud that God had inspired the edict of the princes.

There was great wrath in the Vatican among the ministers of the papacy. What! it is not enough to have a pope who disappoints all the hopes of the Romans, and in whose palace there is neither music nor play; must secular princes, moreover, hold a language which Rome detests, and refuse the death of the heretic of Wittemberg!

Adrian himself was very indignant at the proceedings in Germany. It was on the Elector of Saxony he discharged his anger. Never, perhaps, did Rome sound an alarm more energetic, sincere, and even more impressive.

"We have waited long, perhaps too long," said the pious Adrian, in the brief which he addressed to the elector; "we were desirous to see if God would not be pleased to visit your soul, and enable you at last to escape from the snares of Satan. But where we hoped to gather grapes, we have gathered only sour grapes. The Spirit has blown in vain. Your iniquities have not melted away. Open your eyes, then, and see the greatness of your fall!

"If the unity of the Church has been broken, if the simple have been turned aside from the faith which they had sucked at the breasts of their mother, if the churches are deserted, if the people are without priests, and the priests no longer receive the honour which is due to them, if Christians are without Christ, to whom do we owe it, if not to yourself? . . . If Christian peace has fled the earth, if the world is full of discord, rebellion, robbery, assassination, conflagration; if the cry of war resounds from east to west; if a universal battle is preparing, you—still you—are the cause!

"Do you not see that sacrilegious man (Luther) tearing in pieces the images of the saints, and even the sacred cross of Jesus Christ, with his guilty hands, and trampling them under his impure feet? . . . Do you not see him, in his impious wrath, stirring up the laity to wash their hands in the blood of the priests, and throw down the churches of the Lord?

"What matters it though the priests whom he attacks be bad priests? Has not the Lord said: Do what they say, and not what they do; thus pointing at the honour which is due to them even when their conduct is culpable.

"Rebellious apostate! he is not ashamed to defile the vessels consecrated to the Lord; he plucks from their sanctuaries the holy virgins consecrated to Christ, and gives them to the devil; he takes the priests of the Lord and gives them up to infamous prostitutes. . . . Frightful profanation! at which the pagans even would have been horrified, had they seen it in the pontiffs of their idols!

"Of what punishment, of what suffering, think you, then, we shall deem you worthy? . . . Take pity on yourself, take pity on your miserable Saxons; for if you are not speedily converted, God will cause His vengeance to descend upon you.

"In the name of God Almighty and of our Lord Jesus Christ, whose representative on the earth I am, I declare to you, that you will be punished in this world, and plunged into the eternal fire in that which is to come. Repent and be converted! . . . Two swords are suspended over your head—the sword of the empire, and the sword of the pope.

The pious Frederick trembled on reading this menacing brief. A short time before he had written to the emperor to say, that old age and sickness rendered him incapable of occupying himself with these affairs; and the reply given to him was the most arrogant letter that ever a sovereign prince had received. Weakened by age, he cast his eyes on that sword which he had carried to the holy sepulchre in the days of his strength. He began to think it might be necessary to unsheath it in defence of the consciences of his subjects; and that already on the brink of the grave, he would not be able to go down to it in peace. He immediately wrote to Wittemberg for the advice of the fathers of the Reformation.

There, also, troubles and persecutions were foreseen. "What shall I say?" exclaimed the mild Melancthon; "to what side shall I turn? We are overwhelmed with hatred, and the world is transported with rage against us." Luther, Linck, Melancthon, Bugenhagen, and Amsdorff, consulted together as to the answer to be returned to the elector. They all proposed nearly the same answer. Their opinion is very striking.

"No prince," said they, "can undertake a war without the consent of the people from whose hands he received the government. Now, the people have no wish to fight for the Gospel, for they do not believe it. Let the princes, then, not take up arms; they are princes of the nations,—in other words, of unbelievers." Thus it was the impetuous Luther who asked sage Frederick to put up the sword into its sheath. He could not give a better answer to the charge brought against him by the pope, of stirring up the laity to wash their hands in the blood of the clergy. Few characters have been less understood than his. This opinion is dated the 8th February, 1523. Frederick restrained himself.

The wrath of the pope soon bore its proper fruits. The princes who had expounded their grievances against Rome, frightened at their boldness, sought to appease him by compliance. Several, besides, declared that victory must remain with the pontiff of Rome, as he appeared to be the stronger. "In our day," said Luther, "princes content themselves with saying, three times three make nine, or twice seven make fourteen: the account is correct; the affair will succeed. Then our Lord God rises up and says: 'For how much, then, do you count me? . . . For a cipher, perhaps?' Then he turns their calculations upside down, and their accounts prove erroneous."

CHAPTER IV.

Persecution—Efforts of Duke George—The Convent of Antwerp—Miltenberg—The Three Monks of Antwerp—The Scaffold—Martyrdom at Brussels.

The flame breathed forth by the humble and meek Adrian kindled the conflagration. His remonstrance caused an immense sensation throughout Christendom. Persecution, which had for some time been arrested, again commenced. Luther trembled for Germany, and strove to lay the storm. "If the princes," said he, "set themselves in opposition to the truth, the result will be a tumult, which will destroy princes, magistrates, priests, and people. I tremble at the thought of soon seeing all Germany swim in blood. Let us interpose as a wall, and preserve our people from the Lord's anger. The people are no longer what they have been hitherto. The sword of civil war is suspended over the heads of kings. They wish to destroy Luther; but Luther wishes to save them. Christ lives and reigns: I shall live and reign with Him."

These words were without effect: Rome was hastening on towards scaffolds and blood. The Reformation, like Jesus Christ, had not come to bring peace, but a sword. For the purposes of God, persecution was necessary. As objects are hardened by fire to protect them from the influence of the atmosphere, so a trial by fire was to secure evangelical truth against the influence of the world. But this fire did more,—it served, as in the early days of Christianity, to kindle an universal enthusiasm for the cause so virulently persecuted. There is in man, when he begins to know the truth, a holy indignation against injustice and violence. An instinctive feeling, which comes from God, urges him to take part with the oppressed; and, at the same time, the constancy of martyrs raises and captivates him, and hurries him on towards the saving doctrine which gives so much courage and so much peace.

Duke George headed the persecution. But he deemed it a small matter to employ it in his own states. He wished, above all, to see its ravages in electoral Saxony—the focus of heresy; and he did everything to shake the electoral Frederick and Duke

John. Writing them from Nuremberg, he says: "Merchants just come from Saxony relate, with regard to it, things which are strange and contrary to the honour of God and the saints; the sacrament of the Supper is there received with the hand. The bread and wine are consecrated in the vulgar tongue; the blood of Christ is put in ordinary vessels; and, at Eulenberg, to insult the priest, a man even entered the church mounted on an ass! . . . What is the consequence? The minerals with which God had enriched Saxony begin to be exhausted since the innovating preachings of Luther. Oh! would to God that those who boast of having raised up the Gospel in the electorate, had rather carried it to Constantinople! Luther has a soft and pleasant voice; but a venomous tail, which stings like that of the scorpion. Let us prepare for the battle. Let us throw these apostate monks and profane priests into chains, and that without delay; for our remaining locks, as well as beards, grow white, and remind us that we have only a few days for action."

Thus wrote Duke George to the elector, who replied firmly and mildly, that whosoever should do a criminal act within his states should not escape condign punishment; but that matters of conscience must be left to God.

George not being able to persuade Frederick, hastened, in his own neighbourhood, to give proof of his severity against the cause which he hated. He imprisoned the monks and priests who adhered to Luther. He ordered back the students belonging to his states who were studying at the universities tainted with the Reformation; and he ordered all New Testaments in the vulgar tongue to be delivered up to the magistrates. The same course was followed in Austria, Wurtemberg, and the Duchy of Brnswick.

But it was in the Low Countries, which were under the immediate authority of Charles V., that the persecution burst forth with greatest fury. The Augustine convent at Antwerp was full of monks who had received the truth of the Gospel. Several of the friars had resided some time at Wittemberg, and, from 1519, preached salvation by grace in their church with great energy. The prior, James Probst, who was of a fiery temperament, and Melchior Mirisch, who was, on the other hand, distinguished for ability and prudence, were arrested and carried to Brussels, about the end of 1521. Probst, surprised and terrified, recanted. Melchior Mirisch found means of softening his judges, and escaped both condemnation and recantation.

These persecutions did not intimidate the monks who were left in the convent of Antwerp. They continued vigorously to preach the Gospel. The people flocked to hear them, and the church of the Augustines proved too small, as that of Wittemberg had done. In October, 1522, the storm which was gathering over their heads burst; the convent was shut up, and the monks were imprisoned and condemned to death. Some made their escape. Some females, forgetting the timidity of their sex, rescued one of them, Henry of Zuphten, from his executioners. Three young monks, Henry Voes, John Esch, and Lambert Thorn, for some time eluded the search of the inquisitors. All the vessel of the convent were sold; the building was barricaded:

and the holy sacrament removed from it as from a place become infamous. Margaret, the regent of the Low Countries, received it solemnly into the church of the Holy Virgin. Orders were given that this heretical monastery should be razed to its foundations; and several citizens and females, who had received the Gospel with joy, were cast into prison.

Luther was much grieved on learning these tidings. "The cause which we defend," said he, "is no longer a simple game; it wishes blood; it demands life."

The fates of Mirisch and Probst were to be very different. The prudent Mirisch soon became the docile servant of Rome, and the executioner of the imperial decrees against the adherents of the Reformation. On the contrary, Probst, who had escaped from the inquisitors, bewailed his fault, withdrew his recantation, and, at Bruges in Flanders, boldly preached the doctrine which he had abjured. Arrested anew and imprisoned at Brussels, his death seemed inevitable. A Franciscan, moved with pity, aided his escape; and Probst, "saved by a miracle of God," says Luther, arrived at Wittemberg, where his double deliverance filled the hearts of the friends of the Reformation with joy.

The Romish priests were everywhere in arms. The town of Miltenberg on the Maine, belonging to the Elector-archbishop of Mentz, was one of the Germanic cities which had received the Word of God with the greatest readiness. The inhabitants were strongly attached to their pastor, John Draco, one of the most enlightened men of his time. He was compelled to retire; but the Roman ecclesiastics quitted at the same time, dreading the popular vengeance. An evangelical deacon alone remained to administer spiritual consolation. At the same time troops from Mentz entered and spread over the town, uttering blasphemies, brandishing their swords, and giving themselves up to debauchery.

Some evangelical Christians fell under their blows; others were seized and thrown into dungeons; the Romish rites were again set up; the reading of the Bible was prohibited; and the inhabitants were forbidden to speak of the Gospel, even in their most private intercourse. On the entry of the troops the deacon had taken refuge in the house of a poor widow. He was denounced to the rulers, who sent a soldier to seize him. The humble deacon, hearing the soldier who was seeking his life advancing with hasty steps, quietly waited for him; and when the door was hastily opened, he rose mildly to meet him, and embracing him cordially, said: "I salute you, my brother; here I am, plunge your sword into my bosom." The fierce soldier, astonished, let his sword fall from his hand, and would not allow any harm to be done to the pious evangelist.

Meanwhile, the inquisitors of the Low Countries, thirsting for blood, scoured the country, and searched everywhere for the young Augustines who had escaped from the persecution of Antwerp. Esch, Voes, and Lambert, were at last discovered, chained, and carried to Brussels, Egmondanus, Hoelstraten, and some other inquisitors, summoned them before them. Hoelstraten asked: "Do you retract your assertion that the priest has not power to pardon sins, and that pardon belongs to God only?" He next enumerated all the evangelical doctrines, and summoned them to abjure them. "We recant nothing," exclaimed Esch and Voes firmly; "we will not abjure the Word of God; we will sooner die for the faith!"

Inquisitor.—"Do you confess that you have been led astray by Luther?"

The Young Augustines.—"Just as the apostles were led astray by Jesus Christ."

The Inquisitors.—"We pronounce you heretics, who deserve to be burnt alive; and we hand you over to the secular arm."

Lambert was still; he was afraid of death; anguish and doubt agitated his soul. "I ask four days," said he, in a suppressed tone. He was taken back to prison. As soon as this period was expired, the sacerdotal consecration was formally withdrawn from Esch and Voes, who were handed over to the council of the regent of the Low Countries. The council handed them over hand-cuffed to the executioner. Hoelstraten, and three other inquisitors, accompanied them even to the scaffold.

When arrived near the scaffold, the young martyrs eyed it calmly; their constancy, their piety, their youth, drew tears even from the inquisitors. When they were bound, the confessors approached: "We ask you once more, Will you receive the Christian faith?"

The Martyrs.—"We believe in the Christian Church; but not in your church."

A half hour passed away; it was hoped that the prospect of so frightful a death would intimidate the youths. But, the only persons who were calm amidst the agitated crowd which covered the public square, they sung psalms, occasionally interrupting this employment to say boldly: "We wish to die for the name of Jesus Christ."

"Be converted, be converted," exclaimed the inquisitors, "or you will die in the name of the devil!"—"No," replied the martyrs; "we will die as Christians for the truth of the Gospel."

The pile was set on fire. While the flame ascended slowly, Divine peace filled their hearts; and one of them even went so far as to say: "I feel as if reclining on a bed of roses." The solemn hour had come; death was at hand; the two martyrs, with loud voice, exclaimed: "O Domini Jesu, Fili David, miserere nostri!—Lord Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on us!" Then they began in a solemn voice to repeat the creed. At length the flames reached them; but, before depriving them of life, burned the cords with which they were bound to the pile. One of them, taking advantage of his liberty, threw himself on his knees, and thus worshipping his Master, with clasped hands, exclaimed: "Lord Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on us!" The fire surrounded their bodies; they sung the Te Deum laudamus. Shortly after their voice was stifled by the flames, and all that remained of them was their ashes.

The execution had lasted four hours. It was on the 1st July, 1523, that the first martyrs of the Reformation thus gave their lives for the Gospel.

All good men shuddered when they heard of it. The future excited great alarm. "Executions begin," said Erasmus. "At length," exclaimed Luther, "Jesus Christ gathers some fruit from our doctrine. He forms new martyrs."

But the joy which Luther felt at the fidelity of these two Christian youths was damped by the thought of Lambert. He was the most learned of the three, and had taken the place of Probst as preacher at Antwerp. Agitated in his dungeon, and afraid of death, he was still more alarmed by his conscience, which reproached him with his cowardice, and urged him to confess the Gospel. Shortly after, having got the better of his fears, he boldly proclaimed the truth, and died like his brethren.

A rich harvest was produced from the blood of these martyrs. Brussels turned towards the Gospel.

ST. GUDULE, BRUSSELS.

"Wherever Alexander raises a scaffold," said Erasmus, "the effect is the same as if he sowed heretics."

"Your bonds are my bonds," exclaimed Luther, "your dungeons my dungeons, and your scaffolds my scaffolds! . . . We are all with you, and the Lord is at our head." He then wrote a beautiful poem in celebration of the death of the young monks. In a short time the poem was sung in Germany and the Netherlands, in town and country, everywhere producing an enthusiastic feeling for the faith of the martyrs:—

No! their ashes will not die;
Aboard their holy dust will fly,
And scatter'd o'er earth's farthest strand,
Raise up for God a warlike band.
Satan, by taking life away,
May keep them silent for a day;
But death has from him victory wrung,
And Christ in every clime is sung.

CHAPTER V.

New Pope—The Legate Campeggio—Diet of Nuremberg—Demand of the Legate—Reply of the Diet—Project of a Secular Council—Alarm and Efforts of the Pope—Bavaria—League of Ratisbon—Rigour and Reform—Political Schemes—Opposition—Intrigues of Rome—Edict of Bruges—Rupture.

ADRIAN would doubtless have persisted in violent courses. The inefficacy of his attempts to arrest the Reformation, his orthodoxy, his zeal, his rigour, his conscience even would have made him a cruel persecutor. Providence put it out of his power. On the 14th September, 1523, he died, and the Romans, delighted at their deliverance from this rigid stranger, decked the gate of his physician with flowers, placing over them the inscription—"To the saviour of his country."

Julius de Medici, cousin of Leo X., succeeded, under the name of Clement VII. From the day of his election no more was heard of religious reform. The new pope, like many of his predecessors, thought only of upholding the privileges of the papacy, and employing them as the means of extending his power.

Wishing to repair the faults of Adrian, Clement sent to Nuremberg a legate of his own temper, one of the ablest prelates of his court, the Cardinal Campeggio, a man of great experience in business, and acquainted with almost all the princes of Germany. The legate, who had been received with great pomp in the towns of Italy, soon became aware of the change which had taken place in the empire. On entering Augsburg, wishing, according to custom, to give his benediction to the people, he was received with laughter. He held it as pronounced, and entered Nuremberg incognito, without repairing to the church of St. Sebald, where the clergy were in attendance. No priests went before him in sacerdotal garments; no crucifix was carried before him in state. One would have said it was an ordinary individual walking along the street. Everything announced to the papacy that its reign was drawing to a close.

The diet had again been opened at Nuremberg in January, 1524. A storm threatened the national government, which had owed its existence to the firmness of Frederick. The Swabian league, the wealthiest towns of Germany, and, above all, Charles V., had vowed its destruction. It was accused of favouring the new heresy. Accordingly, it was resolved to renew the administration without retaining one of the old members. Frederick, in vexation, immediately quitted Nuremberg.

The festival of Easter being at hand, Osiander and the evangelical preachers redoubled their zeal. The former preached openly that Antichrist entered Rome the very day Constantine the Great quitted it to take up his residence at Constantinople. The consecration of branches, and several of the other ceremonies of the festival, were omitted; four thousand persons received the Supper in both kinds; and the Queen of Denmark, the emperor's sister, received it publicly, in the same form, in the castle. "Ah!" exclaimed the Archduke Ferdinand in a transport of rage, "I wish you were not my sister!"—"The same womb carried us," replied the queen; "and I will sacrifice everything to please you except the Word of God."

Campeggio shuddered on beholding so much hardihood; but affecting to despise the laughter of the people and the sermons of the preachers, trusting to the support of the emperor and the pope, he reminded the diet of the edict of Worms, and demanded that the Reformation should be suppressed by force. At these words several of the princes and deputies expressed their indignation. "What," said they to Campeggio, "have become of the grievances presented to the pope by the Germanic nation?" The legate, in accordance with his instructions, assumed an air of simple astonishment. "Three copies of that production," said he, "reached Rome; but we had no official communication of it, and I could not believe that a document so unbecoming could have emanated from your lordships."

The diet was indignant at this reply. If this is the way in which their representations are received by the pope, they too, in their turn, will know how to receive those which he may be pleased to address to them. "The people," said several deputies, "are thirsting for the Word of God; and to force it from them, as ordered by the edict of Worms, were to cause torrents of blood to be shed."

The diet immediately proceeded to prepare an answer to the pope. Not having power to abolish the edict of Worms, they appended a clause which virtually annulled it. "It is necessary," said they, "to conform to it so far as possible." Several states had declared that it was impossible. At the same time, evoking the impertunate shade of the councils of Constance and Bâle, the diet demanded that an universal council of Christendom should be convened in Germany.

The friends of the Reformation did not stop here. What was to be expected from a council which, perhaps, never would be called, and which, in all events, would be composed of bishops from all nations? Would Germany submit its anti-Roman feelings to prelates from Spain, France, England, and Italy? The national government having been overthrown, its place must be supplied by a national assembly to protect the interests of the people.

In vain did Hannaert, who had been sent from Spain by Charles V., and all the partisans of Rome and the empire, oppose this project. The majority of the diet were inflexible. It was agreed that a diet, a secular assembly, should meet at Spire in November, to regulate all religious questions, and that the States should direct their theologians forthwith to prepare a list of the controverted points, to be submitted to this august assembly.

The task was immediately commenced. Each province prepared its document. Never had Rome been threatened with a mightier explosion. Franconia, Brandenburg, Henneberg, Windsheim, Wertheim, Nuremberg, declared, in evangelical terms, against the seven sacraments, the abuses of the mass, the worship of saints, and the supremacy of the pope. "Here," said Luther, "is money of a good stamp." Not one of the questions generally agitated will be passed over in silence in this national council. The majority will obtain general measures. . . . The unity of Germany, its independence, and Reformation, will be secured.

At this news the pope could not restrain his anger. What! Is it dared to establish a secular tribunal to decide on religious matters, and that contrary to his authority? If this monstrous resolution is executed, no doubt Germany is saved, but Rome is destroyed! A consistory was assembled in all haste, and from the agitated state of the senators, it might have been supposed that the Germans were marching on the Capitol. "The thing necessary," said Alexander, "is to pluck the electoral hat from the head of Frederick." "The king of England and Spain," said another cardinal, "must threaten to break off all intercourse with the free towns." At last the congregation decided, that the only means of safety was to stir up heaven and earth, in order to prevent the meeting at Spire.

The pope immediately wrote the emperor: "If I am the first to face the storm, it is not because I am the only person threatened by it, but because I sit at the helm. The rights of the empire are attacked even more than the dignity of the court of Rome."

While the pope sent this letter into Castile, he laboured to obtain allies in Germany. He had soon gained one of the most powerful houses of the empire, that of the dukes of Bavaria. The edict of Worms had not been better observed there than elsewhere, and the evangelical doctrine had made great progress; but about the end of 1521, the princes of the country, having been shaken by Dr. Eck, the chancellor of the university of Ingolstadt, had approximated to Rome, and issued an edict, by which they enjoined all their subjects to remain faithful to the religion of their fathers.

The Bavarian bishops testified their alarm at the proposed encroachment of the secular power; and Eck set out to Rome to petition the pope to extend the influence of the princes. The pope granted everything, and even bestowed on the dukes a fifth of the ecclesiastical revenues of their country.

Thus, at a time when the Reformation had not assumed any organized form, Roman catholicism had recourse to powerful institutions for its support; and catholic princes, sanctioned by the pope, laid hands on the revenues of the Church long before the Reformation ventured to touch them. What, then, must be thought of the charges which the Roman Catholics have so often made in this respect?

Clement VII. could count upon the dukes of Bavaria in quelling the formidable assembly of Spire. Shortly after, the Archduke Ferdinand, the Archbishop of Salzbourg, and several other princes, were also gained.

But this did not satisfy Campeggio. Germany must be divided into two camps. Germans must be set against Germans.

During his stay at Stuttgart, the legate, in concert with Ferdinand, had sketched the plan of a league against the Reformation. "There is everything to be feared," said he, "from an assembly where the popular voice will be heard. The Diet of Spire may destroy Rome and save Wittemberg. Let us close our ranks and arrange our order of battle." Ratisbon was fixed on as the place of rendezvous.

Notwithstanding of the jealousy between the houses of Bavaria and Austria, Campeggio succeeded, in the end of June, 1524, in bringing about a meeting in this town between the dukes of Bavaria and the Archduke Ferdinand. The Archbishop of Salzbourg, and the bishops of Trent and Ratisbon, joined them. The bishops of Spire, Bamberg, Augsburg, Strasburg, Bâle, Constance, Freisingen, Passau, and Brixen, were represented by deputies.

The legate opened the meeting with an energetic picture of the dangers to which the Reformation exposed the princes and clergy. "Let us extirpate heresy and save the Church!" exclaimed he.

The conferences continued during fifteen days in the town-house of Ratisbon. A grand ball, which was kept up during a whole night, enlivened this first Catholic assembly held by the papacy against the rising Reformation. The measures intended to destroy the heretics were afterwards resolved.

The princes and bishops engaged to execute the edicts of Worms and Nuremberg,—to allow no change in public worship,—to give no toleration within their states to any married ecclesiastic,—to recall all the students belonging to their states who might be at Wittenberg,—and to employ all the means in their power for the extirpation of heresy. In regard to difficult passages of Scripture, preachers were enjoined to confine themselves to the interpretation given by the Fathers of the Latin Church,—viz., Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and Gregory. Not daring, in presence of the Reformation, to re-establish the authority of the schoolmen, they contented themselves with laying the first foundations of Roman orthodoxy.

On the other hand, not being able to shut their eyes to the scandals and corrupt manners of the priests, they agreed on a scheme of reform, in which they agreed to pay regard to those German grievances in which the court of Rome were least concerned. Priests were forbidden to engage in trade, to haunt taverns, frequent dances, and engage over the bottle in discussing articles of faith.

Such was the result of the confederation of Ratisbon. While taking up arms against the Reformation, Rome conceded somewhat to it. In these resolutions may be observed the first influence of the Reformation of the sixteenth century, in effecting an internal revival in catholicism. The Gospel cannot display its power without compelling its opponents, in some way, to imitate it. Emser had opposed a translation of the Bible to the translation of Luther, and Eck "Common Places" to those of Melancthon; and now Rome opposed to the Reformation those partial attempts at reform to which we owe modern catholicism. But all these acts of Rome were, in reality, only subtle expedients to escape from the danger which threatened her,—branches plucked, it is true, from the tree of the Reformation, but planted in a soil in which they could only die. Life was wanting, and always will be wanting, to similar attempts.

We are here presented with another fact. At Ratisbon the Roman party formed the first league which destroyed German unity. It was in the camp of the pope that the signal for battle was given. Ratisbon was the cradle of that schism—that political disruption of Germany which still, in our day, so many Germans deplore. The national assembly of Spires might, by sanctioning and generalizing the reformation of the Church, have secured the unity of the empire. The separatist conventicle of Ratisbon rent the nation for ever into two parties.

Meanwhile, the projects of Campeggio did not at first succeed so well as had been imagined. Few princes responded to the call. The most decided opponents of Luther—Duke George of Saxony, the Elector Joachim of Brandenburg, the ecclesiastical electors, and the imperial towns—took no part in it. The feeling was, that the pope's legate was forming in Germany a Roman party against the nation itself. The popular sympathies counterbalanced the religious antipathies, and the Reformation of Ratisbon soon became the object of popular derision. But the first step was taken,—the example was given. It was thought that there would afterwards be little difficulty in strengthening and extending the Roman league. Those who still hesitated would find it impossible to avoid being hurried along by the progress of events. To the legate Campeggio belongs the honour of having discovered the mine which brought the German liberties within a finger's-breadth of destruction. Thenceforth, Luther's cause ceased to be entirely of a religious nature; the dispute of the monk of Wittenberg held a place in the politics of Europe. Luther is going to be eclipsed, and Charles V., the pope, and the princes, will be the principal characters on the theatre where the great drama of the sixteenth century is to be performed.

The assembly of Spires, however, was still in perspective; it might repair the mischief which Campeggio had done at Ratisbon. Rome, therefore, used every effort to prevent it. "What!" said the deputies of the pope, not only to Charles V., but to his ally Henry VIII., and the princes of Christendom,—“What! do those proud Germans pretend to decide questions of faith in a national assembly? Apparently kings, the imperial majesty, all Christendom, the whole world, will be obliged to stoop to their decrees.”

The moment was well chosen for influencing the emperor. The war between this prince and Francis I. was at its height. Pescara and the Constable de Bourbon had quitted Italy in May, and having entered France, laid siege to Marseilles. The pope, who did not regard this attack with a friendly eye, was able to make a powerful diversion in the rear of the imperial army. Charles, who must have been afraid to displease him, did not hesitate; but at once sacrificed the independence of the emperor for the favour of Rome and the success of his struggle with France.

On the 15th July, Charles, at Burgos in Castile, issued an edict, in which, in an imperious and impassioned tone, he declared “that it belonged to the pope alone to assemble a council,—to the emperor alone to ask it; that the meeting fixed to take place at Spires could not, and would not, be tolerated; that it was strange in the German nation to undertake a work which all the other nations of the world, even with the pope, would not be entitled to do; that the proper course was to hasten the execution of the decree of Worms against the new Mohammed.”

Thus, from Spain and Italy proceeded the stroke which arrested the progress of the Gospel in Germany. This did not satisfy Charles. In 1519, he had offered to Duke John, the elector's brother, to marry his sister, the Archduchess Catherine, to John Frederick, the duke's son, and heir to the electorate. But was not this the house of Saxony, which maintained the principles of religious and political independence in Saxony, and which Charles hated? He determined to break entirely with the troublesome and criminal representative of evangelical and national ideas, and gave his sister in marriage to John III., king of Portugal. Frederick, who, in 1519, had been indifferent to the overtures of the King of Spain, was able, in 1524, to suppress the indignation he felt at the emperor's conduct; but Duke John keenly expressed what he felt at the blow thus inflicted.

Thus the two hostile camps which were long to rend the empire became more distinctly marked.

CHAPTER VI.

Persecution—Gaspard Tauber—A Bookseller—Cruelties in Wurtemberg, Salzburg, Bavaria, Pomerania—Heury of Zophthen.

THE Romish party did not stop here. The alliance of Ratisbon was not to be a mere form. It was necessary that it should be sealed with blood. Ferdinand and Campeggio went down the Danube together from Ratisbon to Vienna, and, during the voyage, gave to each other promises of cruelty. Persecution immediately commenced in the Austrian states.

STUTTGARD

A citizen of Venice, named Gaspard Tauber, had circulated the works of Luther, and had himself written against the invocation of saints, purgatory, and transubstantiation. Being thrown into prison, he was summoned by the judges, as well theologians as lawyers, to retract his errors. It was thought that he was willing to do so, and everything was prepared to give the people of Vienna the solemn spectacle. On the birthday of Mary, two desks were erected in the cemetery of St. Stephen, the one for the leader of the choir, who was to chant in celebration of the heretic's repentance, and the other for Tauber himself. The form of recantation was put into his hand; the people, the singers, and the priests, were waiting in silence. Whether Tauber had not given any promise, or whether, at the moment of abjuration, his faith suddenly revived with new force, he exclaimed: "I am not convinced, and I appeal to the holy Roman empire." The ecclesiastics, the choir, and the people were amazed. But Tauber continued to demand death sooner than deny the Gospel. He was beheaded, and his body was burnt. His courage made a lasting impression on the citizens of Vienna.

At Bude, in Hungary, an evangelical bookseller, named John, had circulated the New Testament and Luther's writings throughout the country. He was tied to a stake, then all his books were gradually piled around him, and set on fire. John displayed unshaken courage, exclaiming, from the midst of the flames, that he was happy in suffering for the Lord. "Blood succeeds blood!" exclaimed Luther, on hearing of his death; "but this noble blood which Rome is pleased to shed, will at length suffocate the pope with all his kingdoms and all his kings."

Fanaticism became more and more inflamed; evangelical ministers were driven from their churches; magistrates were banished; sometimes dreadful executions took place. In Wurtemberg, an inquisitor named Reichler, caused the Lutherans, and especially their preachers, to be hung on trees. Barbarians were seen coolly nailing ministers to the stake by the tongue, so that the poor sufferers, in struggling or tearing themselves from the wood to which they were fastened, to regain their liberty, were horribly mutilated, and thus were made the instruments of depriving themselves of that gift of speech, which they had long employed in preaching the Gospel.

The same persecutions were carried on in the other states of the catholic league. An evangelical minister of Salzburg was on the way to prison, where he would have ended his days. While the officers, who had him in charge, were drinking in an inn on the road, two peasants, moved with compassion, eluded their vigilance, and delivered the pastor. The wrath of the archbishop was inflamed against the poor youths; and, without any legal process, he gave orders that they should be beheaded. They were led away secretly, at an early hour, beyond the town. When they arrived at the spot where they were to suffer, the executioner himself hesitated; "for," said he, "they have not been tried."—"Do what I command you," sharply replied the commissary of the archbishop, "and leave the responsibility to the prince!" And the heads of the young deliverers immediately fell under the sword.

Persecution raged especially in the states of the dukes of Bavaria; the priests were deposed, and the nobles banished from their castles; informers were employed over the whole of the country; distrust and terror reigned in all hearts. A magistrate, named Bernard Fichtel, was journeying to Nuremberg on the affairs of the duke; on the highway he fell in with Francis Burkhardt, professor at Ingolstadt, a friend of Dr. Eck. Burkhardt accosted him, and they travelled on together. After supper the professor began to speak of religion. Fichtel, being aware of his companion, reminded him that the new edict prohibited such conversation. "Between us," replied Burkhardt, "there is no room for fear." Fichtel then said: "I do not believe that this edict can ever be executed," and expressed himself in an equivocal manner on the subject of purgatory. He added that it was a horrible thing to inflict death for religious opinions. At these words Burkhardt could not restrain himself. "What more just," exclaimed he, "than to cut off the heads of all these villains of Lutherans!" He, however, parted with Fichtel on good terms; but hastened to inform upon him. Fichtel was cast into prison; and the poor man, who had never thought of becoming a martyr, and whose convictions were not deep, only escaped death by the disgrace of a recantation. There was now no safety anywhere, not even in the bosom of a friend.

But the death which Fichtel escaped, others met. In vain was it to preach the Gospel only in secret. The dukes persecuted it in the shade, in concealment, under the roofs of houses, in secret retreats, in the fields.

"The cross and persecution," said Luther, "reign in Bavaria; these ferocious beasts carry it with fury."

Even the north of Germany was not sheltered from these cruelties. Bogislas, duke of Pomerania, having died, his son, who had been brought up at the court of Duke George, persecuted the Gospel; Suaven and Kuipstrow were obliged to save themselves by flight.

But it was in Holstein that one of the strongest instances of fanaticism was given.

HOTEL DE VILLE, RATISBON.

Henry of Zuphten, who had escaped, as we have seen, from the convent of Antwerp, was preaching the Gospel at Bremen; Nicolas Boye, pastor at Mehlendorf, in the Dittmarches, and several pious persons in that district, having invited him to preach the Gospel to them, he complied. Forthwith the prior of the Dominicans and the vicar of the official of Hamburg consulted together. "If he preaches, and the people listen to him," said they, "all is lost!" The prior, after a wakeful night, got up early in the morning, and proceeded to the wild and sterile moor, where the forty-eight regents of the country usually assembled. "The monk of Bremen is arrived," said he to them, "to ruin all the Dittmarches." These forty-eight simple and ignorant men, who were assured that they would acquire great renown by ridding the world of the heretical monk, resolved to put him to death without having either seen or heard him.

It was Saturday, and the prior, wishing to prevent Henry from preaching on Sunday, arrived at midnight at the house of pastor Boye, with the letter of the forty-eight regents. "If it is God's will that I die in the Dittmarches," said Henry Zuphten, "heaven is as near there as anywhere else. I shall preach."

He mounted the pulpit and preached powerfully. The hearers, touched and inflamed by his eloquence, had scarcely left the church, when the prior put into their hands a letter from the forty-eight regents, forbidding them to allow the monk to preach. They immediately sent their representatives to the heath, and, after long debate, the Dittmarches agreed that, considering their complete ignorance of the matter, they would wait till Easter. But the enraged prior waited on some of the regents, and anew inflamed their zeal. "We will write him," said they.—"Beware of doing so," replied the prior; "if he begins to speak, nothing can be done to him. He must be seized during the night, and burnt before he can open his mouth."

It was so resolved. The day after the feast of the Conception, after it was night, the Ave Maria was tolled. At this signal all the peasants of the neighbouring villages assembled, to the number of five hundred; and their leaders having caused five hogsheds of Hamburg beer to be pierced, in this way inspired them with great courage. Midnight struck as they reached Mehlendorf;—the peasants were armed;—the monk's carried torches;—the whole proceeded without order, uttering furious cries. On arriving at the village, they kept a profound silence, lest Henry should escape.

The doors of the curacy were suddenly burst open, and the drunken peasants rushed in, striking at everything that came in their way. They threw down vases, kettles, goblets, clothes, snatched up whatever gold or silver they could find, and pouncing on the poor pastor, struck him, crying: "Kill him! kill him!" They then threw him into the mire. But Henry was their object. They pulled him from his bed, bound his hands behind his back, and dragged him after them. "What brought you here?" they asked. Henry having answered mildly, they exclaimed: "Away! away! if we listen to him we will become heretics like himself." He had been hurried naked over the ice and snow, his feet were bleeding, and he begged they would put him on horseback. "Good sooth," replied they in derision, "we are going to furnish heretics with horses! Get along!"—And they continued to drag him till they reached the heath. A woman, who was at the door of her house as the poor servant of God passed, began to cry. "Good woman," said Henry to her, "weep not for me." The bailie pronounced his condemnation. Then one of the furious men who had brought him struck the servant of Jesus Christ over the head with a sword; another struck him with a club. Next, a poor monk was brought to receive his confession. "Brother," said Henry to him, "did I ever do you any harm?"—"No," replied the monk.—"Then I have nothing to confess to you." The monk withdrew in confusion. Many ineffectual attempts were made to light the pile. In this way the martyr stood for two hours before these furious peasants,—calm, and with his eyes raised towards heaven. As they were binding him to throw him on the pile, he began to make confession of his faith. "Burn first," said a peasant, striking him on the mouth with his fist, "and you will speak after." He was thrown down, but fell on the side of the pile. John Holme, seizing a club, struck him on the breast, and he lay stretched out dead on the burning faggots. "Such is the true history of the sufferings of the holy martyr, Henry of Zuphten."

CHAPTER VII.

Divisions—Lord's Supper—Two Extremes—Carlstadt—Luther—Mysticism of the Anabaptists—Carlstadt at Orlamund—Mission of Luther—Interview at Dinner—Conference of Orlamund—Carlstadt Banished.

THE Reformation, while the Romish party were everywhere drawing the sword against it, was undergoing new developments. It is not at Zurich or Geneva, but at Wittenberg, the centre of the Lutheran revival, that we must trace the beginnings of that reformed Church, of which Calvin has become the greatest doctor. These two great families slept in the same cradle. The union ought also to have crowned their age. But the question of the Supper having been once raised, Luther violently rejected the reformed element, and found himself and his Church in an exclusive Lutheranism. The chagrin which he felt at this rival doctrine deprived him somewhat of the good humour which was natural to him, and gave him a spirit of distrust, a habitual dissatisfaction and irritation, which he had not shewn previously.

It was between two old friends—between the champions who, at Leipsic, had fought together against Rome—between Carlstadt and Luther that this dispute arose. Their attachment to contrary doctrines proceeded, both in the one and in the other, from estimable feelings. In fact, there are two extremes in religion; the one consists in materializing, the other in spiritualizing everything. The former is the extreme of Rome—the latter, that of the mystics. Religion, like man himself, consists of body and soul; the pure idealists, as well as the materialists, are equally wrong, both in religion and in philosophy.

Such is the grand discussion which lies hid under the dispute as to the Supper. While, on a superficial glance, we see only a paltry quarrel about words, a more profound examination discovers in it one of the most important controversies which can occupy the human mind.

The reformers thus form two great divisions; but each of them carries with it a portion of the truth. Luther, with his adherents, mean to combat an exaggerated spiritualism. Carlstadt and the reformed attack a hateful materialism. Each opposes the error which he deems most fatal, and, in opposing it, perhaps goes beyond the truth. But no matter; each of them is true in its general tendency; and though belonging to different armies, these two distinguished doctors are ranged under one common banner—that of Jesus Christ, who alone is the truth in its fullest extent.

Carlstadt thought that nothing could be more hurtful to true piety than confidence in external ceremonies, and in a certain magical influence in the sacraments. Rome had said that external participation in the sacrament of the Supper was sufficient to save, and this principle had materialized religion. Carlstadt saw nothing better fitted to spiritualize it anew than to deny all bodily presence of Christ; and he taught that the sacred repast was merely a pledge to believers of their redemption.

On this subject Luther took quite an opposite direction. He had, at the outset, maintained the view which has just been indicated. In his writing on the mass, which appeared in 1520, he said: "I can every day enjoy the sacraments, if only I remember the word and promise of Christ, and with it nourish and strengthen my faith." Neither Carlstadt, Zwingle, nor Calvin, has ever said anything stronger. It even seems that, at this period, the idea often occurred to him, that a symbolical explanation of the Supper would be the most powerful weapon completely to overthrow the whole popish system; for in 1525, he says that, five years before, he had fought many hard battles in defence of this doctrine; and that any one who could have proved to him that there was nothing but bread and wine in the Supper, would have done him an immense service.

But new circumstances occurred, which engaged him in an opposition, sometimes passionate, to these very views to which he had so nearly approximated. The fanaticism of the Anabaptists explain the direction which Luther then took. These enthusiasts were not satisfied with setting little value on what they called the external word, in other words, the Bible, and pretending to special revelations of the Holy Spirit; they also went the length of despising the sacrament of the Supper as something external, and to speak of internal communion as alone true. Thenceforth, in all the attempts which were made to explain the doctrine of the Supper in a symbolical manner, Luther saw nothing but the danger of shaking the authority of the Holy Scriptures, of substituting arbitrary allegories for their true meaning, of spiritualizing everything in religion, making it consist, not in divine graces, but in human impressions; and thus substituting for true Christianity a mysticism, a theosophy, a fanaticism, which would inevitably become its tomb. It must be acknowledged that, but for the powerful opposition of Luther, the mystical, enthusiastic, and subjective tendency, would then, in all probability, have made rapid progress, and trampled under foot all the blessings which the Reformation was destined to diffuse in the world.

Carlstadt, impatient at not being able freely to develop his faith at Wittenberg, urged by his conscience to combat a system which, according to him, "lowered the death of Christ, and annihilated his righteousness," resolved "to make an outbreak for the love of poor deluded Christendom." He quitted Wittenberg in the beginning of 1524, without notice either to the university or the chapter, and repaired to the little town of Orlamund, whose church was under his superintendance. He caused the vicar to be deposed, and himself to be appointed pastor in his stead; and in spite of the chapter, the university, and the elector, fixed himself in this new post.

Here he soon disseminated his doctrine. "It is impossible," said he, "to find in the real presence any advantage which does not flow from faith without it; it is therefore useless." In explaining the words of Christ in the institution of the Supper, he had recourse to an interpretation which the reformed churches have not received. In the Leipsic discussion, Luther had explained the words, Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build my Church, by separating the two clauses, and applying the latter to the person of the Saviour. "In the same way," said Carlstadt, "take, eat, refers to the bread; but, this is my body, refers to Jesus Christ, who then shewed himself, and intimated by the symbolical sign of the breaking of bread, that the body was soon to be destroyed."

Carlstadt did not stop here. No sooner had he broke loose from the tutelage of Luther, than he felt a revival of his zeal against images. His imprudent harangues, his enthusiastic expressions, must easily, in these times of fermentation, have inflamed men's minds. The people, thinking they heard a second Elijah, broke the idols of Baal. This zeal reached the surrounding villages. The elector wished to interfere; but the peasants answered him, that it was necessary to obey God rather than man. The prince resolved to send Luther to Orlamund to establish peace. Luther saw in Carlstadt a man devoured by a love of renown, a fanatic, who would allow himself to be carried the length of making war on Jesus Christ himself. Frederick might perhaps have made a wiser choice. Luther set out; and Carlstadt saw his troublesome rival once more disarranging his plans of reform, and arresting his course.

Jena is on the road to Orlamund. On arriving in this town on the 23rd August, Luther mounted the pulpit at seven in the morning, and spoke for an hour and a-half in presence of a numerous audience, against fanaticism, rebellion, the destruction of images, and contempt of the real presence, in particular, inveighing strongly against the innovations of Orlamund. He did not name Carlstadt, but every one could see that he had him in view.

Carlstadt, whether by chance or design, was at Jena, and among the number of Luther's hearers. He hesitated not to apply for an explanation of the discourse. Luther was at dinner with the prior of Wittenberg, the burgomaster, the clerk, and pastor of Jena, and several officers in the service of the emperor and the margrave, when a letter from Carlstadt was put into his hands, asking an interview. He handed it to those next him, and replied to the bearer: "If Doctor Carlstadt chooses to come to me, well; if he does not choose to do so, I will dispense with it." Carlstadt arrived. His arrival produced a strong sensation in the party. The greater part, eager to see the two lions at close quarters, ceased dining and stared, while the more timid grew pale with fear.

Carlstadt, on the invitation of Luther, sat down opposite to him, and then said: "Doctor, in your sermon to-day you put me in the same class with those who preach rebellion and assassination. I say that charge is false."

Luther.—"I did not name you; but since you have felt lit, good and well."

After a moment of silence, Carlstadt resumed:—"I engage to prove that on the doctrine of the sacrament you have contradicted yourself, and that no man since the days of the apostles has taught it so purely as I have done."

Luther.—"Write—debate!"

Carlstadt.—"I challenge you to a public discussion at Wittenberg or Erfurt, if you procure me a safe-conduct."

Luther.—"Fear nothing, doctor."

Carlstadt.—"You bind me hand and foot, and when you have put it out of my power to defend myself, you strike me."

There was a pause. Luther resumed:—

"Write against me; but publicly, not in secret."

Carlstadt.—"If I thought you were speaking in earnest I would do so."

Luther.—"Do it and I'll give you a florin."

Carlstadt.—"Give it; I accept it."

At these words Luther put his hand in his pocket and drew out a gold florin, and giving it to Carlstadt, said: "Take it, and attack me valiantly."

Carlstadt, holding the gold florin in his hand, turned to the party, and said: "Dear friends, this is my arrhals,—a pledge that I am authorized to write against Doctor Luther; I take you all to witness."

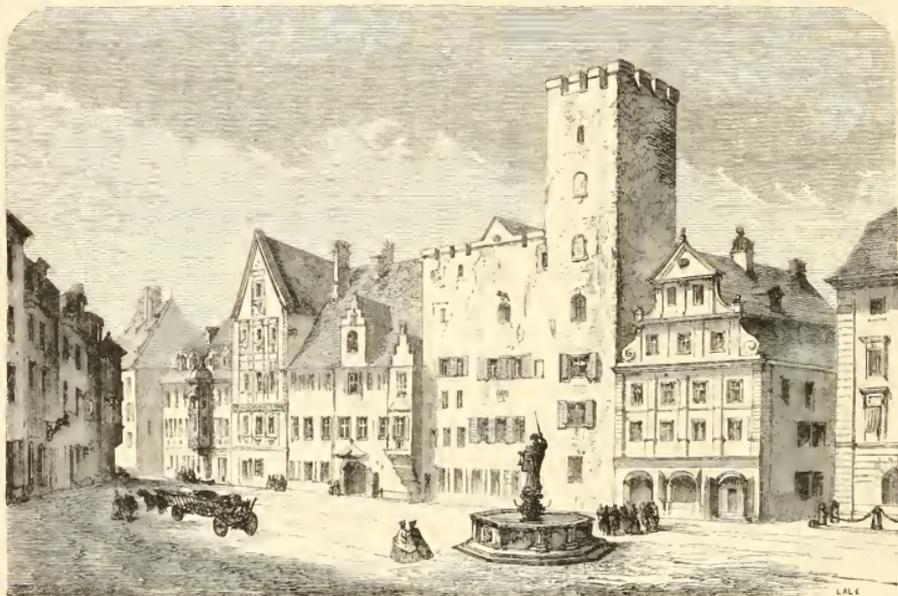

Then bending the florin, that it might be known again, he put it into his purse, and shook hands with Luther. Luther drank his health, and Carlstadt returned it. "The more vigorous your attacks, the more agreeable they will be," resumed Luther.

"If I fail," replied Carlstadt, "it will be my own fault."

They again shook hands, and Carlstadt returned home.

Thus, says a biographer, in the same way as from a single spark often arises the conflagration of a whole forest, from a small beginning arose a great division in the Church.

Luther proceeded to Orlamund, and arrived there ill prepared by the scene at Jena. He assembled the council and the church, and said: "Neither the elector nor the university is willing to recognise Carlstadt as your pastor."—"If Carlstadt is not our pastor," replied the treasurer of the town-council, "St. Paul is a false teacher, and your books are lies, for we have chosen him."

RATISBON.

As he said these words, Carlstadt entered. Some of the persons near Luther motioned to him to be seated; but Carlstadt, going straight up to Luther, said to him: "Dear doctor, allow me to give you welcome!"

Luther.—"You are my enemy. You have my gold florin as a pledge."

Carlstadt.—"I mean to continue your enemy so long as you continue the enemy of God and of His truth."

Luther.—"Begone: I cannot allow you to appear here."

Carlstadt.—"This is a public meeting. If your cause is just, why fear me?"

Luther (to his servant).—"Make ready! make ready! I have nothing to do with Carlstadt; and since he will not leave, I start."

At the same time Luther rose up. Theu Carlstadt withdrew.

After a momentary pause, Luther resumed: "Prove by Scripture that it is right to destroy images."

A Councillor.—"Doctor, you will grant that Moses knew the commandment of God," (opening a Bible.) "Very well; here are his words: Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness."

Luther.—"This passage refers only to the images of idols. If I hang up a crucifix in my chamber without worshipping it, what harm can it do me?"

A Shoemaker.—"I have often taken off my hat to an image which happened to be in my room or on the road; this is an act of idolatry, which robs God of the glory due to Him alone."

Luther.—"It will be necessary, then, because of abuse, to destroy females, and throw our wine into the street."

Another Member of the Church.—"No; they are creatures of God, which we are not enjoined to destroy."

After the conference had lasted some time longer, Luther and his people got up into their carriage, astonished at what had passed, and without having succeeded in convincing the inhabitants, who also claimed for themselves the right of freely interpreting and expounding the Scriptures. There was great agitation in Orlamund; the people insulted Luther, some even cried to him: "Begone, in the devil's name. May you break your neck before you get out of our town." Never yet had the reformer been subjected to such humbling treatment.

He repaired to Kale, the pastor of which had also embraced the doctrines of Carlstadt. Here he resolved to preach. On entering the pulpit he found the remains of a crucifix in it. At first he was deeply moved; but immediately recovering himself, he gathered the fragments into a corner of the pulpit, and delivered a sermon which contained no allusion to the circumstance. "I wished, by contempt," said he afterwards, "to have my revenge of the devil."

The nearer the elector approached his end, the more he seemed to fear that the Reformation was going too far. He gave orders that Carlstadt should be deprived of his situations, and that he should quit not only Orlamund, but the electoral states. In vain did the church of this town interpose in his behalf; in vain did they ask that he should be allowed to reside among them as a citizen, and give an occasional sermon; in vain did they represent that they valued the truth of God more than the whole world, and even than a thousand worlds, had God created a thousand. Frederick was inflexible; he even went the length of refusing the money necessary for his journey. Luther was no party to this harshness of the prince; it was foreign to his nature, and this he shewed at an after period. But Carlstadt regarded him as the author of his misfortune, and filled Germany with his complaints and lamentations. He wrote a farewell letter to his friends of Orlamund. This letter, for the reading of which the bells were rung, and which was heard by the assembled church amidst tears, was signed, "Andrew Bodenstein, banished by Luther without having been either heard or convicted by him."

It is painful to see this bitter quarrel between two who had formerly been friends, and were both excellent men. A feeling of sadness was experienced by all the disciples of the Reformation. What was to become of it, now that its most illustrious defenders had come to blows? Luther saw these fears, and tried to calm them. "Let us fight," said he, "as fighting for another. The cause is God's, the management God's, the glory God's. He will fight and conquer without us. Let that which must fall, fall. Let that which is to stand, stand. It is not our own cause that is in question, nor is it our own glory that we seek."

Carlstadt retired to Strasburg, where he published several productions. "He was thoroughly acquainted," says Dr. Scheur, "with Latin, Greek, and Hebrew." Luther acknowledged the superiority of his erudition. Of an elevated spirit, he sacrificed his reputation, his rank, his country, his bread even, to his convictions. At a later period he retired to Switzerland. It was there he ought to have broached his doctrines; his independence required the free atmosphere in which an Ecolampadius and a Zwingli breathed. His doctrine soon attracted almost as much attention as Luther's theses had obtained. Switzerland seemed to be gained, and with it Bucer and Capito.

Luther's indignation being now at its height, he published one of the most powerful, but also one of the most violent, of his controversial writings,—viz., his book "Against the Heavenly Prophets."

Thus the Reformation, attacked by the pope, attacked by the emperor, attacked by the princes, began also to tear itself to pieces. It appeared on the point of sinking under so many disasters, and certainly must have sunk if it had only been a work of man. But when on the point of sinking, it arose with new energy.

CHAPTER VIII

Progress—Resistance to the Leaguers—Meeting between Philip of Hesse and Melancthon—The Landgrave gained over to the Gospel—The Palatinate, Luneburg, Holstein—The Grand Master at Wittenberg.

THE Catholic League of Ratisbon, and the persecutions which followed it, produced a powerful reaction in the population of Germany. The Germans were not disposed to allow themselves to be deprived of that Word of God which had at length been restored to them. To the orders of Charles V., to the bulls of the pope, to the menaces and scaffolds of Ferdinand, and the other Catholic princes, their reply was: "We shall keep it."

Scarcely had the leaguers left Ratisbon, when the deputies of the towns, whose bishops had taken part in this alliance, feeling surprised and indignant, met at Spire, and resolved that their preachers should, in spite of the bishops, preach the Gospel—and the Gospel alone—conformably to the doctrine of the prophets and apostles. They next proposed to present a firm and unanimous remonstrance to the national assembly.

It is true, the imperial letter, dated from Burgos, arrived, and disturbed their thoughts. Nevertheless, towards the end of the year, the deputies of these towns, and several of the nobles, met at Ulm, and took an oath of mutual defence, in the event of attack. Thus, to the camp formed by Austria, Bavaria, and the bishops, the free towns immediately opposed another, which raised the standard of the Gospel and national freedom.

While the free towns thus took the advanced posts of the Reformation, several princes were gained to the cause. Early in June, 1524, Melancthon was returning on horseback from a visit to his mother, accompanied by Camerarius and some other friends, when, near Frankfort, he fell in with a brilliant train. It was Philip of Hesse, who, three years before, had visited Luther at Worms, and who was now on his way to the games of Heidelberg, which were to be attended by all the princes of Germany.

Thus Providence brought Philip successively into contact with the two reformers. It was known that the distinguished doctor had gone on a visit to his native district, and one of the landgrave's knights said to him: "I believe it is Melancthon." The young prince immediately put spurs to his horse, and coming up to the doctor, said to him: "Are you Philip?"—"I am," replied the scholar, somewhat intimidated, and preparing respectfully to dismount. "Stay!" said the prince; "turn round and come and spend the night with me; there are some subjects on which I wish to have a conversation with you; fear nothing." "What could I fear from such a prince as you?" replied the doctor.—"Ah! ah!" said the landgrave laughing, "were I to take you away and give you up to Campeggio, he would not be sorry, I believe." The two Philips rode alongside of each other. The prince put questions, and Melancthon answered. The landgrave was delighted with the clear and striking views presented to him. Melancthon at last begging he might be allowed to continue his journey, Philip of Hesse had difficulty in parting with him. "On one condition," said he, "and it is, that, on your return, you will write carefully on the subjects which we have been discussing, and send me the production." Melancthon promised. "Go, then," said Philip, "and pass freely through my states."

Melancthon drew up, with his usual talent, "An Abridgment of the Revived Doctrine of Christianity." This concise and powerful production made a decisive impression on the landgrave, who, shortly after his return from the Heidelberg games, without actually joining the free towns, issued an ordinance, in which—opposing the league of Ratisbon—he commanded that the Gospel should be preached in all its purity. He himself embraced it with the energy of his character. "Sooner," exclaimed he, "abandon my body and my life, my states and my subjects, than the Word of God." A monk, the friar minor Ferber, perceiving the prince's leaning to the Reformation, wrote him a letter, reproaching him with his conduct, and conjuring him to remain faithful to Rome. "I resolve," replied Philip, "to remain faithful to the ancient doctrine, but such as is contained in Scripture." Then he proved, with great force, that man is justified only by faith. The monk, astonished, held his peace. The landgrave was called "Melancthon's scholar."

Other princes took a similar direction. The elector-palatine refused to lend himself to any persecution. The Duke of Luneburg, nephew to the Elector of Saxony, began to reform his states; and the King of Denmark ordered, that in Schleswig and Holstein every man should be free to worship God according to his conscience.

The Reformation made a still more important conquest: a prince, the important effects of whose conversion began at this time to turn away from Rome. One day, towards the end of June, shortly after Melancthon's return to Wittemberg, Luther's chamber was entered by the grand-master of the Teutonic order, Albert, margrave of Brandenburg. The chief of the chevalier monks of Germany, who was then in possession of Prussia, had gone to the Diet of Nuremberg to invoke the aid of the empire against Poland.

He returned with a contrite heart. On the one hand, the sermons of Osiander and the reading of the Gospel had convinced him that his condition of monk was contrary to the Word of God; on the other, the breaking up of the national government had taken away all hope of the assistance which he had gone to claim. What, then, will he do? . . . The Saxon councillor Planitz, with whom he quitted Nuremberg, asked him to visit the reformer. "What think you of the rule of my order?" asked the disturbed and agitated prince at Luther. Luther hesitated not; he saw that a conduct conformable to the Gospel could alone save Prussia also. "Implore," said he to the grand-master,—"implore the help of God; reject the absurd and incongruous rule of your order; put an end to this abominable and truly hermaphrodite supremacy, which is neither religious nor secular. Shun false, and seek true chastity,—marry, and in place of this nameless monster found a lawful empire." These words pointed out distinctly to the soul of the grand-master a situation of which he had till then only had an imperfect glimpse. A smile lighted up his features, but he had too much prudence to declare himself; he held his peace. Melancthon, who was present, spoke in similar terms to Luther, and the prince departed for his states, leaving the reformers in the belief that the seed which they had sown in his heart would one day bear fruit.

Thus Charles V. and the pope had opposed the national assembly of Spires, from a fear that the Word of God might gain all who attended it; but the Word of God could not be bound. It was prohibited to be preached in one of the halls of a town in the Low Palatinate. Well! it had its revenge by diffusing itself throughout all the provinces. It aroused the people, enlightened princes, and throughout the empire displayed that Divine power of which neither bulls nor ordinances could ever deprive it.

CHAPTER IX.

Reformers—The Church of All-Saints—Fall of the Mass—Literature—Christian Schools—Science Offered to the Laity—Arts—Moral Religion—Æsthetic Religion—Music—Poetry—Painting.

WHILE the people and their rulers were thus pressing toward the light, the reformers were striving to produce a general revival, to penetrate the whole mass with the principles of Christianity. The form of worship first engaged their attention. The time fixed by the reformer, on his return from the Wartburg, had arrived. "Now," said he, "that men's hearts have been strengthened by Divine grace, the scandals which polluted the Lord's kingdom must be made to disappear, and something must be attempted in the name of Jesus." He demanded that the communion should be dispensed in both kinds,—that everything should be retrenched from the Supper which tended to convert it into a sacrifice,—that Christian assemblies should never meet without hearing the Word preached,—that the faithful, or at least priests and students, should meet every morning at four or five o'clock to read the Old, and every evening, at five or six, to read the New Testament,—that on Sunday the whole Church should assemble, morning and afternoon, and that the leading object in worship should be the preaching of the Word.

In particular, the church of All Saints, at Wittenberg, aroused his indignation. There 9,901 masses were annually celebrated, and 35,570 pounds of wax burnt. So says Seekendorf. Luther called it a "sacrilegious Tophet." "There are," said he, "only three or four lazy bellies who still worship this shameful mammon; and did I not restrain the people, this house of all saints, or rather all devils, would long ago have made a noise in the world, the like of which was never heard."

The struggle commenced around this church. It was like one of those ancient sanctuaries of paganism in Egypt, Gaul, and Germany, which behaved to fall, in order that Christianity might be established.

Luther, desiring that the mass should be abolished in this cathedral, on the 1st March, 1523, addressed a first petition on the subject to the chapter; and on the 11th July, addressed a second. The canons having objected the orders of the elector: "What have we to do here," replied Luther, "with orders from the prince? He is a secular prince. His business is with the sword, and not with the ministry of the Gospel." Luther here clearly draws the distinction between the Church and the State. "There is only one sacrifice," says he again, "which wipes away sins, Christ, who once offered himself; and we have faith in Him, not by works or by sacrifices, but solely by faith in the Word of God."

The elector, who felt his end drawing near, was repugnant to new reforms. But new urgency was joined to that of Luther. Jonas, provost of the cathedral, thus addressed the elector: "It is time to act. A manifestation of the Gospel, so bright as that we now have, usually lasts no longer than a ray of the sun. Let us, therefore, make haste."

This letter of Jonas not having changed the elector's views, Luther lost patience. He thought the moment to give the fatal blow had arrived, and addressed a threatening letter to the chapter: "I beg you amicably, and solicit you seriously, to put an end to all this sectarian worship. If you refuse, you shall, by God's help, receive the recompense which you deserve. I say this for your guidance; and I demand a distinct and immediate answer—yes, or no—before next Sunday, that I may know how to act. God grant you grace to follow His light.

"MARTIN LUTHER,
"Preacher at Wittenberg.

"Thursday, 8th Dec., 1524."

At the same time the rector, two burgomasters, and ten councillors, repaired to the dean, and solicited him, in the name of the university, the council, and the community of Wittenberg, "to abolish the great and horrible impiety committed against the Divine Majesty in the mass."

The chapter was obliged to surrender. It declared that, enlightened by the holy Word of God, it acknowledged the abuses to which its attention had been directed, and published a new order of service, which began to be observed on Christmas, 1524.

Thus fell the mass in this famous sanctuary, where it had so long withstood the reiterated assaults of the reformers. The Elector Frederick, suffering under an attack of the gout, and drawing near his end, was not able, notwithstanding all his efforts, to prevent this great act of reformation. He saw the Divine will in it, and yielded. The fall of the Roman observances in the church of All Saints hastened their end in many of the churches of Christendom. There was everywhere the same resistance; but there was also the same victory. In vain did priests, and in many places even princes, attempt to throw obstacles in the way; they failed.

But it was not worship merely that the Reformation had to change. She, at an early period, placed the school by the side of the Church; and these two great institutions, mighty in regenerating nations, were equally revived by her. The Reformation, when she first appeared in the world, was intimately allied with literature; and this alliance she forgot not in the day of her triumph.

Christianity is not a mere development of Judaism. It does propose, as the papacy would fain do, to confine men again in the swaddling bands of external ordinances and human doctrines. Christianity is a new creation; it seizes man within, and transforms him in his inmost heart; so that he no longer has any need of rules from other men. Through the help of God, he can of himself, and by himself, discern what is true, and do what is good.

To conduct human nature to this state of independence which Christ has purchased for it, and deliver it from the bondage in which Rome had so long kept it, the Reformation behoved to develop the whole man, renewing his heart and his will by the Word of God, and enlightening his understanding by the study of sacred and profane literature.

Luther understood this. He felt that, in order to secure the Reformation, it was necessary to work upon youth, to improve schools, and propagate in Christendom the knowledge necessary to a profound study of the Holy Scriptures. Accordingly, this was one of the objects of his life. He felt this, particularly at the period which we have now reached, and applied to the councillors of all the towns of Germany for the foundation of Christian schools. "Dear sirs," said he to them, "so much money is annually expended on muskets, roads, and embankments, why should not a little be spent in giving poor youth one or two schoolmasters? God is knocking at our door; happy are we if we open to Him. The Divine Word now abounds. Oh! dear Germans, buy, buy, while the market is before your houses! The Word of God and its grace are like a wave which ebbs and goes away. It was with the Jews, but it has passed; and they no longer have it. Paul brought it to Greece, but it passed away; and Greece now belongs to the Turk. It came to Rome and Latium; but thence too it has passed, and Rome now has the pope. Do not suppose you are to have this Word for ever. The contempt shewn for it will chase it away. Wherefore, let him who would have it seize it, and keep it.

"Give attention to children," continues he, still addressing magistrates; "for many parents are like ostriches; they grow callous towards their young, and, contented with having laid the egg, give themselves no further trouble. The prosperity of a town consists, not merely in collecting great treasures, building strong walls, and erecting fine houses, and possessing brilliant armies. If fools come and pounce upon it, its misfortunes will then only be the greater. The true good of a town, its safety and strength, is to have a great number of learned, serious, honest, and well-educated citizens. And whose fault is it, that at present the citizens are so small, if it is not yours, O magistrates! who have allowed youth to grow up like grass in the forest?"

Luther particularly insists on the study of literature and languages. "What use is there, it is asked, in learning Greek and Hebrew? We can read the Bible in German."—"Without languages," replies he, "we should not have received the Gospel. . . . Languages are the sheath which contains the sword of the Spirit; they are the casket which contains the jewels; the vessel which contains the liquor; and as the Gospel expresses it, they are the baskets in which are preserved the bread and fishes to feed the people. If we abandon languages, the result will be, that we shall not only lose the Gospel, but also become unable to speak and write in Latin or in German. So soon as the cultivation of them ceases, the Gospel is in decay, and ready to fall under the power of the pope. But now that languages are again in honour, they diffuse so much light, that the whole world is astonished; and every one must confess that our Gospel is almost as pure as that of the apostles themselves. The holy Fathers, in ancient times, were often mistaken, because they did not know languages; in our days, some, as the Vaudois of Piedmont, do not think languages useful; but though their doctrine is good, they often want the true meaning of the sacred text; they find themselves unarmed against error, and I much fear their faith will not remain pure. Had not languages made me sure of the meaning of the Word, I might have been a pious monk, and have peaceably preached the truth in the obscurity of a cloister; but I should have allowed the pope, sophists, and their antichristian empire to stand."

Luther does not confine himself to the education of ecclesiastics; he is desirous that knowledge should no longer be monopolized by the Church; he proposes to give a share of it to the laity, who, till now, had been disinherited. He proposes that libraries should be established, and that they should not be confined to a collection of the editions of the schoolmen and fathers of the Church, but should also contain the works of orators and poets, even though they should be pagans, as well as works on the fine arts, law, medicine, and history. "These writings serve," says he, "to explain the works and miracles of God."

This work of Luther is one of the most important which the Reformation has produced. It takes science out of the hands of the priests, who had monopolized it, like those of Egypt in ancient times, and restores it to all. From the impulse thus given by the Reformation have proceeded the greatest developments of modern times. Those laymen, literary and learned, who now assail the Reformation, forget that they themselves are its work, and that without it they should still be placed, like ignorant children, under the rod of the clergy. The Reformation discerned the intimate union subsisting between all the sciences; she was aware that, as all science comes from God, so it leads back to God. Her wish was that all should learn, and that they should learn all. "Those who despise profane literature," said Melancthon, "have no higher respect for sacred theology. Their contempt is only a pretext by which they try to hide their sloth."

The Reformation was not contented with giving a strong impulse to literature, she also gave a new impulse to the arts. Protestantism is often charged with being inimical to the arts, and many Protestants readily admit the charge. We will not inquire whether or not the Reformation ought to prevail; we will content ourselves with observing, that impartial history does not confirm the fact on which this accusation rests. Let Roman Catholicism plume itself on being more favourable to the arts than Protestantism—all very well. Paganism was still more favourable to them; and Protestantism places her fame on a different ground. There are religions in which the esthetical tendencies of man occupy a more important place than his moral nature. Christian sentiment is expressed, not by the productions of the fine arts, but by the actings of Christian life. Every sect that abandons the moral tendency of Christianity, thereby loses even its right to the Christian name. Rome has not abandoned this essential characteristic; but Protestantism preserves it in much greater purity. Its glory consists in the thorough investigation of whatever belongs to the moral being, and in judging of religious acts, not from their external beauty and the manner in which they strike the imagination, but according to their internal worth, and the relation which they bear to the conscience; so that, if the papacy is, above all, as a distinguished writer has proved, an esthetical religion, Protestantism is, above all, a moral religion.

Still, although the Reformation addressed man primarily as a moral being, it addressed the whole man. We have just seen how it spoke to his understanding, and what it did for literature: it spoke also to his sensibility, his imagination, and contributed to the development of the arts. The Church was no longer composed merely of priests and monks; it was the assembly of the faithful. All were to take part in worship; and the hymns of the clergy were to be succeeded by those of the people. Accordingly, in translating the Psalms, Luther's object was to adapt them to the singing of the church. In this way a taste for music was diffused over the whole country.

"After theology," said Luther, "it is to music I give the first place and the highest honour. A schoolmaster," he again said, "must be able to sing; without it I will not even look at him."

One day, when some fine pieces were sung to him, he rapturously exclaimed: "If our Lord God has conferred such admirable gifts on this earth, which is only an obscure recess, what will it be in the eternal life, in a state of perfection!" . . . From the days of Luther the people sung; the Bible inspired their hymns; and the impulse given at the period of the Reformation, at a later period produced those magnificent oratorios which seem to be the complete perfection of the art.

The same impulse was given to poetry. It was impossible, in celebrating the praises of God, to be confined to mere translations of the ancient hymns. Luther's own soul, and that of several of his contemporaries, raised by faith to the sublimest thoughts, and excited to enthusiasm by the battles and perils which incessantly threatened the rising Church—inspired, in short, by the practical genius of the Old and the faith of the New Testament, soon gave utterance to their feelings in religious poems, in which poetry and music united and blended their holiest inspirations. Thus the sixteenth century beheld the revival of that divine poetry which, from the very first, had soled the sufferings of the martyrs. We have already seen how, in 1523, Luther employed it in celebrating the martyrs of Brussels: other sons of the Reformation followed in his steps. Hymns were multiplied, and, spreading rapidly among the people, contributed powerfully to awaken them from their slumbers. It was in this same year that Hans Sach sang The Nightingale of Wittemberg. The doctrine which, for four centuries had reigned in the Church, he regards as the moonlight, during which men wandered in the desert. The nightingale now announces the sun, and, singing to the light of day, rises above the clouds of the morning.

While lyric poetry thus arose from the highest inspirations of the Reformation, satire and the drama, under the pen of Hütten, Mürner, and Manuel, attacked the most crying abuses.

It is to the Reformation that the great poets of England, Germany, and perhaps France, owe their lofty flight.

Of all the arts, painting is the one on which the Reformation had the least influence. Nevertheless it was renewed, and in a manner sanctified, by the universal movement which then agitated all the powers of the human mind. The great master of this period, Lucas Cranach, fixed his residence at Wittemberg, where he lived on intimate terms with Luther, and became the painter of the Reformation. We have seen how he represented the contrasts between Christ and antichrist, (the pope,) and thus gained a place among the most powerful instruments of the revolution which was transforming the nations. As soon as he had acquired new convictions, he consecrated his chaste pencil to drawings in harmony with Christian belief, and shed on groups of children, blessed by the Saviour, the grace with which he had previously adorned legendary saints, male and female. Albert Durer was also won by the preaching of the Word, and his genius took a new flight. His masterpieces date from this period. From the features with which, from that period, he painted the evangelists and apostles, we see that the Bible was restored to the people, and that from it the painter drew a depth, a force, a life, and grandeur, which he never could have found in himself.

Still, however, it must be acknowledged, painting is the art whose religious influence is most liable to strong and well-founded objections. Poetry and music came from heaven, and will again be found in heaven; but painting is constantly seen united to grave immoralities or fatal errors. After studying history, or seeing Italy, we are made aware that humanity has little to expect from that art. But whatever may be thought of this exception, which we have thought it our duty to make, our general remark holds true.

The Reformation of Germany, while making its first address to the moral nature of man, has given to the arts an impulse which they could not have received from Roman Catholicism.

Thus there was a universal progress in literature and the arts, in spirituality of worship, in the souls of nations and their rulers. But this magnificent harmony, which the Gospel everywhere produced in the days of its revival, was about to be disturbed. The song of the nightingale of Wittemberg was to be interrupted by the hissing of the storm and the roaring of the lions. A cloud in one moment spread over Germany, and a lovely day was succeeded by a dismal night.

CHAPTER X.

Political Ferment—Luther against Revolution—Thomas Munzer—Agitation—The Black Forest—The Twelve Articles—Luther's Advice—Helfenstein—Advance of the Peasants—Advance of the Imperial Army—Defeat of the Peasants—Cruelty of the Princes.

A POLITICAL fermentation, one very different from that which the Gospel produces, had long been working in the empire. Borne down by civil and ecclesiastical oppression, bound in several countries to the baronial lands, and sold along with them, the people threatened to rise in fury, and burst their chains. This agitation had been manifested long before the Reformation by several symptoms, and thenceforth religion had been blended with political elements. It was impossible in the 16th century to separate these two principles, so intimately associated in the life of nations. In Holland, at the end of the previous century, the peasantry had risen up, placing on their colours, as a kind of armorial bearings, bread and cheese, the two great blessings of these poor people. "The shoe alliance" had shewn itself in the neighbourhood of Spire in 1503. In 1513, it had been renewed at Brigau, and been encouraged by priests. In 1514, Wurtemberg had witnessed "the league of poor Conrad," the object of which was to maintain by revolt "the rights of God." In 1515, Carinthia and Hungary had been the theatre of dreadful commotions. These seditions had been suppressed by torrents of blood; but no redress had been given to the people. A political reform was therefore no less necessary than a religious reform. The people were entitled to it; but it must be confessed they were not ripe for enjoying it.

Since the Reformation had commenced these popular agitations had been renewed; the minds of men had been absorbed by other thoughts. Luther, whose piercing eye discerned the condition of his countrymen, had, even from the height of the Wartburg, addressed grave exhortations, for the purpose of keeping down agitation.

"Revolt," he had said, "does not produce the amelioration which is desired, and God condemns it. What is revolt but taking vengeance into our own hands? The devil is labouring to excite those who embrace the Gospel to revolt, in order to bring it into reproach; but those who have perfectly understood my doctrine do not revolt."

Everything gave reason to fear that the popular indignation could not be much longer restrained. The government which Frederick of Saxony had had so much difficulty in forming, and which possessed the confidence of the nation, was dissolved. The emperor, whose energy might perhaps have supplied the want of this national administration, was absent; the princes, whose union had always constituted the strength of Germany, were divided; and the new declaration of Charles V. against Luther, in taking away all hope of future harmony, deprived the reformer of a portion of the moral authority by which, in 1522, he had succeeded in calming the storm. The principal embankments which had hitherto confined the torrent were broken down, and nothing could restrain its fury.

The religious movement did not produce the political agitation, but in several places it allowed itself to be borne along by its tumultuous waves. Perhaps even more should be conceded; it is perhaps necessary to admit that the movement given to the people by the Reformation gave new force to the discontent which was prevailing in the nation. The violence of Luther's writings, the intrepidity of his actions and his words, the harsh truths which he told, not only to the pope and the prelates, but also to princes themselves, must have contributed to inflame minds already in a state of effervescence. Accordingly Erasmus did not omit to tell him: "We are now gathering the fruits that you have sown." Moreover, the gladsome truths of the Gospel now at length brought fully to light, stirred all hearts, and filled them with hope and expectation. But many unregenerate souls remained unprepared by Christian repentance, faith, and freedom. They wished indeed to reject the yoke of the pope, but they wished not to accept the yoke of Christ. Accordingly, when princes devoted to Rome sought in their wrath to stifle the Reformation, though true Christians knew how to bear these cruel persecutions with patience, the multitude fumed and broke out. Seeing their wishes pent in one direction, they procured an outlet for them in another. "Why," said they, "when the Church calls all men to a noble freedom, why should slavery be perpetuated in the state? Why, when the Gospel speaks only of meekness, should government reign only by force?" Unhappily, at the time when religious reform was received with equal joy by princes and people, political reform, on the contrary, was opposed by the most powerful portion of the nation; while the former had the Gospel for its rule and support, the latter had no other principles than violence and despotism. Accordingly, while the one kept within the limits of truth, the other, like an impetuous torrent, quickly overleapt these and also those of justice. But to attempt not to see an indirect influence of the Reformation in the disturbances which broke out in the empire, were, in my opinion, to give proof of partiality. By means of religious discussions a fire had been kindled in Germany, and it was impossible that some sparks should not fly off from it, of a nature fitted to inflame the passions of the people.

The pretensions of some fanatics to heavenly inspiration augmented the evil. While the Reformation had constantly appealed from the pretended authority of the Church to the real authority of Scripture, these enthusiasts rejected not only the authority of the Church, but also that of Scripture. They spoke only of an internal word, of a revelation of God within; and overlooking the natural corruption of their heart, they gave themselves up to all the intoxication of spiritual pride, and imagined themselves to be saints.

"To them," says Luther, "the Holy Scriptures were only a dead letter, and all began to cry Spirit! Spirit! But assuredly I will not follow where their spirit leads them. May God in His mercy preserve me from a Church where there are none but saints. I wish to remain where the humble, feeble, and sickly are, who know and feel their sin, and who, without ceasing, sigh and cry to God from the bottom of their heart to obtain His consolation and assistance." These words of Luther are profound, and mark the change which was taking place in his views as to the nature of the Church. They shew, at the same time, how much the religious principles of the revolted were opposed to the Reformation.

The most remarkable of these enthusiasts was Thomas Münzer. He was not without talents, had read the Bible, was zealous, and might have been able to do good if he had known how to collect his agitated thoughts, and find peace of heart. But not knowing himself, and being void of true humility, he was possessed with a desire to reform the world, and like all enthusiasts forgot that reform ought to begin at himself. Mystical treatises which he had read in his youth had given a false direction to his mind. He first appeared at Zwickau, quitted Wittemberg after Luther's return, discontented with the inferior part he was playing there, and became pastor of the small town of Alstadt in Thuringia. Here he could not long remain quiet. He accused the reformers of founding, by their attachment to the letter, a new papism, and of founding churches which were not pure and holy.

"Luther," said he, "has delivered consciences from the yoke of the pope; but he has left them in a carnal freedom, and has not carried them forward in spirit toward God."

He thought himself called by God to remedy this great evil. According to him, the revelations of the Spirit were the means by which his reform was to be accomplished. "He who possesses this Spirit," said he, "has true faith, even though he should never in his life see the Holy Scriptures. Pagans and Turks are more proper to receive it than many Christians who call us enthusiasts." When he thus spoke he had Luther in his eye. "In order to receive this Spirit," added he, "it is necessary to mortify the body, wear shabby clothes, let the beard grow, have a gloomy air, keep silence, frequent retired spots, and beg God to give us a sign of His favour. Then God will come and speak with us as He once did with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Did He not do so it would not be worth men's while to pay any attention to Him. I have received a commission from God to assemble His elect in a holy and eternal alliance."

The agitation and ferment working in men's minds, were only too favourable to the propagation of their enthusiastic ideas. Man loves the marvellous, and everything that flatters his pride. Münzer, having drawn a portion of his flock into his views, abolished church music and all ceremonies. He maintained, that to obey princes, "is devoid of reason," was to serve God and mammon. Then, marching at the head of his parishioners to a chapel near Alstadt, and which was resorted to by pilgrims from all quarters, he threw it down. Obligated, after this exploit, to flee the country, he wandered up and down in Germany, and went as far as Switzerland, carrying with him, and communicating to all who would listen to him, the plan of a universal revolution. He everywhere found men's minds prepared; he threw gunpowder on burning coals, and a violent explosion was the immediate result.

Luther, who had repelled the warlike enterprises of Seckingen, could not allow himself to be carried away by the tumultuous movements of the peasantry. Happily, for social order, the Gospel had him in charge; for what might have happened had he given his vast influence to their camp? . . . He always firmly maintained the distinction between spiritual and secular; he ceased not to repeat, that what Christ emancipated by His Word was immortal souls; and while with one hand he attacked the authority of the Church, he with the other equally maintained the power of princes. "A Christian," said he, "must endure death a hundred times sooner than give the least countenance to the revolt of the peasants." In a letter to the elector, he says: "What particularly delights me is, that these enthusiasts make a boast to every one who listens to them, that they are not of us. They say it is the Spirit that prompts them. But I reply: It is a bad spirit that bears no other fruit than the pillaging of convents and churches,—the greatest robbers on the face of the earth can do as much."

At the same time Luther, who wished others to have the same liberty that he desired for himself, dissuaded the prince from rigorous measures. "Let them preach as they will, and against whomsoever they see it good; for it is necessary that the Word of God itself should lead the van and give them battle. If theirs is the true Spirit, he will not fear our severities; if ours is the true, he will not fear their violence. Let us leave the spirits to struggle and fight with each other. Some, perhaps, will be seduced, as there is no battle without wounds; but he who fights faithfully will be crowned. Nevertheless, if they will take the sword, your highness must forbid it, and order them to quit the country."

The revolt broke out in the districts of the Black Forest, and the sources of the Danube, which had so often been agitated by popular commotions. On the 19th July, 1524, some Thurgovian peasants rose up against the Abbot of Reichenau, who refused to give them an evangelical preacher. Thousands were soon assembled around the little town of Tenger, for the rescue of an ecclesiastic who was kept prisoner. The revolt spread with inconceivable rapidity from Swabia, as far as the countries of the Rhine, Franconia, Thuringia, and Saxony. All these countries had risen in January, 1525.

Towards the end of this month the peasants published a declaration in twelve articles, in which they demanded liberty to choose their own pastors, the abolition of small tithes and villanage, the taxes on heritage, liberty of hunting, fishing, and cutting wood. Each demand was supported by a quotation from Scripture. "If we are mistaken," said they, in conclusion, "Luther can put us right by Scripture."

The opinions of the Wittenberg theologians were asked. Luther and Melancthon gave theirs—each separately. They are very characteristic. Melancthon, who regarded every kind of disturbance as a great crime, oversteps his usual gentleness, and cannot give strong enough expression to his indignation. The peasants are criminals, against whom he invokes all laws, human and Divine. If friendly conference proves ineffectual, the magistrates must pursue them as robbers and assassins. "However," he adds, (and it was, indeed, necessary that some one trait should remind us of Melancthon,) "let there be pity shewn to orphans in inflicting the punishment of death."

Luther's opinion of the revolt was the same as Melancthon's; but he had a heart which beat at the wretchedness of the people. He, on this occasion, shewed a lofty impartiality, and told the truth frankly to both parties. He first addressed the princes, and more especially the bishops:

"You," said he to them, "are the cause of the revolt. Your invectives against the Gospel, your culpable oppression of the little ones of the Church, have brought the people to despair. It is not the peasants, dear lords, who rise up against you; it is God himself who wishes to oppose your fury. The peasants are only the instruments whom He is employing to humble you. Think not to escape the punishment which He is preparing for you. Even should you succeed in destroying all these peasants, God would of the very stones raise up new ones to chastise your pride. If I wished revenge, I would laugh in my sleeve, look on while the peasants act, or even stimulate their rage; but God forbid! . . . Dear lords, for the love of God, lay aside your indignation, treat the poor people with discretion, as you would persons drunk and bewildered. Suppress these commotions by gentleness, lest a conflagration break forth, and set all Germany in a blaze. Among their twelve articles are some which are just and equitable."

This exordium was fitted to gain the confidence of the peasants, and make them listen patiently to the truths which he had to tell them. He represented to them that a great part of their demands were, doubtless, well founded; but that to revolt was to act like pagans,—that the duty of Christians was patience, and not war,—and that if they continued to rise in the name of the Gospel, against the Gospel itself, he would regard them as more dangerous enemies than the pope. "The pope and the emperor," continued he, "have united against me; but the more the pope and the emperor have stormed, the greater the progress which the Gospel has made. . . . Why so? Because I have never drawn the sword, nor called for vengeance, —because I have not had recourse either to tumult or revolt. I have committed all to God, and awaited His strong hand. It is neither with the sword nor the musket that Christians fight, but with suffering and the cross. Christ, their captain, did not handle the sword; He hung upon the tree."

But in vain did Luther give utterance to these most Christian expressions. The people were too much excited by the fanatical discourses of the leaders of the revolt to lend their ear, as formerly, to the reformer. "He is playing the hypocrite," they said; "he is flattering the princes. He has waged war with the pope, and yet he would have us to submit to our oppressors!"

The revolt, instead of being calmed, became more formidable. At Weinsberg, Count Louis of Helfenstein, and seventy men under his command, were condemned to death. A party of peasants held their pikes before them in close phalanx; others chased and drove back the count and his soldiers on this bristling forest. The wife of the unhappy Helfenstein, a natural daughter of the Emperor Maximilian, with an infant of two years old in her arms, fell on her knees, and, with loud cries, implored the life of her husband, and endeavoured to stop the murderous band; a young boy, who had been in the service of the count, and had joined the rebels, capered near him, playing the dead march on a fife, as if the victims had been dancing to it. All perished: the child was wounded in its mother's arms, and she herself was thrown on a dung-cart, and so taken to Heilbronn.

On hearing of these cruelties, a cry of horror was heard among the friends of the Reformation, and a fearful struggle took place in Luther's feeling heart. On the one hand the peasants, deriding his representations, pretended to revelations from heaven, made an impious use of the threatenings of the Old Testament, proclaimed the equality of ranks, and a community of goods, defended their cause with fire and sword, and had recourse to barbarous executions. On the other hand, the enemies of the Reformation asked the reformer with a malignant smile, if he did not know that it was easier to kindle a fire than to extinguish it? Indignant at their excesses,—alarmed at the thought that they might arrest the progress of the Gospel,—Luther no longer hesitated; all delicacy was at an end; he broke loose against the rebels with all the force of his character, and, perhaps, exceeded the just limits within which he ought to have confined himself.

"The peasants," said he, "commit these horrible sins towards God and towards men; and, by so doing, deserve the death both of the body and the soul. First, they revolt against the magistrates to whom they have sworn fidelity. Next, they rob and pillage convents and castles. Last of all, they cloak their crimes with the mantle of the Gospel. If you do not put a mad dog to death you will perish yourself, and the whole country with you. He who is slain in fighting for magistrates will be a true martyr, if he has fought with a good conscience." Luther afterwards gives an energetic picture of the culpable violence of the peasantry in compelling simple and peaceful men to enter their alliance, and so drag them into the same condemnation. He then adds: "Wherefore, dear lords, aid, save, deliver, have pity on these poor people. Strike, stab, and kill who can. . . . If you die you cannot have a happier end, for you die in the service of God, and to save your neighbour from hell."

Neither gentleness nor force could arrest the popular torrent. It was no longer for Divine service that the church bell sounded; whenever its grave and solemn sounds were heard rising from the plains, it was the tocsin, and all rushed to arms. The people of the Black Forest had mustered around John Muller of Bulgenbach. Of an imposing appearance, clothed in a red mantle, and with a red bonnet on his head, this leader paraded proudly from village to village, followed by his peasants. Behind him on a car, adorned with ribbons and branches of trees, waved the three-coloured flag,—black, red, and white,—the signal of revolt. A herald, decked in the same colours, read the twelve articles, and called on the people to join the movement. Whoever refused was excluded from the community.

This procession, which was at first peaceable, soon became more restless. "The barons," they exclaimed, "must be forced to join the alliance." And to bring them to this, they pillaged their granaries, emptied their wine cellars, fished the baronial ponds, laid the castles of those nobles who resisted them in ruins, and burned convents. Resistance inflamed the rage of these rude men. Equality no longer satisfied them: they would have blood; and vowed that every man who wore a spur should bite the dust.

On the approach of the peasants, the towns, unable to resist, opened their gates and joined the rebels. In every place they entered pictures were torn, and crucifixes broken to pieces. Armed females ran up and down the streets threatening the monks. When defeated in one place, they again mustered in another, and defied the most formidable armies and bodies of troops. A committee of peasants was established at Heilbronn. The counts of Lowenstein being captured, were clothed in a white frock, with a white baton in their hands, and made to swear to the twelve articles. "Brother George, and you, brother Albert," said a tinker to the counts of Hohenloe, who had repaired to the camp, "swear to conduct us as brethren; for you also are now peasants: you are no longer lords." The equality of ranks, that dream of all democrats, was established in aristocratic Germany.

A great number of nobles, some from fear and others from ambition, now joined the revolters. The famous Götz of Berlichingen, when he saw his people refuse to obey him, wished to fly to the Elector of Saxony; but his wife, who was in childbed, in order to keep him near her, concealed the elector's reply. Götz, almost hemmed in, was obliged to place himself at the head of the rebellious host. On the 7th May the peasants entered Wurtzburg, and were received by the citizens with acclamation. The troops of the princes and knights of Swabia, who had assembled in this town, evacuated it, and retired in haste to the citadel, the last rampart of the nobility.

But the movement had already extended to other parts of Germany. Spire, the Palatinate, Alsace, and Hesse, acknowledged the twelve articles, and the peasants threatened Bavaria, Westphalia, the Tyrol, Saxony, and Lorraine. The Margrave of Baden, having refused the articles, was obliged to flee. The coadjutor of Fuldah acceded to them laughing. The small towns said that they had no lances to oppose to the revolvers. Mentz, Treves, and Frankfort, obtained the liberties which they claimed.

An immense revolution is taking place throughout the empire. The ecclesiastical and secular taxes which oppress the peasants must be suppressed; the property of the clergy will be secularized to compensate the princes, and provide for the wants of the empire; imposts must be abolished, with the exception of a tribute, which will be paid every ten years; the governing power recognised by the New Testament will alone subsist; all other princes will cease to reign; sixty-four free tribunals will be established, and men of all classes will have seats in them; all states will return to their primitive destination; ecclesiastics will henceforth only be pastors of churches; princes and knights will only be defenders of the weak; unity of weights and measures will be introduced; and only one species of money will be coined throughout the empire.

Meanwhile the princes had recovered from their first stupor, and George of Truchsess, general-in-chief of the imperial army, was advancing from the direction of the lake of Constance. He defeated the peasants, on the 2d of May, at Beblingen, marched on the town of Weinsberg, where the unfortunate Helfenstein had perished, and burnt and razed it, ordering the ruins to be kept up as an eternal memorial of the treachery of the inhabitants. At Fürfeld he joined the elector-palatine and the Elector of Treves, and they all advanced in a body towards Franconia.

Frauenburg, the citadel of Wurtzburg, still held out for the princes, and the grand army of the peasants continued under its walls. On learning the approach of Truchsess, they determined on the assault; and on the 15th of May, at nine in the evening, the trumpets sounded, the three-coloured flag was unfurled, and the peasants rushed to the attack, uttering fearful cries. Sebastian of Rotenhan, one of the warmest friends of the Reformation, had the command of the castle. He had placed the defence on a formidable footing, and when he exhorted the soldiers courageously to repel the assault, all had sworn to do so, by raising three of their fingers to heaven. The most dreadful combat then took place. The energy and despair of the peasants was answered by the fortress with petards, showers of sulphur and boiling pitch, and discharges of artillery. The peasants, thus struck by invisible enemies, were for a moment surprised; but their fury soon increased. Night advanced, and the struggle was prolonged. The fortress, lighted up by thousands of battle-fires, seemed, amid the darkness, like a proud giant vomiting flames, and single-headed amidst the cannons' roar struggling for the safety of the empire against the ferocious valour of savage hordes. Two hours after midnight the peasants, having failed in all their efforts, at last withdrew.

They proposed to negotiate either with the garrison or with Truchsess, who was advancing at the head of his army. But this was to abandon their position. Violence and victory alone could save them. After some irresolution, they determined to set out and meet the imperial army; but the artillery and the cavalry made frightful ravages in their ranks. At Königshofen, and next at Engelstadt, these poor creatures were completely defeated. The princes, nobles, and bishops, abusing their victory, displayed unheard-of cruelty. The prisoners were hung up along the roads. The Bishop of Wurtzburg, who had fled, returned, and going over his whole diocese with executioners, watered it at once with the blood of rebels, and the blood of the peaceable friends of the Word of God. Götz of Berlichingen was condemned to perpetual imprisonment. The Margrave Casimir of Anspach, put out the eyes of eighty-five peasants, who had sworn that they would never again look upon this prince; and cast upon the world this band of blind men, who went up and down holding each other by the hand, feeling their way, stumbling, and begging their bread. The wretched boy who had played the death-march of Helfenstein, was chained to a stake, a fire was kindled around him, and the knights stood by laughing at his horrible contortions.

The ritual was everywhere established in its ancient form. The most flourishing and populous countries of the empire now presented to the traveller only heaps of carcases and smoking ruins. Fifty thousand men had perished, and the people almost everywhere lost the little freedom which they had hitherto enjoyed. Such was, in the south of Germany, the fearful end of this revolt.

CHAPTER XI.

Münzer at Mulhausen—Appeal to the People—March of the Princes—End of the Revolt—Influence of the Reformers—Sufferings—Change.

But the evil was not confined to the south and west of Germany. Münzer, after traversing part of Switzerland, Alsace, and Swabia, had again directed his steps towards Saxony. Some citizens of Mulhausen invited him into their town, and appointed him their pastor. The town council having resisted, Münzer deposed it, and named another, composed of his friends, with himself at their head. Entertaining the utmost contempt for the Christ, "sweet as honey," whom Luther preached, he determined to have recourse to the most energetic measures. "It is necessary," said he, "to make all the nations of Caanan perish by the sword, as Joshua did." He established a community of goods, and pillaged the convents. Luther, 11th April, 1525, wrote to Amsdorff: "Münzer is king and emperor of Mulhausen, and no longer merely its pastor." The poor no longer worked; if any one needed cloth or corn, he went and asked it of some rich neighbour; if refused, the poor man seized it; if the rich man resisted, he was hanged. Mulhausen being an independent town, Münzer was able to exercise his power without opposition almost for a year. The revolt of the south of Germany led him to believe that it was time to extend his new kingdom. He caused cannon of large calibre to be cast in the Franciscan convent, and endeavoured to make a rise among the peasants and the miners of Mansfeld. "How long will you still sleep?" said he to them, in a fanatical proclamation, "rise and fight for the Lord! It is time. France, Germany, and Italy are on the march. On! on! on!—Dran! dran! dran! Pay no regard to the distress of the ungodly. They will beseech you like children, but remain pitiless. Dran! dran! dran! The fire burns. Let your sword be always reeking with blood. Dran! dran! dran! Work while it is day." The letter was signed, "MÜNZER, servant of God against the ungodly."

The country people, eager for plunder, flocked to his banners. Everywhere, in the districts of Mansfeld, Stolberg, Schwartzburg in Hesse, the Duchy of Brunswick, the peasants rose. The convents of Michelstein, Ilsenburg, Walkenried, Rossleben, and many others near the Harz, or in the plains of Thuringia, were completely pillaged. At Reinhardtsbrunn, which Luther had visited, the tombs of the ancient landgraves were profaned, and the library destroyed.

Terror spread far and wide. At Wittenberg even some uneasiness was felt. Those teachers, who had not feared either the emperor or the pope, saw themselves obliged to tremble before a madman. They were constantly looking out for the news, and counted every step of the revolvers. "We are here," said Melancthon, "in great danger. If Münzer succeeds it is all over with us, at least if Christ do not save us. Münzer advances with a cruelty worse than that of the Scythians; and it is impossible to mouth the atrocious menaces which he throws out."

The pious elector had long hesitated as to the course he ought to pursue. Münzer had exhorted him—him and all princes to be converted, "because," as he said, "their hour was come;" and he had signed his letters, "MÜNZER, armed with the sword of Gideon." Frederick had been desirous to bring back these bewildered men by gentleness. When dangerously ill, he had written, on the 14th April, to his brother John: "Perhaps these poor people have had more than one ground for revolt. Ah, the poor are oppressed in many ways by their temporal and spiritual lords!" And when he was reminded of the humiliation, revolutions, and dangers to which he was exposed if he did not powerfully suppress the rebellion, he replied: "Hitherto I have been a powerful elector, having horses and carriages in abundance; if it is now the Lord's will to take them from me, I will walk on foot."

The first of the princes who had recourse to arms was the young landgrave, Philip of Hesse. His knights and soldiers vowed to live and die with him. After pacifying his own states, he directed his course towards Saxony. Duke John, the elector's brother, Duke George of Saxony, and Duke Henry of Brunswick, advanced in the other direction, and united their forces with those of Hesse. The peasants, frightened at the sight of this army, took refuge on a hill, where, without discipline, without armour, and the greater part without courage, they made a rampart of their waggons. Münzer did not even know how to prepare powder for his immense cannon. No assistance appeared. The army hemmed in the rebels, who began to despond. The princes, taking pity on them, offered conditions, which they seemed disposed to accept; when Münzer betook himself to the most powerful instrument which enthusiasm can bring into play. "To-day," said he, "we shall see the arm of the Lord, and all our enemies will be destroyed." At that moment a rainbow appeared, and Münzer took advantage of it. "Fear not," said he to the burghers and peasants, "I will receive all the bullets which will be shot at you in my sleeve." At the same time he ordered a young gentleman, Maternus of Geholfen, an envoy of the princes, to be cruelly murdered, that he might in this way deprive the rebels of all hope of pardon.

The landgrave having assembled his troops, said to them: "I know well that we princes are often in fault, for we are men; but it is God's pleasure that princes be honoured. Let us save our wives and our children from the fury of these murderers. The Lord will give us the victory; for He has said: He who resists the power, resists the ordinance of God." Philip then gave the signal for attack. This was on the 15th May, 1525. The army moved forward; but the crowd of peasants remained immovable, singing the hymn, "Come, Holy Spirit," and waiting till Heaven should declare in their favour. The artillery soon broke the main body, carrying death and consternation into the midst of them. Their fanaticism and courage at once forsook them,—they were seized with a panic, and fled in disorder. Five thousand perished in the fight. After the battle, the princes and their victorious troops entered Frankenhäusen. A soldier having gone up to the loft of the house where he was quartered, found a man in bed. "Who are you?" said he to him. "Are you a rebel?" Then having discovered a portfolio, he took it, and found letters in it addressed to Thomas Münzer. "Are you Thomas?" said the trooper. The sick man, in consternation, said, "No." But the soldier using dreadful threats, Münzer (for it was indeed he) confessed who he was. "You are my prisoner," said the soldier. Being taken before Duke George and the landgrave, Münzer ended by saying that he had done right in trying to chastise the princes, since they opposed the Gospel.—"Wretch!" said they to him, "think of all those whose destruction you have caused." But he replied with a smile, in the midst of his anguish: "They would have it so." He received the sacrament under one kind, and was beheaded along with Pfeiffer, his lieutenant. Mulhausen was taken, and the peasants were loaded with chains.

A noble having observed in the crowd of prisoners a peasant of good appearance, approached him, and said: "Well, my lad, which government pleases you best—that of peasants or that of princes?" The poor man replied with a sigh: "Ah, my lord, there is no knife whose blade cuts so keenly as the tyranny of one peasant over another."

The remains of the revolt were extinguished in blood. Duke George, in particular, displayed great severity. In the states of the elector there was neither punishment nor execution. The Word of God, preached in all its purity, had shewn its efficacy in restraining the tumultuous passions of the people.

In fact, Luther had never ceased to combat the rebellion, which he regarded as the forerunner of the universal judgment. He had spared nothing—instruction, entreaty, not even irony. At the end of the articles prepared by the rebels at Erfurt, he had added, as a supplementary article: "Item, the following article has been omitted: Henceforth the honourable council shall have no power; it shall have nought to do but sit like an idol or a log; the community will chew all its meat for it; and the council will govern bound hand and foot. Henceforth the waggon will go before the horses, the horses hold the reins, and all go on admirably, conformably to the fine project which these articles expound."

Luther did not content himself with writing. While the tumult was at its height he left Wittenberg, and travelled over several of the districts where the greatest agitation reigned. He preached and laboured to soften down men's spirits; and his hand, which God rendered powerful, directed, calmed, and brought back to their old channel, those furious torrents which had burst their banks.

The teachers of the Reformation everywhere exerted the same influence. At Halle, Brentz, by the promises of the Divine Word, raised the drooping spirits of the burghers, so that four thousand peasants had fled before six hundred citizens. At Ichterhausen, a multitude of peasants having assembled with the intention of demolishing several castles, and putting the noble proprietors to death, Frederick Myconius went to them alone; and such was the power of his eloquence, that their design was immediately abandoned.

Such was the part acted by the reformers and the Reformation in the midst of the revolt. They combated it with all their might by the sword of the Word, and energetically maintained the principles which alone are capable, at all times, of preserving order and obedience among the nations. Accordingly, Luther maintained, that if the power of sound doctrine had not arrested the fury of the people, the revolt would have caused much greater ravages, and completely overthrown both Church and State. There is every reason to believe that this dismal foreboding would have been realized.

If the reformers thus combated sedition, it was not without receiving severe shocks from it. The moral agony which Luther at first felt in the cell at Erfurt, was perhaps at its greatest height after the revolt of the peasants. A great transformation among mankind is not produced without suffering on the part of those who are the instruments of it. To complete the work of Christianity, the agony of the cross was necessary; but He who hung upon the cross addresses each of His disciples in the words: Are ye able to be baptized with the baptism that I am baptized with?

On the part of the princes it was incessantly repeated that Luther and his doctrine were the cause of the revolt; and however absurd this idea was, the reformer could not see it so generally received without a feeling of deep grief. On the part of the people, Münzer, and all the leaders of the sedition, represented Luther as a vile hypocrite, a flatterer of the great; and these calumnies were readily credited. The violent terms in which Luther denounced the rebels, had offended even moderate men. The friends of Rome triumphed; all were against him, and the wrath of his age lay as a burden upon him. But what tore his soul most of all, was to see the work of heaven thus dragged through the mire, and placed in the same rank with the most fanatical projects. He here recognised his Gethsemane; he saw the bitter cup which was presented to him, and anticipating universal desertion, exclaimed: "Omnes vos scandalum patiemini in ista nocte."—"All ye shall be offended because of me this night." (Matt. xxvi. 31.)

Still, amidst all this bitterness of feeling, he preserved his faith. "He," said he, "who enabled me to trample the enemy under foot, when he rose up against me like a cruel dragon or a raging lion, will not permit this enemy to crush me, now that he appears with the perfidious aspect of the serpent. I behold these misfortunes, and I lament them. I have often asked myself if it would not be better to allow the papacy quietly to take its own course, rather than see so many disturbances and divisions break out in the world. But no! Far better rescue some from the devil's throat than leave them all under his murderous fangs."

It was at this period that a revolution in Luther's mind, which had begun in the Wartburg, was completed. The internal life no longer sufficed him; the Church and her institutions assumed a high importance in his eyes. The boldness with which he had demolished, stopped at the sight of more radical demolition; he felt that it was necessary to preserve, guide, build up, and from amidst the bloody ruins with which the wars of the peasants covered Germany, the edifice of the New Church began slowly to arise.

These disturbances left a deep and lasting emotion. The population was struck with terror. The masses who had sought in the Reformation only political liberty, withdrew spontaneously when they saw that spiritual liberty alone was offered them. The opposition of Luther to the peasants, was equivalent to a renunciation of the ephemeral favour of the people. An apparent calm was soon established, and the turmoil of enthusiasm and sedition was, throughout Germany, succeeded by a silence which terror inspired.

Thus the popular passions, the revolutionary cause, the prosecution of a radical equality, failed in the empire; but the Reformation did not fail. These two movements, which many confound, are clearly distinguished by their different results. Revolt came from beneath, the Reformation from above. A few cavalry and cannon were sufficient to suppress the former; but the latter ceased not to rise, strengthen, and increase, in spite of the incessantly renewed attacks of the empire and the Church.

CHAPTER XII.

Two Issues—Death of Frederick—The Prince and the Reformer—Catholic Alliance—Projects of Charles—Dangers.

STILL, however, the cause of the Reformation seemed at first doomed to perish in the abyss which engulfed the popular liberties. A sad event which now occurred seemed destined to hasten its end. At the moment when the princes were marching against Münzer, ten days before his defeat, the old Elector of Saxony—he whom God had raised up to defend the Reformation against attacks from without—was descending into the tomb.

His strength was daily decaying, and the horrors with which the war of the peasants was accompanied, were breaking his compassionate heart. "Ah!" exclaimed he, with a deep sigh; "if it were God's will, I would gladly die. No longer do I behold on the earth either love, or truth, or faith, or anything that is good."

Turning his eyes from the combats with which Germany was resounding, the pious prince calmly prepared for his departure, in his castle of Lochau. On the 4th May, he sent for his chaplain, the faithful Spalatin. "You do well," said he to him, gently, as he entered, "to come and see me; for the sick should be visited." Then ordering his couch to be wheeled towards the table, near which Spalatin was seated, he ordered all his attendants to retire, and affectionately taking hold of Spalatin's hand, spoke to him of Luther, the peasants, and his approaching departure. At eight in the evening Spalatin returned, when the prince opened his whole heart to him, and confessed his sins in the presence of God. The next day, 5th May, he received the communion in both kinds. He had no member of his family near him—his brother and nephew having set out with the army; but his domestics were around him, according to the ancient custom of those times. With eyes fixed on the venerable prince, who had been so kind a master, they were all melted in tears. "My little children," said he, with a gentle voice, "if I have offended any one of you, let me have pardon for the love of God; for we princes often give pain to inferiors, and that is wrong." Thus Frederick verified the words of the apostle: Let the rich rejoice in that he is made low; because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away.

Spalatin, who did not again leave him, warmly set before him the rich promises of the Gospel; and the pious elector, in its powerful consolations, enjoyed ineffable peace. The evangelical doctrine was no longer viewed by him as the sword which attacks error, pursues it wherever it is found, and after a vigorous struggle, finally overcomes it; it distilled in his heart like the rain and the dew, filling it with hope and joy. The present world was forgotten, and Frederick saw only God and eternity.

Feeling death rapidly approaching, he destroyed the testament which he had written several years before, and in which he recommended his soul to the "Mother of God," and dictated another, in which he cast himself upon the sacred merits of Jesus Christ alone "for the forgiveness of his sins;" and declared his firm conviction that "he was ransomed by the precious blood of his beloved Saviour." After this he said: "I can do no more;" and, at five in the evening, gently fell asleep. "He was a child of peace," exclaimed his physician, "and he has departed in peace." "O death!" said Luther, "how bitter to those whom thou leavest in life!"

Luther, who was then in Thuringia, trying to calm it, had never seen the elector but at a distance, at Worms, standing beside Charles V. But these two men had met in soul the first moment the Reformation appeared. Frederick longed for nationality and independence, as Luther longed for truth and reformation. No doubt the Reformation was, first of all, a spiritual work; but it was, perhaps, necessary to its first success, that it should link itself to some national interest. Accordingly, no sooner had Luther made a stand against indulgences, than the alliance between the prince and the monk was tacitly concluded—an alliance purely moral, without contract, without writing, without words even, and in which the strong gave no other aid to the weak than to allow him to act. But now that the vigorous oak, under whose shelter the Reformation had gradually grown up, was hewn down, now that the enemies of the Gospel were everywhere displaying new hatred and strength, while its partisans were obliged to hide themselves or be silent, nothing seemed able to defend it against the sword of its furious persecutors.

The confederates at Ratisbon, who had vanquished the peasants in the south and west of the empire, everywhere struck at the Reformation, as well as the revolt. At Wurtzburg and Bamberg several of the most peaceable citizens, some even who had opposed the peasants, were put to death. "No matter," it was openly said, "they were adherents of the Gospel." This was enough to make them lose their heads.

Duke George hoped to make the landgrave and Duke John share in his love and his hatred. "See," said he to them, after the defeat of the peasants, and shewing them the field of battle,—"see the mischiefs engendered by Luther." John and Philip seemed to give some hope of adopting his views. "Duke George," said the reformer, "imagines he is to triumph now that Frederick is dead; but Christ reigns in the midst of His enemies: in vain do they gnash their teeth; their desire will perish."

George lost no time in forming a confederation, similar to that of Ratisbon, in the north of Germany. The electors of Mentz and Brandenburg, dukes Henry and Eric of Brunswick, and Duke George, met at Dessau, and there, in July, concluded a Roman alliance. George urged the new elector, and the landgrave, his son-in-law, to give in their adherence to it. Then, as if to announce what were to be its results, he beheaded two citizens of Leipsic, in whose house some of the reformer's writings had been found.

At the same time a letter of Charles V., dated Toledo, arrived in Germany, appointing a new diet to be held at Augsburg. Charles wished to give a new constitution to the empire, that would enable him to dispose, at pleasure, of the forces of Germany. The religious divisions furnished him with the means. He had only to let loose the Catholics on the evangelicals. When they had mutually enfeebled each other, he would obtain an easy triumph over both. Down with the Lutherans! was the emperor's watchword.

Thus there was a kind of universal league against the Reformation. Never had the soul of Luther been so oppressed with fears. The remains of Minzer's sect had sworn that they would have his life, and his only protector was no more. Duke George, he was informed, intended to apprehend him even in Wittemberg. The princes who might have been able to defend him hung down their heads, and seemed to have forsaken the Gospel. The university, already thinned by disturbances, was, it was said, to be suppressed by the new elector. Charles, victorious at Pavia, was assembling a new diet, with the view of giving the finishing blow to the Reformation. What dangers, then, must he not have foreseen! . . . That anguish, those inward sufferings which had often wrung cries from Luther, tore his soul. How shall he resist so many enemies? Amidst these agitations, in presence of these many perils, beside the corpse of Frederick almost before it was cold, and the dead bodies of the peasants who strewed the plains of Germany—who would have thought it—Luther married!

CHAPTER XIII.

The Nuns of Nimptsch—Luther's Feelings—End of the Convent—Luther's Marriage—Domestic Happiness.

In the monastery of Nimptsch, near Grimma, there were, in 1523, nine nuns, who diligently read the Word of God, and had perceived the contrast between the Christian life and the life of the cloister. Their names were—Magdalene Staupitz, Eliza Cautiz, Ava Grossen, Ava and Margaret Schonfeld, Laneta Golis, Margaret and Catherine Zeschau, and Catherine Bora. The first proceeding of these young persons, after they had withdrawn from the superstitions of the monastery, was to write their parents. "The salvation of our souls," they said, "does not allow us to continue any longer to live in a cloister." The parents, fearing the trouble which such a resolution might give them, harshly repulsed the desire of their daughters. The poor nuns knew not what to do. How were they to leave the monastery? They trembled at the thought of so desperate a step. At last, the disgust which the papal worship produced, carried the day. They promised not to quit each other; but to repair, in a body, to some respectable place, decently, and in order. Leonard Koppe and Wolf Tomitzel, two worthy and pious citizens of Torgau, offered their assistance. They accepted it, as sent by God himself, and left the convent of Nimptsch without meeting with any opposition, as if the hand of the Lord had opened the gates for them. Koppe and Tomitzel received them in their car; and, on the 7th April, 1523, the nine nuns, astonished at their own hardihood, stopped, with emotion, before the gate of the old Augustine convent where Luther was residing.

"It is not I who have done it," said Luther, on receiving them; "but would to God I could thus save all captive consciences, and empty all cloisters." Several persons made an offer to the doctor to receive the nuns into their houses; and Catherine Bora was taken into the family of the burgomaster of Wittemberg.

If, at that time, Luther had any thought of preparing for some solemn event, it was to mount the scaffold—not approach the hymeneal altar. Many months later, his answer to those who spoke to him of marriage, was: "God can change my heart as He pleases; but now, at least, I have no thought whatever of taking a wife; not that I do not feel some inclination for the married state; I am neither wood nor stone; but I am in daily expectation of the death and punishment due to a heretic."

Still everything in the Church continued to advance. The monastic life, an invention of man, was everywhere succeeded by the habits of domestic life. On Sunday, 9th October, Luther, having risen as usual, laid aside his Augustine frock, put on the dress of a secular priest, and then made his appearance in the church, where the change produced the greatest joy. Christendom, which had renewed its youth, gave a glad welcome to all which announced that old things were passed away.

Shortly after the last monk quitted the convent; but Luther still remained; his steps alone were heard in its long passages, and he sat alone in silence in the refectory, which was wont to echo with the tattle of the monks. An eloquent solitude! one which attested the triumphs of the Word of God! The convent had ceased to exist. Towards the end of 1524, Luther sent the keys of the monastery to the elector, stating that he would see where God might be pleased to give him food. The elector gave the convent to the university, and asked Luther to continue to reside in it. The abode of the monks was soon to become the hearth of a Christian family.

Luther, whose heart was so well fitted to relish the sweets of domestic life, honoured and loved the married state; it is even probable that he had an attachment for Catherine Bora. For a long time his scruples, and the thought of the eunuchisms to which the step might give rise, had prevented him from thinking of her; and he had made an offer of poor Catherine, first to Baumgartner of Nuremberg, and then to Doctor Glatz of Nuremberg. But when he saw Baumgartner refuse Catherine, and Glatz refused by her, he asked himself more seriously, if he should not form the connection in his own person.

His old father, who had been so much grieved at his embracing the ecclesiastical state, urged him to marry. But there was one idea which perpetually presented itself to Luther's conscience with new energy: marriage is a divine—celibacy a human institution. He had a horror at everything that came from Rome. "I wish," said he to his friends, "to preserve no part of my papistical life." He prayed night and day, beseeching the Lord to deliver him from his uncertainty. At length all scruples were dissipated by one consideration. To all the motives of convenience and personal feeling which led him to apply to himself the words, It is not good that man should be alone, was added a motive of a still higher nature and greater power. He saw, that if he was called to marriage as a man, he was still more called to it as a reformer. This decided him.

"If this monk marries," said his friend, lawyer Schurff, "he will make the world and the devil burst with laughter, and destroy the work which he has begun." This saying made a very different impression on Luther from what might have been supposed. To defy the world, the devil, and his enemies, and, by an action, fitted, as was thought, to destroy the work of the Reformation, to prevent the success of it from being in any way ascribed to him, was the very thing which he desired. Hence, boldly lifting his head, he replied: "Very well, I shall do it. I shall play this trick to the world and the devil; I will give this joy to my father; I will marry Catherine." By marrying, Luther broke still more completely with the institutions of the papacy. He confirmed the doctrine which he had preached by his example; and encouraged the timid entirely to renounce their errors. At this time Rome was, apparently, here and there regaining part of the territory which she had lost: she was, perhaps, beginning to cherish a hope of victory; and, lo! a mighty explosion carries surprise and terror into her ranks, and makes her more fully aware of the courage of the enemy, whom she thought she had tamed. "I wish," said Luther, "to bear testimony to the Gospel, not only by my words, but also by my works. In the face of my enemies, who already triumph, and sing jubilee, I mean to marry a nun, in order that they may understand and know that they have not vanquished me. I do not marry in the hope of living long with my wife; but seeing people and princes letting loose their fury against me, foreseeing that my end is near, and that after my death they will trample my doctrine under foot, I mean to leave, for the edification of the weak, a striking confirmation of what I have taught here below."

On the 11th June, 1525, Luther repaired to the house of his friend and colleague, Amsdorff. He asked for Pomeranus, whom he distinguished by the name of "the Pastor," to bless his union. The celebrated painter, Lucas Cranach, and Doctor John Apelles, acted as witnesses. Melancthon was not present.

Luther's marriage made a noise throughout Christendom. He was assailed from all quarters with accusations and calumnies. "It is incest!" exclaimed Henry VIII. "A monk marrying a vestal!" said some. "Antichrist must be born of this union," said others; "for there is a prophecy that he is to spring from a monk and a nun." On this Erasmus observed, with a sarcastic smile: "If the prophecy be true, how many thousands of Antichrists must the world already contain!" But while Luther was thus assailed, several wise and moderate men within the pale of the Romish Church took up his defence. "Luther," said Erasmus, "has married a member of the illustrious house of Bora, but without dowry." A still more venerable testimony was given to him. The teacher of Germany, Philip Melancthon, whom this bold step had at first amazed, said, in that solemn tone to which even his enemies listened with respect: "If it is pretended that there is anything unbecoming in the marriage of Luther, it is a lie and a calumny. I think he must have done violence to his own feelings in marrying. Married life is a humble, but it is also a holy state—if there is such a state in the world—and the Scriptures uniformly represent it as honourable in the sight of God."

Luther was at first moved on seeing so much contempt and wrath poured out upon him. Melancthon redoubled his friendship and regard; and the reformer was soon able to see in the opposition of men only a sign of the approbation of God. "Did I not offend the world," said he, "I should have reason to tremble, lest what I have done should not be agreeable to God."

There was an interval of eight years between Luther's attack on indulgences and his marriage with Catherine Bora. It would thus be difficult, though it is still attempted, to attribute his zeal against the abuses of the Church to an impatient desire of marrying. He was at this time forty-two years of age, and Catherine Bora had been two years at Wittenberg.

Luther was happy in his marriage. "The greatest gift of God," said he, "is a pious amiable spouse, who fears God, loves her house, and with whom one can live in peace and perfect confidence." Some months after his marriage he announced to one of his friends that Catherine had hopes of becoming a mother. A son was born about a year after the marriage. The sweets of domestic life soon dissipated the clouds which the anger of his enemies had at first raised around him. His Ketha, (Kate,) as he called her, shewed the greatest affection for him—comforted him, when he was depressed, by quoting passages of the Bible to him, relieved him from all the cares of ordinary life, sat beside him during his hours of leisure, embroidered the portrait of her husband, reminded him of the friends to whom he had forgotten to write, and often amused him by her simple-hearted questions. There appears to have been a certain degree of pride in her temper; hence Luther sometimes called her "Sir Kate." He one day said in jest, that if he were still unmarried he would hew an obedient wife for himself out of stone, for such an one nowhere existed in reality. His letters fully expressed his fondness for Catherine. He called her "his dear and affectionate wife,"—"his dear and amiable Kate." Luther's humour was more sportive in Catherine's society; and this happy turn of mind continued with him ever after, even amidst the greatest dangers.

The almost universal corruption of the clergy had brought the priesthood into the greatest contempt; and though there were some true servants of God, their isolated virtues could do away with it. Domestic peace, conjugal fidelity, the surest foundations of earthly happiness, were continually disturbed in town and country by the licentiousness of monks and priests. None were secure against their attempts at seduction. They took advantage of the free access which they had into the bosom of families, and sometimes also of the intimate intercourse furnished by the confessional, to instil a deadly poison into their penitents, and so gratify their vicious propensities. The Reformation, by abolishing the celibacy of priests, re-established the sacredness of the marriage tie. The marriage of ecclesiastics put an end to an immense number of secret crimes. The reformers became models to their flocks in the most intimate and important relation of life; and the people were not slow in expressing their joy at again seeing the ministers of religion become husbands and fathers.

CHAPTER XIV.

The Landgrave—The Elector—Prussia—Reformation—Secularization—The Archbishop of Mentz—Conference of Friedewalt—Diet—Alliance of Torgau—Resistance of the Reformers—Alliance of Magdeburg—The Catholics redouble their efforts—Marriage of the Emperor—Threatening Letters—The two Parties.

LUTHER's marriage at first seemed to add to the embarrassment of the Reformation, which was still suffering from the shock which it had received from the revolt of the peasants. The sword of the emperor and the princes had always been drawn against it, and its friends the landgrave and the new elector seemed discouraged, and afraid to speak out.

However, this state of things was not of long duration. The young landgrave soon stood up boldly. Ardent and courageous, like Luther, he had been won by the charms of the reformer's character. He threw himself into the cause of the Reformation with the eagerness of youth, and at the same time studied it with the gravity of a maturer intellect.

In Saxony, the place of Frederick had not been supplied either in regard to wisdom or influence; but his brother, the Elector John, instead of the passive part of protection, interfered more directly, and with more courage in religious affairs. When quitting Weimar, on the 16th August, 1525, he intimated to the assembled priests: "I desire that in future you preach the pure Word of God, without any human addition." Some old ecclesiastics, who did not know how to obey, replied with great simplicity: "We are not forbidden, however, to say mass for the dead, nor to bless water and salt."—"Everything," resumed the elector, "ceremonies as well as preaching, ought to be regulated by the Word of God."

The young landgrave, shortly after, formed the strange project of converting his father-in-law, Duke George. Sometimes he proved the sufficiency of Scripture; sometimes attacked the mass, the papacy, and vows. Letter succeeded letter, and all the declarations of the Word of God were alternately opposed to the faith of the old duke.

These efforts did not prove useless. The son of Duke George was gained to the Reformation. But Philip failed with his father-in-law. "In one hundred years," said the latter, "it will be seen who is in the right."—"Sad words," said the Elector of Saxony, "what kind of faith is it that stands in need of such a trial? Poor duke! . . . He will wait long, God, I fear, has hardened him as He did Pharaoh."

In Philip the evangelical party found a bold and intelligent leader, capable of withstanding the formidable attacks which their enemies were preparing. But is there not reason to regret that the head of the Reformation was, from this moment, a man of war, instead of being a mere disciple of the Word of God? The human element was enlarged, and the spiritual element diminished. This was detrimental. For every work ought to be developed according to its own nature, and that of the Reformation was essentially spiritual.

God was multiplying its supports. A powerful state on the frontiers of Germany, Prussia, gladly arrayed itself under the Gospel standard. The chivalric and religious spirit which had founded the Teutonic order had gradually died away with the times which gave it birth. The knights, now seeking only their private interest, had produced dissatisfaction among the people subject to them. Poland had profited by this in 1466, to obtain from the order a recognition of her sovereignty. The people, the knights, the grand-master, the Polish government, were so many opposite powers, which were continually jostling each other, and rendered the prosperity of the country impossible.

Then came the Reformation, and in it was recognised the only means of deliverance to this unhappy people. Brismann, Speratus, Poliander, (Dr. Eck's secretary at the Leipzig discussion,) and others, preached the Gospel in Prussia.

One day a mendicant from the countries subject to the Teutonic knights, arrived at Wittenberg, and, halting before Luther's door, with solemn voice, sang Poliander's beautiful hymn,—

"To us at length salvation comes."

The reformer, who had never heard the hymn, listened with astonishment and rapture. The foreign accent of the singer increased his joy. "Again! again!" exclaimed he, when the mendicant had finished. He then asked him where he got the hymn; and his tears began to fall when he learned that from the shores of the Baltic a cry of deliverance was resounding even in Wittenberg. Then clasping his hands, he thanked God.

In fact, salvation was there.

"Take pity on our misery," said the people of Prussia to the grand-master, "and give us preachers who proclaim the pure Gospel of Jesus Christ." Albert at first gave no answer; but he entered into conference with Sigismund, king of Poland, his uncle and sovereign lord, who acknowledged him as hereditary Duke of Prussia. The new prince entered his capital of Königsberg amid the ringing of bells, and the acclamations of the people; all the houses were splendidly decorated, and the streets strewn with flowers. "There is only one order," said Albert, "and that is Christendom." The monastic orders disappeared, and the Divine order was re-established.

The bishops gave up their secular rights to the new duke; the convents were turned into hospitals; the Gospel was preached even in the humblest village; and, in the following year, Albert married Dorothea, daughter of the King of Denmark, whose "faith in the one only Saviour" was immovable.

The pope called upon the emperor to exercise severity against this "apostate" monk, and Charles put Albert under the ban.

Another prince, of the family of Brandenburg, Albert, archbishop of Mentz, was then on the point of following the example of his cousin. The war of the peasants threatened the ecclesiastical states in particular; the elector, Luther, all Germany, believed that they were on the eve of a great revolution. The archbishop, thinking that the only means of saving his principality was secretly to secularize it, asked Luther to prepare the people for this bold step. This Luther did by a letter which he prepared for them, and intended to publish. "God," said he, "has laid a heavy hand on the clergy,—they must fall,—nothing can save them." But the war of the peasants having terminated much more speedily than had been imagined, the cardinal kept his temporal possessions; his fears were dissipated, and he renounced the project of secularization.

While John of Saxony, Philip of Hesse, and Albert of Prussia, openly professed the Reformation, and thus the place of prudent Frederiek was supplied by three princes of resolution and courage, the holy work made progress in the Church and among the nations. Luther solicited the elector to establish the evangelical ministry throughout his states instead of the priesthood of Rome, and to appoint a general visitation of the churches. About the same time episcopal powers began to be exercised, and ministers to be consecrated. "The pope, the bishops, the monks, and the priests, need not make a noise. We are the Church. There is no other Church than the assembly of those who have the Word of God, and are purified by it."

All this could not be said and done without producing a powerful reaction. Rome had thought the Reformation extinguished in the blood of the rebellious peasants; but everywhere its flames reappeared brighter and fiercer. She resolved to make a new effort. The pope and the emperor wrote threatening letters—the one from Rome, the other from Spain. The imperial government prepared to replace matters on the ancient footing, and it was seriously proposed entirely to crush the Reformation at the approaching diet.

The electoral prince of Saxony and the landgrave alarmed, met, on the 7th November, at the castle of Friedewalt, and agreed that their deputies at the diet should act on a common understanding. Thus, in the forest of Sullingen were formed the first elements of an evangelical alliance opposed to the leagues of Ratisbon and Dessau.

The diet was opened on the 11th December, at Augsburg. The evangelical princes did not attend in person. The deputies of Saxony and Hesse spoke out boldly at the outset. "The revolt of the peasants," said they, "was occasioned by imprudent severity. Neither by fire nor sword can the truth of God be plucked out of men's hearts. If you resolve on employing violence against the Reformation, the result will be more dreadful evils than those which you have just with difficulty escaped."

It was felt that the resolution which should be taken, could not fail to be of immense importance. Every one was desirous to put off the decisive moment in order to gain additional strength. It was, therefore, resolved to meet again at Spire in May following. The rescript of Nuremberg was, meantime, to continue in force. "Then," said they, "we will thoroughly decide the points of holy faith, righteousness, and peace."

The landgrave prosecuted his design. In the end of February, 1526, he had a conference with the elector at Gotha. The two princes agreed that if they were attacked on account of the Word of God, they would unite their whole forces to resist their adversaries. This alliance was ratified at Torgau. It was to have important results.

The landgrave did not think the alliance of Torgau sufficient. Convinced that Charles V. was seeking to form a league "against Christ and His holy Word," he wrote letter after letter to the elector, representing the necessity of uniting with other states. "For myself," said he, "I would die, and be chased from my throne, sooner than abjure the Word of God."

At the electoral court there was great uncertainty. In fact, there was a serious obstacle to the union of the evangelical princes. This obstacle was in Luther and Melancthon. Luther wished that the evangelical doctrine should be defended by God alone. He thought that the less men interfered with it, the more manifest the interposition of God would appear. All the measures proposed to be taken seemed to him attributable to cowardly timidity and culpable distrust. Melancthon feared that the alliance of the evangelical princes was the very thing to bring on the war which it was wished to avoid.

The landgrave did not allow himself to be arrested by these considerations, and endeavoured to induce the states around him to join the alliance; but his efforts were not crowned with success. Frankfort refused to become a party to it. The Elector of Trèves withdrew his position, and accepted of a pension from the emperor. The elector-palatine himself, whose evangelical leanings were well known, rejected the propositions of Philip.

The landgrave thus failed in the direction of the Rhine; but the elector, notwithstanding the advice of the theologians of the Reformation, entered into negotiation with the princes who had at all times rallied round the throne of Saxony. On the 12th June, the elector and his son, the Dukes Philip, Ernest, Otho, and Francis of Brunswick and Luneburg, Duke Henry of Mecklenburg, Prince Wolf of Anhalt, Counts Albert and Gebhard of Mansfeld, met at Magdeburg, and there, under the presidency of the elector, formed an alliance similar to that of Torgau.

"God Almighty," said these princes, "having, in His ineffable mercy, caused His holy and eternal Word, the food of our souls and our greatest treasure here below, to appear again amongst men; and powerful manoeuvres having been employed on the part of the clergy and their adherents, to annihilate and extirpate it, we being firmly assured that He who has sent it to glorify His name upon the earth, is able also to maintain it, engage to preserve this holy Word to our people; and for this end to employ our goods, our lives, our states, our subjects, all that we possess,—confiding not in our armies, but solely in the omnipotence of the Lord, whose instruments we desire to be." So spoke the princes.

The town of Magdeburg was two days after received into the alliance, and the new Duke of Prussia, Albert, Duke of Brandenburg, gave in his adherence to it in a special form.

The evangelical alliance was formed; but the dangers which it was intended to avert became every day more alarming. The priests and princes friendly to Rome had seen this Reformation, which they thought completely strangled, suddenly rise up before them in a formidable shape. The partisans of the Reformation were already almost as powerful as those of the pope. If they have the majority in the diet, it is easy to divine what the ecclesiastical states have to expect. Now, then, or never! The question is no longer merely the refutation of a heresy,—a powerful party must be combated. Other victories than those of Dr. Eck must now save Christendom.

Decisive measures had already been taken. The metropolitan chapter of the primary church of Meutz had convened a meeting of all its suffragans, and decided on sending a deputation to the emperor and the pope, to ask them to save the Church.

At the same time Duke George of Saxony, Duke Henry of Brunswick, and the Cardinal-electors Albert, had met at Halle, and had also resolved to address Charles V. "The detestable doctrine of Luther," said they, "makes rapid progress. Every day attempts are made to gain even us; and when gentle means fail, attempts are made to compel us by stirring up our subjects. We invoke the assistance of the emperor." Accordingly, after the conference, Brunswick himself set out for Spain to decide Charles.

He could not have arrived at a more favourable moment. The emperor had just concluded with Francis the famous treaty of Madrid; and as he seemed to have nothing to fear in that quarter, his eyes were now turned wholly to Germany. Francis I. had offered to pay half the expenses of the war, whether against the heretics or against the Turks.

The emperor was at Seville, on the eve of marriage with a princess of Portugal, and the banks of the Guadalquivir were re-echoing with the sound of festivities. A brilliant nobility, and immense crowds of people, thronged the ancient capital of the Moors. Under the arches of the magnificent cathedral was displayed all the pomp of the Church. A papal legate officiated; and never, even in the days of the Arabs, had Andalusia seen a more splendid and imposing ceremony.

This was the time when Henry of Brunswick arrived from Germany, and besought Charles V. to save the Church and the empire, which were now attacked by the monk of Wittenberg. His request was immediately taken into consideration, and the emperor determined on decisive measures.

On the 25th March, 1526, he wrote to several of the princes and towns which adhered to Rome; and at the same time gave the Duke of Brunswick a special commission to say to them, that with deep grief he had learned that the continual progress of Luther's heresy was threatening to fill Germany with sacrilege, devastation, and blood; that, on the other hand, he had extreme pleasure in seeing the fidelity of the great majority of the states; that, neglecting every other affair, he was going to quit Spain, and repair to Rome to make arrangements with the pope, and thenceforth return to Germany, to combat the detestable pest of Wittenberg; that as to themselves they ought to adhere steadfastly to their faith; and if the Lutherans sought to draw them into error by stratagem or force, they should enter into close union with each other, and resist boldly; that he would shortly arrive and support them with all his authority.

On the return of Brunswick to Germany, the Catholic party were overjoyed, and proudly lifted their heads. The Dukes of Brunswick and Pomerania, Albert of Mecklenburg, John of Juliers, George of Saxony, the Dukes of Bavaria, and all the ecclesiastical princes, thought themselves sure of victory after they read the threatening letters of the conqueror of Francis I. They would repair to the approaching diet; they would humble the heretical princes; and if they did not otherwise submit, would compel them by the sword. Duke George is confidently affirmed to have said: "I may be Elector of Saxony whenever I please;" an expression to which it was afterwards attempted to give a different turn. One day the duke's chancellor said at Torgau, with an air of triumph: "Luther's cause cannot hold out long; it had better be looked to."

BRIENZ.

Luther, in fact, did look to it, but not in the sense thus implied;—he attentively followed the designs of the enemies of the Word of God, and thought, as well as Melancthon, that he would soon see thousands of swords drawn against the Gospel. But he sought his strength in a higher source than man. "Satan," wrote he to Frederick Myconius, "is giving full vent to his fury; wicked pontiffs are conspiring and threatening us with war. Exhort the people to fight valiantly before the throne of God by faith and prayer, so that our enemies, being overcome by the Spirit of God, may be compelled to make peace. The first want, the first work, is prayer; let the people know that they are now exposed to the edge of the sword and the fury of the devil, and let them pray."

Thus every preparation was made for a decisive combat. The Reformation had on its side the prayers of Christians, the sympathies of the people, and the rising influence of mind, which no power could arrest. The papacy had in its favour the ancient order of things, the power of ancient custom, the zeal and hatred of formidable princes, and the power of that great emperor whose dominion extended over two worlds, and who had just given so rude a check to the glory of Francis I.

Such was the posture of affairs at the opening of the diet at Spires. At present we return to Switzerland.

DIVISION, SWITZERLAND, GERMANY.—1523-1527.

CHAPTER I.

Unity in Diversity—Primitive Faith and Liberty—Formation of Roman Unity—A Monk and Leo Juda—Theses of Zwingle—The Discussion of January.

WE are going to see the diversities, or, as they have been called, the variations of the Reformation. These form one of its most essential features.

Unity in diversity, and diversity in unity, is the law of nature, and also the law of the Church.

Truth is like the light of the sun. The light, as it descends from heaven, is always one and the same; and yet it assumes different colours on the earth, according to the objects on which it falls. In the same manner, expressions which differ somewhat from each other, may sometimes express the same Christian idea, contemplated under different points of view.

How dull should creation be were this immense variety of forms and colours, which constitute its riches, replaced by an absolute uniformity! In like manner, how desolate the appearance, if all created beings formed only a single magnificent unity!

Divine unity has its rights; human diversity has its rights also. It is not necessary in religion to annihilate either God or man. If you have no unity, your religion is not of God; if you have no diversity, it is not of man. Now, it ought to be of both. Would you erase from the creation one of the laws which God has imposed upon it,—viz., that of an immense diversity? Even things without life, says St. Paul, whether pipe or harp, except they give a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped? (1 Cor. xiv. 7.) But if there is in religious things a diversity, caused by the difference of individuality, and which, consequently, must exist even in heaven, a diversity there is which has been caused by the fall of man, and is a serious calamity.

There are two tendencies which equally lead to error. The former exaggerates the diversity, and the latter the unity. The doctrines essential to salvation form the boundary between these two directions. To exact more than these doctrines, is to infringe on the diversity—to exact less, is to infringe on the unity.

The latter excess is that of rash and rebellious spirits, who turn away from Jesus Christ, to form human systems and doctrines.

The former exists in various exclusive sects, and, in particular, in that of Rome.

The Church should reject error. Did she not do so Christianity could not be maintained. But were we to push this idea to an extreme, the result would be, that the Church would require to oppose the smallest deviation, and involve herself in disputes about words.

Faith would be swaddled, and Christian sentiment brought into bondage. Such was not the condition of the Church in the days of true Catholicism—I mean the first centuries. It rejected the sectaries who assailed the fundamental truths of the Gospel; but these truths admitted, it left faith at full liberty. Rome soon abandoned these wise limits, and in proportion as a domination and doctrine of man was formed in the Church, there arose also a unity of man.

A human system being once invented, its rigour increased from age to age. Christian liberty, which had been respected by the catholicism of the first ages, was first limited, then chained, then stifled. Conviction, which, according to the laws of human nature and the Word of God, ought to be formed freely in the heart and the understanding of man, was imposed externally, as fully formed and symmetrically arranged by his masters. Reflection, will, sentiment, all the faculties of the human mind, which, in due subordination to the Word and the Spirit of God, ought to labour and produce freely, were abridged in their liberty, and compelled to expand in forms previously determined. The spirit of man became like a mirror, on which foreign objects are represented, but which possesses nothing of its own. Doubtless there still were souls taught directly by God. But the great majority of Christians had thenceforth only the convictions of others; a faith properly belonging to the individual became a rarity. The Reformation alone restored this treasure to the Church.

Still there was for sometime a space within which the human mind was allowed to range certain opinions which it might admit or reject at pleasure. But, as a besieging army, always drawing closer and closer around the town, does not allow the garrison to stir beyond the precincts of the walls, and at length obliges it to surrender; in the same way was the hierarchy seen, in every age, and almost every year, abridging the space which it had granted provisionally to the human mind, until, at length, the space was entirely encroached upon, and ceased to exist. Everything that was to be believed, loved, or done, was regulated and fixed in the bureaux of the Roman chancery. The faithful were relieved from the trouble of examining, thinking, and wrestling; they had only to repeat the formula which they had been taught.
